that is, by contract. Defendant did not contract to sell plaintiff a ton truck or a truck of any particular carrying capacity. The contract reads: "Said lessor does hereby lease * * * one Stewart truck No. 348." Here is a complete description of a specific, clearly identified truck. The contract is in writing and contains no warranty that the truck specifically described therein is a ton truck. Upon its face the written instrument purports to be a complete expression of the whole agreement. No other provision, therefore, may be added to the agreement by parol. It is not permissible for plaintiff to show any parol agreement on defendant's part warranting the truck to have any particular carrying capacity. Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 330, 26 Pac. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469; Gardiner v. McDonogh, 147 Cal. 313, 81 Pac. 964; Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 585, 96 Pac. 319; Kullman, Salz & Co. v. Sugar, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 725, 96 Pac. 369. What plaintiff complains of, and all he may complain of, is that he was induced by a false and fraudulent representation to enter into the contract to purchase the truck. But while he may complain that the contract was brought about by defendant's fraud, he cannot complain that the latter has not done what his contract calls upon him to do, namely deliver the truck described in the written instrument, to wit, "one Stewart truck No. 348." Defendant did deliver "Stewart truck No. 348," and none other. Plaintiff, therefore, though he may complain of fraud that induced him to enter into the contract, may not complain of any breach of the contract. This being so, he is not entitled to do a rescission upon the theory that defendant, by breaching his contract in a substantial particular, has permitted plaintiff to elect to rescind. When plaintiff, after his discovery of the fraud, continued to use the truck in his business, thereby waiving his right to repudiate the contract, defendant, notwithstanding his fraudulent representation and his liability for damages by reason thereof, was free to assert any right afforded him under the contract thus ratified by plaintiff's conduct, including the right to retake the truck upon plaintiff's default in the payment of any note when due, subject to plaintiff's right to recoup any damages that may have been sustained by him by reason of the fraud.

It may be suggested that, because plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for fraud, defendant could not insist upon the payment of the $100 note, or payment of any part of the purchase price, until there had first been deducted the amount recoverable by plaintiff as damages. Even so, this would only show that when defendant threatened to seize the truck because plaintiff had defaulted on the $100 note he had mistaken his rights under the contract. But, as said in Miller v. Steen, supra, 34 Cal. 144, such mistake would not operate as a rescission on his part when it was manifest that he did not contemplate anything of the kind. And by permitting defendant to retake possession in the assertion of a supposed right thereto under the contract, plaintiff himself was not contemplating a rescission.

[9] Finally, respondent claims that because his complaint contains a count for money had and received, no rescission of the contract was necessary. It undoubtedly is true that in an action for money had and received the plaintiff may recover from the defendant any money in the latter's possession which in equity and good conscience he ought to pay to plaintiff. And if, in this case, the contract had been rescinded by mutual assent, or if plaintiff, not waiving his right to a rescission, had elected to rescind the contract, then, in equity and good conscience, the $500 in plaintiff's possession would be money that he ought to pay to plaintiff. But where, as here, there has been no rescission, and plaintiff is not entitled to rescind, the money paid on account of the purchase price belongs to defendant under the contract. The forfeiture of the vendee's rights under a contract of sale, for his breach of a condition of the contract, is to be distinguished from a rescission of the contract in that it is an assertion of a right growing out of the contract, and it cannot be said that the money in the hands of the vendor as the result of such forfeiture is not rightfully his.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

ADAMSON v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 3680.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 29, 1921. Rehearing Denied April 27, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 26, 1921.)

1. Eminent domain ⟸167(3)—Sections of Political Code providing method for laying out public roads not exclusive of right of eminent domain.

Pol. Code, §§ 2681–2698, though providing a speedy and convenient method for the laying out of public roads, and the acquisition for such purposes of lands of private owners at fair valuations, were not intended to be exclusive to exclude boards of supervisors of counties and counties themselves from the exercise of those rights of eminent domain in the matter of acquiring land or rights of way for highway purposes, held by the state by virtue of its sovereignty and conceded to it by section 44; this in view of section 2643, subd. 4, and section 4041, Civ. Code, § 1001, and Code Civ. Proc. tit. 7, pt. 3.

2. Eminent domain ⊂=243(1)—Judgment in condemnation suit effective as setting apart land for highway.

Where by final judgment in a condemnation suit to acquire land for highway, brought by the county at the instance of the board of supervisors, it was adjudged that the strip of land in question was condemned for highway purposes, such land was thus acquired, set apart, and appropriated for the particular public use, and the last act essential to vest in the public a right to its use as a thoroughfare was accomplished.

3. District and prosecuting attorneys ⊂=9—Evidence ⊂=83(4)—Act of counsel in stipulating for increased judgment not void; county attorney presumed to do duty.

Act of counsel for a county, proceeding at the instance of its board of supervisors to condemn a strip of land for a highway, in consenting to an increase of the amount of compensation awarded the landowner by the verdict of the jury in the condemnation suit, held not void as without authority; the increase having been on account of discovery that the mileage of necessary fencing was greater than supposed, and the presumption being, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, that counsel for the county, the district attorney, a public official, regularly performed his official duty and was duly authorized to file his consent to the required increase.

4. Eminent domain ⊂=224—Court had power on motion for new trial to modify verdict by increasing award to landowner on account of low estimate of necessary fencing.

In suit by a county at the instance of its board of supervisors to condemn a strip of land for a highway, the trial court possessed power on motion for new trial to amend or modify the verdict of the jury by increasing the amount of compensation awarded the landowner, on account of a mistakenly low stimate of mileage of necessary fencing, to make such verdict conform to the evidence, and having exercised such power, and its order having been complied with, and the judgment in the condemnation suit become final, a taxpayer cannot come in and by injunction stop the public work already in progress on the highway merely on account of the inaccuracy of the court in computing the amount to which the landowner was entitled in damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Merritt H. Adamson against the County of Los Angeles and others to enjoin the expenditure of public money. From a judgment for defendants, on demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson and Nathan Newby, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Paul Vallee, Chief Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants, entered after an order sustaining a general demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint without leave to amend.

The action is one in which the plaintiff, as a resident and taxpayer of Los Angeles county, seeks to enjoin said county and its board of supervisors from proceeding with the expenditure of public money and with the employment of county officials and employees, and the use of county tools and appliances and materials, upon the construction of a certain roadway upon and along a certain right of way 40 feet in width and about 22 miles in length, extending into and over certain private property known as the Malibu ranch, owned by the Rindge Company, a corporation. The complaint sets forth at length the proceedings had and taken before and by the board of supervisors of said county purporting to authorize the institution of an action on behalf of said county for the condemnation of the strip of land in question for the purposes of such highway, and also the institution and proceedings in such action resulting in a judgment in favor of said county condemning a right of way over said strip of land, and assessing and awarding damages to the defendant therein, the Rindge Company, for the taking of the same, which judgment became final, and also sets forth the proceedings before said board of supervisors authorizing and directing the prosecution of the work of constructing said highway at public expense, and the fact that said construction work was actually in progress at the time of the institution of the present action.

The first and main contention which the appellant makes upon this appeal is that the resolution of the board of supervisors purporting to authorize the said condemnation suit was not sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the court of the subject-matter of said suit, and hence all proceedings had pursuant to said resolution were void, and as a sequence no road or right of way was condemned or laid out or established by such condemnation proceedings, and that therefore any and all expenditures of public money, and the creation or improvement of said proposed highway are and would be illegal. The entire basis for this contention on the part of the appellant rests in the assumption that the powers conferred by law upon boards of supervisors to lay out and established public highways are those embodied in those sections of the Political Code numbered 2681 to 2698, inclusive, providing for the laying out, altering, and discontinuing of roads. The method provided for laying out and establishing public highways by these sections of the Political Code is that commonly known as the "viewer" method, frequently employed by counties in the acquisition of lands for new highways and in the laying out of the same; and it is the insistence of the appellant herein that this method is exclusive, and that, not having been followed by the board of supervisors of said county in the attempted acquisition of the right of way for the roadway in question, all subsequent proceedings in that direction were void.

In reply to this contention the respondent directs our attention to subdivision 4 of section 2643 of the Political Code, which it is urged confers express power upon boards of supervisors to acquire private lands and rights of way thereover for highway purposes by condemnation proceedings under the general right of eminent domain. This subdivision is part of the general section giving boards of supervisors the general control and supervision over roads within their respective counties, and by the terms of said subdivision they are empowered to "acquire the right of way over private property for the use of public highways, and for that purpose require the district attorney to institute proceedings under title 7, part 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure." The respondent further contends that, aside from this special provision granting this power and providing for this procedure, boards of supervisors possess the power to direct the institution of actions for the condemnation of private property for highways and for public uses under their general right of eminent domain under the provisions of section 44 of the Political Code and of section 1001 of the Civil Code; and it further contends that, in addition to these general grants of power, boards of supervisors have been expressly invested with these powers under section 4041 of the Political Code, which is embraced in article 4 of chapter 4 of part 4 thereof, under the title of "General Permanent Powers," and which section of the Code reads in part as follows:

"The boards of supervisors in their respective counties shall have jurisdiction and power, under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law * * * (4) to acquire and take by purchase, condemnation or otherwise land for the uses and purposes of public roads, highways, boulevards, turnpikes, and other public ways."

[1] We are entirely satisfied that the foregoing contentions on the part of the respondent herein must, both upon principle and authority, be upheld. The sections of the Political Code upon which the appellant relies in support of its contention, while they provide a speedy and convenient method for the laying out of public roads, and the acquisition for such purposes of the lands of private owners at fair valuations, were not intended to be exclusive, since to so hold would have the effect of excluding boards of supervisors of counties, and hence counties themselves, from the exercise of those rights of eminent domain in the matter of acquiring land or rights of way for highway purposes held by the state by virtue of its sovereignty and expressly conceded to it by the terms of section 44 of the Political Code, and would also render nugatory and meaningless the other sections and subdivisions of said Code to which we have above referred.

But, aside from this consideration, we think that the contention of the appellant as to the limited powers of boards of supervisors under the several provisions of the Political Code above referred to has been quite definitely determined in a case which by analogy is almost identical with the case at bar. That is the case of City of Los Angeles v. Leavis, 119 Cal. 164, 51 Pac. 34. In that case the city of Los Angeles, a municipal corporation, brought suit to condemn land for a public street. It was contended that it had no power to commence or maintain such an action without having first taken the steps and resorted to the processes provided in the Statutes of 1889, p. 70, relative to the laying out, opening, extending, widening and straightening of public streets in municipalities, which in quite a number of respects embrace similar provisions to those embodied in the sections of the Political Code upon which appellant relies in support of his contention. The Supreme Court says:

"The contention, we think, is untenable. The provisions of the Act of March 6, 1889, are not exclusive, and were not designed to prohibit a municipality from maintaining condemnation proceedings under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. * * * In Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, the court, after quoting section 1001 of the Civil Code, wherein it is provided that any person may, without further legislative action, acquire private property for any use specified in section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure, declared: 'A corporation, whether private or public, is a person. It follows therefore that under this general law, general in the widest and fullest sense of the term, any public or private corporation, or any natural person, may, for any of the uses defined in section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure, acquire property, without the consent of the owner, by means of the proceedings described in part 3, title 7, of said Code.' In Santa Cruz v. Enright, 95 Cal. 105, the same construction is given to the law."

The provisions of article 6 of chapter 2 of title 6 of the Political Code, comprising sections 2681 to 2698 thereof, do not purport to be exclusive, and may not be held to be so in view of the express grant of power embodied in subdivision 4 of section 2643 above quoted, and of the even more comprehensive enumeration of the general permanent powers of boards of supervisors contained in section 4041 of the Political Code by which such boards are expressly authorized "to acquire and take by purchase, condemnation or otherwise land for the uses and purposes of public roads, highways and so forth." We are therefore of the opinion that the first contention of the appellant cannot be sustained.

In arriving at this conclusion we are not unmindful of the cases which the appellant has cited as supporting his contention; but an examination of these cases discloses that either the direct point here made was not under consideration there, or that the proceeding assailed was one having its inception under the provisions of sections 2681 and 2698 of the Political Code, and that the error complained of in those cases consisted in an alleged departure from the procedure laid down in those sections of the Code. Such cases do not have application to an original condemnation proceeding instituted under section 1237 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Having thus determined the appellant's main point against his contention he still insists that, conceding the superior court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the condemnation proceeding, and that it has done so, still the strip of land so condemned did not become a public highway so as to entitle the board of supervisors to proceed to expend the public moneys for its improvement without the passage of a resolution of the board of supervisors declaring said land to be a public highway, which resolution he claims was never adopted.

[2] We do not find any merit in this contention. The final judgment in the condemnation suit adjudged that the strip of land in question was "condemned for highway purposes." It was thus acquired, set apart and appropriated for this public use, and, as was said by the Supreme Court in the case of Wulzen v. San Francisco, 101 Cal. 15, 35 Pac. 353, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17:

> "When land within a street is 'condemned, appropriated, acquired, set apart, and taken for public use,' it would seem that the last act in the series essential to vest in the public a right to its use as a thoroughfare is accomplished."

We are cited to no case which undertakes to lay down a different rule.

The appellant's final contention is that the conditions prescribed by law as the prerequisite to entitle the county of Los Angeles, through its officials, to take possession of the strip of land in question for the purpose of doing highway work thereon were not complied with, and hence that these officials had no right to expend public money in the improvement of land to the possession of which they were not lawfully entitled. This contention rests upon the following state of facts:

The condemnation suit was tried before a jury which, among other things, found that the amount of fencing in mileage requisite to fence the Rindge Company's land along the roadway was 29 miles, and that its cost would be $18,850, or $650 per mile, to which sum said company would be entitled in compensation. A motion for a new trial was made, one of the specifications of which was that the jury was in error as to the proper amount of this mileage of required fencing. The trial court was of the opinion that this was correct, and that the mileage of said fencing should have been 31½ miles, for which increase the Rindge Company should have been awarded further compensation at the specified rate per mile. It therefore required the plaintiff to consent to this increase as a condition of its order denying the motion for a new trial, whereupon counsel for plaintiff filed a written stipulation consenting to this increase in the defendant's amount of compensation, and thereupon the court entered its order denying the motion for a new trial. The contention of the present appellant is that the counsel for the county had no authority to stipulate for this increase in the judgment, and that the court had no power to make it, and by so doing to change the amount of compensation fixed by the jury.

[3, 4] We find no merit in the contention that the act of counsel for the county in consenting to an increase of the amount of the compensation awarded to the defendant by the verdict of the jury in the condemnation suit was void as without authority. The record does not so disclose, and in the absence of any showing to the contrary the presumption will be that counsel for the county—who in that case was himself a public official, namely, the district attorney, regularly performed his official duty and was duly authorized to file his consent to the required increase. San Luis Obispo v. Hendricks, 71 Cal. 242, 11 Pac. 682; Code Civ. Proc. § 1963. Further than this, we have no doubt that the trial court possessed the power upon a motion for a new trial to amend or modify the verdict of the jury in the respect it did so as to make it conform to the evidence in the case, and that having that power, and having exercised it, and its order in that regard having been complied with, and its judgment in said condemnation suit having become final, this plaintiff cannot, merely by virtue of being a taxpayer, come in and, by way of injunction sought in this latter action, stop the public work already in progress upon the strip of land condemned in said former action for public use as a highway, merely because of some alleged inaccuracy on the part of the trial court in computing the amount to which the defendant therein would be entitled in damages.

Upon a review of the whole record we are satisfied that the strip of land sought to be taken for highway purposes in the condemnation suit was adaptable to and properly subject to condemnation for such purposes; that the condemnation suit was one of the alternative methods provided by law for the acquisition of private lands by counties for highway uses; that the judgment made and entered in said condemnation proceeding was a legal and proper judgment, and that its effect was to transfer a right of way over the strip of land in question to the county of Los Angeles for highway purposes, and that no other or further act or declaration on the part of the board of supervisors was required to effectuate that purpose; and, finally, that the trial court committed no error or abuse of its discretion in refusing to grant or issue an injunction upon the plaintiff's complaint herein, the demurrer to which we hold to have been properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

SILVA v. ANGELO. (Civ. 2183.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 26, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇐326(1)—Farm lease held not to show that tenant should bear total expense of threshing and baling hay.

Where a farm lease provided that the lessee should deliver to the lessor one-half of all crops of every nature, in stack and sack, according to the custom of making divisions in the neighborhood, and there was no provision that the lessee should bear the total expense of threshing grain or baling hay, the lease providing that each party should furnish one-half of the feed, the lease cannot be construed as requiring the lessee to bear the total expense of baling hay and threshing grain, particularly as hay could be delivered unbaled, etc.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇐331(6)—Evidence held to warrant finding that farm lease required parties to share expense of threshing grain and baling hay.

In an action by the lessor to reform a farm lease which did not specify as to how the expense of threshing grain and baling hay was to be borne, testimony by the lessee that the expense was to be borne equally, which, of course, was competent, held sufficient to sustain the judgment denying reformation and to establish that the expense should be divided.

3. Trial ⇐404(1)—Findings should be construed to support judgment.

Findings must be construed as to support the judgment if reasonably possible.

4. Reformation of Instruments ⇐45(9)—Findings in action to reform farm lease held to support judgment that parties should share expense of threshing grain and baling hay.

In an action by a lessor to reform a farm lease so as to require the lessor to bear the entire expense of threshing grain and baling hay, findings that the lease recited in detail all the conditions, and that the lessor was indebted to the tenant for paying his share of the cost of threshing and baling the crops, held to support the judgment denying reformation, etc.

5. Costs ⇐32(3)—Where plaintiff recovered substantial judgment, he is entitled to cost of course, though some relief denied.

In an action to reform a farm lease and for an accounting, plaintiff is, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 3, entitled to costs as of course, or as a matter of right, where he recovered a substantial amount, though reformation of the lease was denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by A. J. Silva, by his guardian ad litem, Mary F. Silva, against Antone Angelo. From a judgment denying plaintiff part of the relief sought, as well as costs, plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed, so far as it denied costs; otherwise, affirmed.

O. G. Hopkins, of Sacramento, for appellant.

John C. March, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The object of this action is: (1) To reform a certain lease, whereby the plaintiff demised certain real property to the defendant for the term of three years, commencing on the 1st day of November, 1916, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1919; (2) to recover judgment against the defendant for the sum of $983.80, alleged to be for moneys received by the defendant for plaintiff for the sale of hay and potatoes; (3) for an accounting by defendant "for the balance of the crops and proceeds of said leased premises."

The lease concerning which the controversy involved herein arose, as it was executed by the parties hereto, is set out in full in the complaint.

Among other covenants and conditions, the said lease, which appears in the complaint as paragraph 2 of the first cause of action thereof, is the following:

"The lessee further agrees that he will deliver and pay over to the said lessor, his executors, administrators or assigns, or to his or their order, annually, one-half of all proceeds and crops produced on the said farm and premises aforesaid, of every nature, kind and description, in stack and sack, according to the usual course and custom of making such divisions in the neighborhood and in a seasonable time after said crops have been gathered and harvested."

The lease contains no specific provision as to how or by whom the expense for threshing the crops and baling the hay produced upon the demised premises should be borne—that is to say, whether such expense should be borne equally by the lessor and lessee or entirely by the latter—the plaintiff contending that the understanding was that the defendant was to bear the whole of the expense incident to the harvesting of the crops and the baling of the hay produced upon the demised premises during the term of the lease. It is in this particular that the reformation of the lease is sought, and as the predicate for such relief, the complaint thus speaks:

"That prior to the execution of the said lease, and during the negotiations therefor, and the terms thereof, it was agreed between the said lessor and the said lessee, as one of the terms of said lease, that defendant, as such lessee, was to do, and he agreed to do, all the baling of hay and all the threshing of crops on said leased premises, during the term of said lease, at his expense, the said lessor to furnish one-half of the wire for baling and one-half of all sacks necessary; that subsequent thereto, plaintiff and defendant visited the law office of one O. G. Hopkins, at Sacramento, for the purpose of causing the terms of said agreement of lease to be put into written form, and executing same; that by mutual mistake, neglect, and inadvertence of both of said parties, they failed to recite to the said attorney that portion of the terms of said lease as hereinbefore set out, and the said terms in detail were omitted therefrom on account of such neglect; that the omission of said terms from said lease was not discovered by said plaintiff until about the month of May, 1918; that at or about said time, the defendant refused to carry out said lease as agreed upon as aforesaid, and demanded of plaintiff that he pay for one-half the cost of all baling and threshing and for one-half of all wire and all sacks used during the years 1917 and 1918."

The complaint then sets out (paragraph 5) an instrument in writing, as to which it is alleged:

"That at and before the making and executing of the said lease, this plaintiff and defendant intended and agreed that the said instrument and lease should mean, and the legal consequences thereof should be, as follows:"

The instrument thus set forth is, with the exception of the following paragraph, precisely the same in its language and provisions as the lease subscribed and so executed by the parties:

"The lessee further agrees that during said term he will do all the baling of hay and all the threshing of crops on said premises at his own expense, the lessor agreeing to furnish one-half of the wire for baling and one-half of all the sacks necessary."

It is then alleged that, through the mutual mistake of plaintiff and defendant, "the said lease contract hereinbefore alleged and set out did not, and does not, truly state or express the intention of said parties, and does not truly express or set out what were to be the legal consequences of said legal contract," in that it failed to state specifically that the lessee agreed that he would himself bear the whole of the expense necessary to be incurred for the threshing of the crops and the baling of the hay produced during the term of the lease on the demised premises.

The complaint further states that, on the 16th of November, 1918, the plaintiff demanded of defendant in writing that the latter consent to a reformation of the lease in the particular above specified, so that it would conform to the agreement made between them in said particular, but that defendant refused to give his consent to a change in the lease so demanded, and still refuses to assent thereto.

Following the foregoing averments are allegations that the plaintiff has at all times complied with the provisions of the contract of lease required of him thereby, and by the actual agreement of the parties, and that defendant has received into his possession and retains certain moneys, aggregating $983.80, which belong to the plaintiff, as his share of the proceeds of the sale by defendant of certain of the products of the premises in question.

The defendant answered, specifically denying all the averments of the complaint, and also filed a cross-complaint, in which it is alleged that the written contract of lease as executed by the parties contained the full and complete agreement between them, and that the terms, conditions, and covenants as set out in said contract of lease are therein stated and expressed as the plaintiff and the defendant understood and agreed were to be the terms, etc., upon which the premises were to be leased to defendant. It is alleged in the cross-complaint that—

"The usual course and custom of making such divisions in the neighborhood where said premises are situated was, at the time of the executing of said lease, and now is, that the lessor and lessee shall each pay one-half of the cost and expense of all baling of hay and all threshing of crops grown on such leased premises, and one-half of the wire for such baling and one-half of all sacks necessary for such crops; that said defendant paid the cost of all the baling of the hay and all the threshing of the crops grown on said premises during the years 1917 and 1918, which amounted to the sum of $945.70; that one-half of said sum * * * was paid by said defendant for and on behalf of said plaintiff."

The total amount which it is alleged in the cross-complaint defendant paid out for the use and benefit of plaintiff is the sum of $586.75, for which sum, in addition to the prayer that plaintiff be awarded nothing by reason of his action, the defendant prays for judgment.

The court found:

Finding 2: "That the parties hereto, on the 22d day of December, 1916, entered into the written agreement of lease which was executed by them, and which is set out in paragraph 2 of the first cause of action of the complaint, and that under said lease defendant took possession of the property described in said lease."

Finding 3: "That it is not true that at and before the making and executing of the said lease, plaintiff and defendant intended and agreed that the said instrument and lease should mean, and the legal consequences thereof should be, as set out in paragraph 5 of plaintiff's first cause of action in said complaint."

Finding 4: "That it is not true that, through the mutual mistake of plaintiff and defendant, the said lease contract set out in paragraph 2 in plaintiff's first cause of action in said complaint did not, and does not, truly state or express the intention of the said parties, and does not truly express or set out what were to be the legal consequences of said legal contract."

Finding 5: "That the said lease, as signed and executed by the said plaintiff and defendant on the said 22d day of December, 1916, recited fully, in detail, all the terms and conditions as agreed upon by and between said parties."

Finding 6: "That during the first year of the lease, to wit, 1917, plaintiff furnished one-half the wire for baling and one-half the sacks necessary; that defendant furnished the other half, and paid the expenses of baling and threshing, and accounted to the plaintiff for the balance due on the sale of crops for 1917, according to the terms of the lease."

It was further found that the defendant, during the year 1918, sold hay and potatoes for the sum of $983.80, which sum defendant received "to the use and benefit of plaintiff," and that no part of said sum has been paid to the last named by defendant; that, during the years 1917 and 1918, the defendant raised on the leased land certain crops, calves, and hogs, and let out for hire a team of horses belonging to plaintiff, all of which totaled in value the sum of $224.75, one-half of which belongs to plaintiff, and of which no accounting to plaintiff has been made by defendant.

The court also found that the defendant, in the years 1917 and 1918, paid out for the benefit and use of plaintiff, under said lease, for the baling of hay, threshing of crops grown on the demised premises, and for other small items of expense, the total sum of $513, "no part of which has been paid," and that defendant "is entitled to have set off against the claims of plaintiff the said sum of $513," together with the sum of $50, which it was found was the reasonable value of services performed by defendant for plaintiff in taking care of certain horses belonging to the latter during the term of said lease, making a total of $563.

No specific finding was made as to the alleged "course and custom" in the neighborhood where the premises are situated with respect to the division of crops between the lessor and lessee of lands devoted to agricultural and other kindred purposes.

The court, as a conclusion of law, declared that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for the sum of $533.85 "and that neither of said parties have judgment for costs herein." Judgment was entered accordingly. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he brings the cause here on appeal from those portions of the judgment allowing defendant a set-off in the sum of $480.51 against the amount adjudged to be owing to him (plaintiff) by defendant, and denying to plaintiff his costs of suit.

It will be observed, from the particular in which the plaintiff sought to secure a reformation of the lease, that the whole controversy between the parties here centers in this proposition, namely: Whether the plaintiff was, under the contract of lease, obligated to bear one-half of the expense of harvesting the crops and baling the hay raised on the demised premises during the term of the lease, the contention of the plaintiff being that, even under the terms of the agreement of lease as it was executed by the parties, the defendant himself was required to pay all expenses so incurred.

The plaintiff contends that, from the language itself of the lease, it is perfectly clear that the agreement was that the entire expense of baling the hay and of threshing the crop was to be borne by the defendant. We are unable to coincide with that view. Indeed, while the construction that the pleader may put upon a written instrument is not controlling or binding upon the courts, the position of the plaintiff is, singularly enough, directly at variance with his plea for a reformation of the lease so that the instrument would unquestionably show that the understanding was that the entire cost incident to the labor and the expense required for the threshing of the crops and the baling of the hay was to be borne by the defendant. The lease specifically provides that the lessor and the lessee shall each, during the term of the lease, "furnish one-half of all seed necessary to be used in planting and farming said land, and one-half of barley necessary for horse feed, and extra parts of machinery." There is no other provision in the instrument which contains an express stipulation as to how or by whom the other expenses of carrying on the farming business on the demised land shall be paid or be borne. It is therefore very clear that a construction of the covenant in question cannot be materially aided by examining it in comparison with other provisions of the lease or the general context thereof.

The contention of plaintiff is, however, that the language of said covenant, to wit: "The lessee further agrees that he will deliver and pay over to said lessor * * * one-half of all proceeds and crops produced on the said premises, * * * of every nature, kind and description, in stack and sack, according to the usual course and custom of making such divisions in the neighborhood," etc., when read and considered by the light of the paragraph in the lease immediately following said language, can lead to no other rational conclusion than that the clear and essential implication is that the expense of threshing and baling was wholly to be paid by the defendant. The paragraph referred to reads:

"The lessee further agrees that, after such division or divisions have been made annually, he will haul and transport the share of crop or crops due to the lessor to such shipping point as the lessor may direct, without cost to the lessor."

[1] The argument supporting that proposition is that the transportation of the crops produced upon the premises, which, to facilitate the proper handling and shipping thereof, are required to be either baled or put in sacks, would require that they should be baled and placed in sacks, and, since the lessee is required to make delivery of the crops in that mode without cost to the lessor, it would follow that it was intended that he should, without cost to the lessor, put the crops in such condition as would admit of their proper delivery to the lessor at any point to be named by him. It is difficult to see wherein the latter provision can be of any assistance in the ascertainment of the intent of the parties upon the question whether the burden of the cost for threshing and baling should be upon the defendant alone or equally borne by the plaintiff and the defendant. The language of that paragraph, it will be noted, is that after the divisions are made, as provided in the preceding paragraph of the instrument, the lessee must—

"haul and transport the share of crop or crops due to the lessor to such shipping point as the lessor may direct, without cost to the lessor."

That by that provision of the lease the duty of performing the service of such hauling and transportation free of all expense to the lessor is placed upon the lessee, is a proposition so clear as to admit of no possible dispute; but it is equally clear that the requirement of the performance of that service by the lessee at his own exclusive expense is as far as the provision goes, either expressly, or upon any reasonable construction. It is obvious that it throws absolutely no light upon the question whether the expense necessarily required to thresh the crops and bale the hay was to be wholly paid by the lessee, or equally paid by both the lessor and the lessee, and this is true whether the provision is viewed alone or by itself, or in comparison with the preceding paragraph of the lease. In a word, it is very clear that the covenant was intended to provide for the delivery into the possession of the lessor by the lessee the former's share of the crop after the division thereof had been effected, at the sole expense of the lessee, and, as stated, does not reflect any light upon the question whether the expense incident to the work of preparing the crop for such delivery should be borne solely by the lessee or in equal shares by both the parties to the lease. Thus, if there is to be extracted from the language of the lease itself an agreement or an intention in the parties, that the whole of the expense of threshing and baling should be borne by the lessee, we are driven to a determination of that proposition from the language of the preceding paragraph of the instrument, and, as before declared, we cannot reasonably so construe said language as to bring about that result. The controlling language of said provision, in this connection, is that the lessee "will deliver over and pay to the said lessor" his share of the crop, "in stack and sack, according to the usual course and custom of making such divisions in the neighborhood," etc. It is first to be noted that the word "bale" is not used in said provision, nor, for that matter, is there any express or direct provision anywhere in the lease requiring the crops to be "baled." Nor is there in the lease any express reference to the threshing of the crops. These circumstances we mention, however, not that we feel justified in holding that the threshing of the crops and the baling of such crops as are required thus to be preserved to be properly handled for commercial purposes are not required of the defendant under a fair and reasonable construction of the lease considered in its entirety, but particularly because the absence of the word "bale" from that particular provision, and the use of the word "stack" therein (the word "stack," as applied to farm crops, being commonly understood to refer to those crops which also may be "baled") would seem to limit the obligation of the lessee, in the matter of delivering to the lessor his one-half share of the crops, to the delivery thereof in "stack" and "sack." In other words, for the reason suggested, it would appear from the face of the provision in question that, when the lessee should "deliver and pay over" to the lessor in "stack" and "sack" his share of all the crops produced on the premises, the former's duty to the lessor under the lease had been fully performed. But, even if the covenant in question were reasonably amenable to the construction that those crops susceptible to baling were to be delivered to plaintiff baled, still we find nothing in the language of said covenant from which it can be inferred that the expense of baling was to be entirely met by the defendant. If the contention is that the words, "according to the usual course and custom of making such divisions in the neighborhood," were understood and intended by the parties to mean, and were inserted in the lease to express such intention, that certain of the crops were to be delivered to the plaintiff baled, and that the defendant was to pay the whole of the cost of baling, as well as the cost of threshing, then, so far as the face of the instrument is concerned, the intention of the parties in that particular is still enveloped in obscurity, for nowhere does the lease, by its express language, enlighten us upon the nature and scope of the "usual course and custom in the neighborhood" where the premises are situated in the matter of the division of crops between the lessor and lessee of farming lands.

Thus we have considered the lease for the purpose of showing that, upon or from its face, it cannot be determined whether the agreement was that the lessee was to bear the whole of the cost of threshing and baling the crops. And the result of this conclusion is that, since the lease itself does not expressly provide how or by whom the expense for threshing and baling shall be borne, and is indefinite and uncertain as to that proposition, it was requisite, to ascertain whether it was the intention and understanding of the parties, that the lessee should bear the whole of the expense of threshing and baling the crops produced upon the demised premises, or that such expense should be borne in equal shares by both, either to prove what was the "usual course and custom of the neighborhood," if such course or custom would throw any light upon such intention, or to take testimony of the oral contemporaneous negotiations eventuating in the written lease, assuming that such negotiations would disclose such intention.

As shown, the plaintiff asked for a reformation of the lease in the respect in which we are now considering it and the defendant pleaded the custom of the neighborhood as to the division of crops, and alleged that it was the custom in the neighborhood in which the leased premises are situated for the lessor and lessee of farm lands, where the compensation of the lessor for the use of the land was to be one-half of the crops produced on the premises demised, to bear the expenses incidental to the threshing and the baling of the crops equally. Thus the plaintiff opened up inquiry into the oral negotiations immediately leading to the execution of the lease and the defendant likewise made the nature and scope of the alleged custom an issue. The burden of proving such custom was therefore upon the defendant.

The plaintiff introduced testimony to the effect that the express understanding was, before the written lease was drafted and subscribed by the parties, that the defendant was to pay the whole of the cost of threshing and baling, and that it was understood that a provision or covenant to that effect should be inserted in the written lease; that, through inadvertence or oversight, the plaintiff, at whose instance the lease was drawn by Mr. Hopkins, her attorney, neglected or failed to call the attention of her attorney to that particular part of the agreement, and that it was because of such inadvertence or neglect on her part that said provision was pretermitted from or not inserted in the lease.

[2-4] The defendant failed to sustain his claim, as set out in his cross-complaint, that it was the custom in the neighborhood in which the demised land is situated for the lessor and lessee in such a case as this to bear equally the cost of threshing and baling the crops. One witness testified that, while it was true that he himself had leased to a tenant land situated in the neighborhood in which the land in question is situated upon an agreement, among others, that the cost of threshing and baling the crops should be borne in equal shares between them, he was unable to say that such a custom prevailed or existed in said neighborhood. Other witnesses called by the defendant could not say that such a custom existed, or had ever existed, in said neighborhood. But the defendant himself, replying to the testimony presented by plaintiff as to the parol contemporaneous agreement as to the expense of threshing and baling, testified that it was explicitly agreed and distinctly understood between him and the plaintiff that each should bear an equal share of the cost of threshing and baling the crops. This testimony was, of course, competent under the issue joined upon the allegations of the complaint looking to a reformation of the lease, and, having been accepted by the court as disclosing the truth of the matter to which it related, was sufficient to warrant the finding that "the said lease, as signed and executed by the said plaintiff and defendant on the said 22d day of December, 1916, recited fully, in detail, all the terms and conditions as agreed upon by and between said parties," and the further finding that plaintiff was indebted to defendant for paying his (plaintiff's) share of the cost of threshing and baling the crops during the years 1917 and 1918. And that these findings support the judgment, notwithstanding that there is no direct finding that the agreement was that the lessor and the lessee were each to pay one-half of the expense of threshing and baling, there can be no doubt. Said findings necessarily include or, at least, imply the finding of such an agreement. The rule is that the findings must be so construed as to support the judgment, if reasonably it can be done, and upon such construction of the findings here as a whole, it is manifest that, as stated, the judgment is sufficiently supported.

[5] We think, however, that the court erred by its refusal to award plaintiff his costs. The action on the part of plaintiff was not only for a decree reforming the lease, but also for a money judgment against defendant, for money due the former as his share of the proceeds of the sale by defendant of certain crops produced on the premises in question. While the defendant did not deny in his answer that he was indebted to plaintiff in some amount, but, on the contrary, admitted that certain products of the farm had been sold by him, and that the proceeds of such sale were in his possession in the form of a draft, he did not offer to pay to or deposit in court for plaintiff the amount due the latter, even upon the basis of the counterclaim he set up against the plaintiff. The judgment for plaintiff was for the sum of $533.85, and such judgment carried costs as a matter "of course," which means, as a matter of right. Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 3; Stoddard v. Treadwell et al., 29 Cal. 281; Schmidt v. Klotz, 130 Cal. 223, 62 Pac. 470; Hoyt v. Hart, 149 Cal. 722, 87 Pac. 569; F. A. Hihn Co. v. City of Santa Cruz, 24 Cal. App. 365, 141 Pac. 391; Peake v. Harris, 192 Pac. 311, 317.

The judgment, in so far as it denies to plaintiff his costs, is reversed, with directions to the court below to allow plaintiff his costs. In all other respects, the judgment is affirmed.

In re GARTENLAUB'S ESTATE.

GARTENLAUB v. UNION TRUST CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

(S. F. 9326.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 12, 1921. Rehearing and Petition for Modification of Judgment Denied June 9, 1921.)

1. Trusts ⟸274(4)—Premiums paid on bonds to be charged against income by trustee.

A premium paid for securities purchased by a trustee under a will should be charged against the income of the estate, and the principal must be maintained intact from loss, in the absence of a clear direction in the will to the contrary.

2. Trusts ⟸217(4), 218(1)—Trustee not permitted to buy and sell bonds on speculation; fluctuations in prices of bonds purchased by trustee disregarded.

A trustee is not permitted to buy and sell bonds on speculation and the fluctuations in market value after purchase by the trustee are merely changes in the value of the assets of the trust estate, which are to be wholly disregarded in any accounting between life tenant and remaindermen for funds from the trust estate invested in income-bearing property.

3. Trusts ⟸274(4)—Deduction from interest of premiums paid by trustee not violation of statute.

Where testamentary trustee purchased bonds at a premium, deduction from interest of the amount paid as premium is not a violation of Civ. Code, §§ 723, 724, prohibiting accumulations of income except during minority.

4. Wills ⟸684(5)—Principal of trust not to bear loss occasioned by wearing away of premium paid for bonds.

A bequest of three-fourths of the "entire net income" held not to contemplate that the principal of the trust estate should bear the loss occasioned by the wearing away of premium paid by the trustee in purchase of bonds.

5. Trusts ⟸227—Trustee held entitled to reimbursement for attorney's fees.

Where litigation arose upon the settling of a trustee's accounts and concerned the interpretation of the instrument creating the trust and a determination of the proper mode of executing the trust, the trustee was therefore directly interested in its representative capacity, and had authority to employ a legal representative in the interests of the trust estate, and was entitled to reimbursement for attorney's fees at the hearing and upon appeal, although the appeal arose out of conflicting claims of beneficiaries, and it was immaterial that the attorney first supported one beneficiary's claims and later altered his position.

6. Trusts ⟸274(3)—Extraordinary expenses of trust taken from principal and ordinary from income.

Where litigation becomes necessary to remove a doubt or ambiguity so as to insure the correct administration of the trust, the expense is an extraordinary charge, which, unless otherwise provided by the testator, should be borne by all parties, and if the expense of litigation incident to the trust is paid from principal, the life tenant as well as the remaindermen shares the burden, for in that event the life tenant is deprived of the interest on the sum taken from principal; but expenses in regard to matters concerning the ordinary management of the trust, such as the preparation of annual accounts, are usually payable from income.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

In the matter of the Estate of Abraham Gartenlaub, otherwise known as A. Gartenlaub, deceased. From an order setting forth annual account of the Union Trust Company of San Francisco, as testamentary trustee, Alice G. B. Gartenlaub appeals. Modified and affirmed.

See, also, 197 Pac. 90.

Garret W. McEnerney, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Norman A. Eisner, Heller, Powers & Ehrman, and Samuel S. Stevens, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. Objections interposed to the settling of an annual account of a testamentary trustee form the basis of the present appeal. The decedent, Abraham Gartenlaub, who died June 1, 1914, devised and bequeathed the greater part of his estate in trust to the Union Trust Company of San Francisco, and empowered the trustee to convert into money the estate thus received and invest the same in certain described bonds. By the terms of the will the trustee was directed to pay to Alice G. B. Gartenlaub, the wife of the testator, monthly, during her lifetime, three-fourths of the "entire net income, revenue, and profit of every kind arising from said estate in said month in any way whatever." The said Alice Gartenlaub appeals from an order of the superior court of San Francisco settling the fourth annual account of the trustee. Sarah Fox, who is the sister of the testator and the life tenant in respect to the remaining one-fourth of the "net income, revenue, and profit," her two children, Harry and Gussie Fox, who are the remaindermen under the trust, and the trustee are the respondents. Appellant contends that, in the account attacked, the trustee has erroneously deducted certain sums from "income" and credited them to "principal."

Pursuant to the provisions of the will, the trustee has invested funds of the trust estate in certain bonds which it purchased at a premium. Obviously the amount of the premium cannot be collected from the obligor when the bonds mature, for the latter is liable only for the face value thereof. Consequently, if the bonds are retained by the trustee until maturity, the principal of the trust estate will be depleted by an amount equal to the premium paid. For the purpose of preventing a shrinkage of the principal in this manner, the trustee has, on each coupon date, deducted a portion of the interest collected on the bonds and credited the same to principal. It is calculated that at maturity the sum of the amounts thus taken from interest and credited to principal will equal the premium originally paid for the bonds. This deduction from interest is assigned by appellant as an unwarranted diminution of the income of the life tenant.

Whether a premium paid for securities purchased by a trustee for a trust estate should be charged against the principal or the income of the estate has never been decided in California, and upon this question we find the decisions in the other states in sharp conflict. Whatever view may be accepted, it is clear that some definite rule of action must be prescribed by this court and departures therefrom permitted only where the creator of the trust has given a clear and unmistakable direction to the contrary of that rule. The determination of the course to be pursued by trustees in such cases cannot be made wholly dependent upon the peculiar circumstances of each case as it arises, as has been attempted in some states. McLouth v. Hunt, 154 N. Y. 179, 48 N. E. 548, 39 L. R. A. 230; Hemenway v. Hemenway, 134 Mass. 446, 452; Shaw v. Cordis, 143 Mass. 443, 9 N. E. 794. Such attempt has proven unsatisfactory in these states, for the reason that in the majority of cases the creator of the trust fails to make specific provision for the contingency in question, and therefore, if the duty of the trustee in this particular be governed entirely by the intention to be ascertained from the instrument creating the trust or the circumstances surrounding the execution of that instrument, "no trustee will know how to safely act, and a question constantly arising in the administration of estates will be involved in great confusion and be the cause of great litigation." In re Stevens, 187 N. Y. 471, 80 N. E. 358, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 814, 10 Ann. Cas. 511; New England Trust Co. v. Eaton, 140 Mass. 532, 4 N. E. 69, 54 Am. Rep. 493.

[1] The decisions which hold that a premium must be charged wholly to the principal of the trust estate, which is the rule contended for by appellant, are based largely upon the reason that a premium is paid to secure safety of investment, as well as high interest, and that therefore the premium is for the benefit of the remainderman as well as the life tenant. There is also the argument that there is a possibility that the bonds may be sold before maturity and, owing to fluctuations in market value, may, when thus disposed of, bring more than the sum for which they were purchased, so that these matters are likely to balance themselves in time. Hite's Devisees v. Hite's Ex'r, 93 Ky. 257, 20 S. W. 778, 19 L. R. A. 173, 40 Am. St. Rep. 189; In re Penn-Gaskell's Estate, 208 Pa. 346, 57 Atl. 715. The weight of authority, however, and, we believe, the better view, is the rule finally adopted in New York in the case of In re Stevens, supra, to the effect that—

"In the absence of a clear direction in the will to the contrary, where investments are made by the trustee, the principal must be maintained intact from loss by payment of premium on securities having only a definite term to run."

This rule has been consistently followed in New York (Dexter v. Watson, 54 Misc. Rep. 484, 106 N. Y. Supp. 80; Furniss v. Cruikshank, 191 App. Div. 450, 181 N. Y. Supp. 522, 528), and has been adopted in New Jersey, Connecticut, and Wisconsin (Ballantine v. Young, 74 N. J. Eq. 572, 70 Atl. 668; Curtis v. Osborn, 79 Conn. 555, 65 Atl. 968; In re Wells, 156 Wis. 294, 144 N. W. 174). See note, 4 A. L. R. 1249.

A testator who creates a trust such as that in the instant case has two objects in view: First, the payment of the income arising from a fund to certain persons during lifetime; second, the transfer of that fund to certain individuals upon the death of the life tenants. The existence of a corpus, principal, or fund is an essential element of the trust, and the preservation of this principal until the termination of the life estates is indispensable to the fulfillment of the testator's plans. Therefore, any depletion of the principal tends to frustrate the fundamental purpose of the trust and should be avoided, and, where the price paid for a bond consists of more than the par value thereof, that method of accounting should be adopted which will prevent the impairment of the principal unless the testator has clearly directed to the contrary. Otherwise the life tenant who is entitled to receive only income, will, in effect, have received a part of the principal. In other words, where a premium is paid, the ostensible interest yielded by the bond cannot be considered entirely as interest on the face value of the bond, for a sum in excess of the face value has gone into the investment, and the amount of interest remains unchanged, resulting, necessarily, in a decreased rate of return. A portion of the nominal interest is therefore a repayment of the premium.

[2] This duty to restore to principal the total amount invested in the bonds cannot be evaded upon the theory that the bonds may, as a result of fluctuations in market value, be sold at higher prices than those for which they were purchased. A trustee is not permitted to buy and sell on speculation. The fluctuations in market value after purchase by the trustee are merely changes in the value of the assets of the trust estate, which are to be wholly disregarded in any accounting between life tenant and remainderman for funds from the trust estate invested in income-bearing property. In re Stevens, supra.

[3] The deduction from interest of the amount paid as premium is not a violation of sections 723 and 724 of the Civil Code, prohibiting accumulations of income except during minority and for the benefit of the minor. The entire net income from the bonds is distributed, for, as previously stated, a portion of the interest on the bonds is in reality return of a part of the principal invested therein to the corpus of the trust estate, in the same sense that sums of money are returned to principal when a loan is repaid in installments. The trustee is not withholding any part of the income for the purpose of investing it as new capital. Estate of Steele, 124 Cal. 533, 541, 57 Pac. 564.

[4] In the present case the testator has given no direction that the principal of the trust estate should bear the loss occasioned by the wearing away of premium. The bequest to appellant of three-fourths of the "entire net income" cannot be interpreted as such a direction, in view of the fact that part of the interest on the bonds is not, strictly speaking, income, but a return of capital. It is pointed out that the testator provided that no investments of trust funds should be made in bonds of the United States, "for the reason that said bonds yield too low a rate of interest." At the time of the hearing, United States Liberty bonds were yielding a higher rate of interest than many of the bonds of the trust estate after the deduction from their interest return of a proportionate part of the premium. This, it is urged by appellant, shows that no deduction should be made from the interest on the bonds of the trust estate, since the return to the life tenant would thereby be made lower than intended by the testator. This inference cannot be drawn from the provision in question, for any inference deduced from the provision in regard to United States bonds must be based upon the facts existing at the time the testator made the provision. At the time the will was executed and that the testator died, the year 1914, the interest on United States bonds was far lower than the lowest yield of any bonds of the trust estate after deductions on account of premium. The will contains the following provision:

"If at the end of any one year it shall appear that my said wife has not received an average of at least the sum of seven hundred and fifty ($750) dollars for each month of said year, * * * then and in that event said trustee shall resort to the personal property of the corpus of said trust estate, and thereout shall take sufficient to make up and pay over to my said wife a sum sufficient to make the aggregate receipts of my said wife the equivalent of seven hundred and fifty ($750) dollars for each month of said year." (Italics ours.)

Appellant's income from the estate has not fallen below the sum of $750 per month, but has far exceeded that minimum, and, consequently, the only contingency upon which the testator has authorized payments to the life tenant from the corpus of the trust estate has not arisen. The testator has not only not directed the charging of premium to principal, but has clearly indicated that the corpus is not to be resorted to unless the income falls below the specified minimum.

[5] The order appealed from made an allowance to the trustee of $500 as compensation to its attorney for legal services rendered by the latter upon a former appeal to the Supreme Court from an order settling the second annual account of the trusteee (Estate of Gartenlaub, 197 Pac. 90), and $250 for services rendered upon the hearing of the fourth annual account of the said trustee. It is contended that these matters constituted litigation between the life tenant and remaindermen which was not hostile to the trust itself and in which the participation of the trustee was gratuitous and uncalled for, and therefore that the trustee is not entitled to an allowance for attorney's fees. It is a general rule that trustees are entitled to reimbursement for expense incurred in good faith in the execution of the trust. Denvir v. Park, 169 Mo. App. 335, 152 S. W. 604. While the participation of a trustee in litigation between rival claimants not involving the execution of the trust would seem unwarranted, the present case does not present such a state of facts. The litigation arose upon the settling of the trustee's accounts, and concerned the interpretation of the instrument creating the trust and a determination of the proper mode of executing the trust. The trustee was therefore directly interested in its representative capacity, and was not without authority to employ a legal representative in the interests of the trust estate.

"The rule which has been applied in a great variety of cases affecting the administration and execution of trusts is that a trustee has a right, whenever necessary to the proper administration, preservation, and execution of the trust and the prosecution or defense of action, to employ counsel and to be reimbursed from the trust estate for whatever sums he has paid for the services of such counsel. The rule is applicable even though the cestui que trust employed counsel to represent the same interests, and although, to a certain extent, the private and personal interests of the trustee may also be involved in the litigation." 39 Cyc. 339.

It is immaterial that counsel for the trustee supported appellant's claim upon the hearing of the fourth account and later altered his position, maintaining on this appeal that the items representing a portion of the premium on bonds were correctly charged against income. The duty of the trustee and its counsel was to aid the court in deciding upon a correct administration of the trust funds, without regard to the conflicting claims of beneficiaries. If, upon the appeal, the order of the court below appeared to the trustee correct, it was the duty of the trustee to support that order.

[6] The $500 thus allowed the trustee for attorney's services rendered in the litigation, as well as an additional allowance for so-called "ordinary" services of attorneys in connection with the preparation and presentation of the annual account of the trustee, were ordered paid from the income of the trust estate. The reasonableness of the sums allowed is not questioned, but it is claimed that they should have been charged to principal rather than income. The decision of Cogswell v. Weston, 228 Mass. 219, 117 N. E. 37, lays down the following rule for the payment of the expenses incurred in the execution of a trust:

"The regular annual or periodically recurring expenses arising in the administration of a productive trust commonly are paid out of the income, while extraordinary and unusual expenses are chargeable against the capital. The costs of litigation generally fall in the latter class. These rules apply in cases where the question concerns life tenants and remaindermen, both guiltless of any wrong against the trust and where the point of incidence of proper expenses must be determined as between innocent persons."

The following cases hold that costs of litigation in connection with the execution of a trust are payable from the principal of the trust: In re Osborne, 209 N. Y. 450, 103 N. E. 723, 731, 823, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 510, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 298; In re Schaefer, 222 N. Y. 533, 118 N. E. 1076, affirmed 178 App. Div. 117, 165 N. Y. Supp. 19, 23. Where litigation becomes necessary to remove a doubt or ambiguity so as to insure the correct administration of the trust, the expense is an extraordinary charge, which, unless otherwise provided by the testator, should be borne by all parties. If the expense of litigation incident to the trust is paid from principal, the life tenant, as well as the remainderman, shares the burden, for in that event the life tenant is deprived of the interest on the sum taken from principal. However, expenses in regard to matters concerning the ordinary management of the trust, such as the preparation of annual accounts, are usually payable from income. Howe's Income and Principal, p. 67. That these ordinary expenses are to be paid from income in this case, at least, is clear from the fact that the will provided that the life tenants should have only the "net" income, thus indicating that all current expenses are to be deducted from income.

The order appealed from must be modified in accordance with the rule set forth in the immediately preceding paragraph; that is to say, the income must be credited and principal charged with the amount allowed to the trustee as compensation for its attorney for "extraordinary" services in connection with the execution of the trust. The trial court is directed to so modify the order, and when so modified the order will stand affirmed, without costs to either party upon this appeal.

Goudge, Robinson & Hughes, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The discussion in the opinion concerning the common-law rule on the subject of the direction of the extension of boundary lines into streams, lakes, or ponds, when the lands of different persons abut thereon and the rights of the landowners in or upon the water is involved, is wholly based upon the facts shown in the record on appeal. It was not intended to be a decision construing the terms of the Santa Monica charter on the subject. The charter in connection with the sections of the Political Code (sections 3901–3959) defining county boundaries, to which the charter refers, leaves it somewhat difficult to determine whether the boundaries do or do not extend into the ocean. We withhold any expression of opinion on that subject. The judgment of the superior court on the point involving this question is sustained on the other ground mentioned.

PEOPLE v. COFFEE et al. (Cr. 548.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 28, 1921. Rehearing Denied April 23, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 26, 1921.)

Burglary ⊂=4—Chicken house held a "house" under burglary statute.

Under Pen. Code. § 459, defining burglary, a chicken house, used for housing chickens, is a "house" within the statute; and it was immaterial that it may have been attached to skids so that it could be moved.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, House.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County: J. C. Needham, Judge.

John Coffee and another were convicted of burglary, and appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for new trial. Judgment and order affirmed.

L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for appellants.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The charging part of the information against the defendants was as follows:

"That said John Coffee and J. R. Hopkins on or about the 8th day of July, A. D. 1920, at and in said county of Stanislaus, state of California, prior to the filing of this information, did then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and burglariously enter the chicken house of one T. B. Michael, and upon the premises of the said Michael, located one half mile south of Hughson, on what is known as the Tully boulevard, in the county of Stanislaus, state of California, with the felonious intent then and there to commit the crime of larceny."

Section 459 of the Penal Code defines burglary as follows:

"Every person who enters any house, room, apartment, tenement, shop, warehouse, store, mill, barn, stable, outhouse, or other building, tent, vessel, railroad car, mine, or any underground portion thereof, with intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony is guilty of burglary."

One of the contentions of appellants is that the information does not charge the offense of burglary, inasmuch as it appears therein that the house was for the use of chickens, instead of human beings, the objection growing out of the common-law conception of burglary. At common law, as is well known, only the habitation of human beings could be the subject of the burglarious breaking and entry. It may be added that certain decisions of the courts in interpreting the meaning of the statutory definition of the offense have been greatly influenced by a consideration of what the crime meant at common law. People v. Richards, 108 N. Y. 137, 15 N. E. 371, 2 Am. St. Rep. 373.

But in this state the courts have clearly distinguished between the common-law and the statutory definition, and have pointed out that the latter is much more comprehensive than the former. People v. Stickman, 34 Cal. 242; People v. Barry, 94 Cal. 481, 29 Pac. 1026.

In the latter case it was said:

"It will thus be seen that common-law burglary and the statutory burglary of this state have but few elements in common, and consequently English cases give us but little light upon the question under examination."

The Stickman Case, supra, holds that burglary may be committed by the entry of a chicken house, and the decision is directly opposed to the contention of appellants herein. There it is said:

"While the language of the statute might have been made more definite and certain by employing words in common use, it could not well be made more comprehensive, and we think that the absence of more particular terms of description indicates an intention on the part of the Legislature to include every kind of buildings or structures 'housed in,' or roofed, regardless of the fact whether they are at the time, or ever have been, inhabited by members of the human family. A house, in the sense of the statute, is any structure which has walls on all sides, and is covered by a roof."

Accordingly, the Supreme Court held that it was not error for the trial court in that case to refuse to give the following instruction:

"The breaking and entering, to constitute a burglary, must be into a house, room, apartment, or tenement, or a tent, vessel, or water craft, usually used, or at any time used, as a sleeping place or residence for human beings, or wherein some person dwells, or persons dwell and lie in. If the jury find from the evidence that the chicken house which the defendant is charged with having feloniously entered was at any time used as a sleeping place or residence for human beings, or wherein some persons dwell, or persons dwell and lie in, and they also find that defendant feloniously entered with intent to commit grand or petit larceny, or any felony, they will find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment. If they do not so find from the evidence, they will acquit the defendant."

Other cases from various jurisdictions are in harmony with the foregoing. In Williams v. State, 105 Ga. 814, 32 S. E. 129, 70 Am. St. Rep. 82, the defendant was charged with entering a chicken house and stealing therefrom certain pigeons. The prosecutor testified that—"He had a large number of pigeons in a coop, from which a number were stolen. In describing the coop he testified that it was a chicken house; that the house was made of wire, and was about eight feet tall, two stories, covered with shingles; that while he called it a coop, it was really a chicken house; that it was nailed to the fence; it could not be moved about; that the posts that held it were not in the ground, but that the structure was stationary."

The Supreme Court held that the structure was a building within the meaning of the section of the Penal Code defining burglary. It is true that said structure was nailed to the fence, but it is difficult to see how it could have been any the less a house or building if it had been on "skids," and therefore movable with less difficulty.

In Gillock v. People, 171 Ill. 307, 49 N. E. 712, it was also held that a "chicken house" was a building that could be burglariously entered, the court saying:

"The purpose of the Legislature in passing the foregoing section of our statute was to radically change the common law as to the crime of burglary, and make those who burglariously enter other buildings than a mansion or dwelling house guilty of that crime."

In Favro v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 452, 46 S. W. 932, 73 Am. St. Rep. 950, it was held that "a tent or structure made by placing two forked mesquite poles, about seven feet high, into the ground, with a ridge pole thereon, and stretching over this a wagon sheet, the ends of which are brought down to the ground and nailed on each side to planks nailed to stakes in the ground, the east end of the structure being boxed up with boards, with a door and some boxes, with the wagon sheet tied over them, close up to the west end," was a "building" within the contemplation of the Penal Code.

Other decisions are collated in Words and Phrases (1st Ed.) under the term "House," vol. 4, p. 3351, most of which are in line with the foregoing. Those apparently in favor of the contention of appellants represent somewhat different facts from what are found herein, and they require no specific notice.

At any rate, the law in this state was correctly set forth in the following instruction of the trial court:

"This jury is instructed that, if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty in this case, that the building described in the information was an inclosed building, about 6 feet long and 5 feet wide, with a height of 6 feet on one side and 4 feet on the other, covered with a roof, and that the building was constructed with doors to be used in entering the building, and was used by the complaining witness as a building within which to keep his chickens, then I instruct you that that chicken house would constitute a building as contemplated by our statute defining burglary, to wit: Section 459 of the Penal Code, even though said chicken house may not have had any floor, and may have been attached to skids so that the same could be moved, if you should so find."

To this instruction, in addition to the contention that such a structure does not constitute a house or building within the meaning of said section, appellants make the further objection that it is obnoxious to the constitutional provision forbidding judges from charging juries as to questions of fact. In this appellants are in error. The instruction did not assume the existence of any of the component elements of the structure, but it declared what the legal conclusion must be if certain facts were shown by the testimony. It is true that there is no conflict in the evidence as to the size and character of said building and, therefore it would have been without prejudice if the court had declared what they were. But what the court really did was to define or explain one of the important terms used in the definition of burglary, as it was necessary to have it explained in order that the jury might apply it to the evidence in the case. It was no more an invasion of the province of the jury than for the court to tell them, that if they believed a burglary was committed between sunset and sunrise it was burglary of the first degree. The only difference is that what constitutes burglary in the first degree is defined in the statute, whereas the definition of the term building, or house, must be sought in the dictionary and decisions of the courts. The instruction, it may be added, contained a proper conception of the term, according to said authorities. Undoubtedly, the court might have defined the term in the abstract, might have stated, for instance, in the language of the Supreme Court that "a house, in the sense of the statute, is any structure which has walls on all sides and is covered by a roof," but the concrete form adopted by the court was more easily understood and applied. The jury might well have complained if the court had failed to state the meaning of the term as fixed by the authorities in reference to those elements of the structure that were established by the evidence. As laymen, they would be supposed to understand the meaning of the term "house" as used in common parlance, but they needed the assistance of the court to understand the word as a part of the legal terminology of the case.

In view of the fact, as before stated, that the evidence as to the building was without conflict, it would not have been prejudicially erroneous for the court to instruct the jury that said structure was a house, as contemplated by said section of the Penal Code. Willis v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 168, 25 S. W. 1119.

From the foregoing it follows that the trial court committed no error in refusing certain instructions proposed by defendants, which were similar to one another, of which the following is an example:

"You are further instructed that if the alleged chicken house was portable, and made for the express purpose of being carried from place to place for the purpose of holding chickens, and was constructed on skids, and was not used or intended to be used for any purpose connected with habitation, or other purpose for which houses are ordinarily used, then you cannot convict the defendants of burglary."

The other refused instructions proposed by defendants, as far as correct in principle, were fully covered by the charge of the court.

There is no merit in the contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. It is a fair inference from the showing made that the owner of the premises, being aroused by the barking of a dog between 12 and 1 o'clock at night, went from his residence to the chicken house, a distance of some 300 feet and he found the defendants a short distance therefrom, having in their possession certain chickens which were accustomed to roost in said structure. There was evidence also that certain human tracks were found in the chicken house which corresponded with the tracks made by the defendants where they were apprehended by said owner. Indeed, without further specification of the evidence, we may say that there can be no reasonable doubt that the charge was fully sustained.

We find no error in the record, and as the defendants seem to have been fairly tried and justly convicted, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem.; HART, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Appellants in their petition for rehearing contend that this court misunderstood their position in stating that—

"One of the contentions of appellants is that the information does not charge the offense of burglary, inasmuch as it appears that the house was for the use of chickens instead of human beings, the objection growing out of the common-law conception of burglary."

They state in their petition that—

"What the appellants intended to convey was that there is no such term used in the statute defining burglary as chicken house, and that in arriving at the question whether or not the structure designated as chicken house came within the terms defining burglary, that it either had to come under the term 'house' or 'other building.' The question of whether or not it was inhabited or occupied by human beings is not raised by appellants."

We willingly accord to appellants the benefit of this explanation of their position, but we are satisfied that it can make no difference in the result of the appeal. The term "house" is used in the statute, and the addition of the qualifying expression "chicken" does not detract from the force of the information in stating the offense of burglary. Whether it was a "house" in contemplation of the statute was a matter of proof to be presented at the trial. We are still entirely satisfied that such proof met the conditions of the statutory requirement, and we think no satisfactory reason has been shown why the cause should be reheard.

The petition is therefore denied.

In re PINNELL'S GUARDIANSHIP.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. April 5, 1921.)

1. Parent and child ⟸2(3)—Court may award custody to either parent under such regulations and conditions as it may require.

In awarding the custody of a minor, the court is to be guided by its consideration of the child's best interests as to temporal, mental, and moral welfare, and, as between parents, neither is entitled to custody as of right, and, other things being equal, the child, being of tender years, should be given to the mother (Civ. Code, § 246); and, where father and mother are separated without being divorced, the court may grant the custody to either for such time and under such regulations as the case may require, under section 214.

2. Parent and child ⟸2(4) — Decree, after hearing and observing witnesses, that mother is qualified to care for minor daughter upheld.

Where a father and mother were not divorced and the father sought the custody of a minor daughter, and the trial court heard all the testimony and saw and observed the witnesses, its mandate, giving the custody to the mother, should be followed.

3. Parent and child ⟸2(4)—Decree as to custody that both parents give bond that minor remain in jurisdiction held proper.

Where, on the father's application, custody of a child was awarded to the mother, with provision that the father could visit it, the direction that both should give a bond, conditioned that the minor should not be removed from the jurisdiction of the court, is a reasonable regulation, authorized by Civ. Code, § 214.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. F. McCormick, Judge.

In the matter of the guardianship of the person and estate of Mildred Bernice Pinnell, a minor, wherein John H. Pinnell, her father, applied for guardianship, which was opposed by Erma M. Pinnell, his wife, mother of said minor, and from an order granting custody to the child's mother, giving the father permission to visit his daughter at reasonable times, and placing both under bond not to take the minor out of the county, the petitioner appeals. Order affirmed.

A. M. Drew, of Fresno, for appellant.
Henry Hawson, of Fresno, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. John H. Pinnell, the petitioner and appellant in this matter, sought to be appointed guardian of the person and estate of Mildred Bernice Pinnell, the three year old daughter of himself and Erma M. Pinnell, his wife. At the time the application was made the minor was in the care of the mother, who, the petitioner alleged, was an unfit and improper person to have the custody of the child. These accusations were denied by the mother. The trial court found that the petitioner and respondent are husband and wife, living in a state of separation, but not divorced. It determined that both parents are fit and proper persons to have the care and custody of the minor, and that neither has any right superior to the other in that regard while they continue to live separate and apart. It determined that it would be for the best interests of the minor that she be placed, and remain, in the custody of the mother. It made an order to that effect, and directed Mrs. Pinnell to file an undertaking in the sum of $2,000 conditioned that she would not take, or permit the child to be taken, from the county of Fresno. The father was granted permission to visit his daughter at all reasonable times, and to have her in his exclusive custody during suitable hours of the day not to exceed two days in each week, provided that he should file an undertaking in the sum of $1,000, payable to Mrs. Pinnell, conditioned that he could not take, nor permit the child to be taken, from the county of Fresno. From this order the petitioner has appealed.

The appellant specifies several errors as grounds for this appeal, none of which we find of sufficient merit to warrant a reversal of the judgment of the lower court.

It appears from the record that petitioner and respondent married in Fresno in 1916. The child was born in December of that year. Two years later the parties went to reside in the state of Washington, the petitioner later going to Wyoming, where he was employed in the oil fields, and where the mother and child joined him. The father's employment took him away from home for long periods. In the latter part of 1919, while petitioner was absent at his work, the respondent with the little girl, in company with a woman friend and her three children, removed from her home in Glenrock to a cabin some 35 miles in the country. Here the petitioner found her some time later, living, he claims, in improper relations with one Safford. The child, at the time, according to the petitioner's testimony, was in an unkempt and neglected condition. Petitioner was accompanied by a deputy sheriff, who had a warrant for Safford's arrest, charging him with adultery committed with Mrs. Pinnell. There was introduced upon the hearing in the court below the record of a judgment of conviction of Safford in the justice court of Converse county, Wyo., from which it appears that Safford pleaded guilty to the charge and was fined and sentenced to a term in the county jail.

Petitioner took the little girl, and at the request of Mrs. Pinnell, she was allowed to accompany him back to their home. The parties then appear to have separated, the father taking the child to the home of his parents in the state of Washington. Some time later Mrs. Pinnell went to Washington, and in the absence of her husband filed a petition in the superior court of Pacific county for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that her husband had failed for more than a year to support either herself or their child. The little girl was placed by the court temporarily in the custody of the probation officer, but, pending final determination of the habeas corpus proceedings in the Supreme Court of Washington, the mother obtained possession of her and brought her back to Fresno county in this state. The father followed, and initiated this guardianship proceeding. In addition to the foregoing testimony, a number of witnesses testified as to the general reputation of Mrs. Pinnell for morality and chastity while she resided in Wyoming, stating it was bad. Another witness testified that Mrs. Pinnell and Safford behaved in an improper manner.

Mrs. Pinnell appears to have made no effort to refute the testimony of the witnesses who testified to her bad character while she lived in Wyoming. She did, however, deny the specific allegation of improper conduct with Safford, and introduced testimony of a number of witnesses to the effect that since she returned to this state and resided in Fresno her behavior and her reputation are good, and counsel for petitioner in open court admitted this to be the fact.

[1] In awarding the custody of a minor the court is to be guided in its consideration by what appears to be for the best interests of the child in respect to its temporal, mental, and moral welfare. As between parents adversely claiming custody, neither is entitled to its as of right. Other things being equal, the child being of tender years, it should be given to the mother. Section 246, Civ. Code. When, as in the instant case, the husband and wife live in a state of separation without being divorced, the court has power to award the custody of the minor child of such parents to either for such time and under such regulations as the case may require. Section 214, Civ. Code. The child's welfare should be the controlling consideration in such matters. In re Campbell's Estate, 130 Cal. 382, 383, 62 Pac. 613.

[2] The marital relations of the appellant and respondent appear to have been most unhappy, jealousy and discontent, perhaps, lending color to accusations made by each against the other in the present proceeding. In view of the broad powers vested in the chancellor in providing for the custody of children, particularly those of tender years, and of deciding such matters in the manner, in his opinion, which conduces most to the welfare of the child, we think it very rarely happens that an abuse of discretion will be found. In the instant case the trial court seems to have been patient and to have allowed the parties ample opportunity to produce all the testimony they had at hand. The petitioner, contestant, and little girl were before him. After such hearing and personal observation, he has entered a decree which on its face is in keeping with the consideration which must govern in such matters. In a case of this kind, as in others, there may well be a locus penitentia. Where the present conduct of the mother satisfies the court that the child of tender years may safely be committed to her care, the mandate of the section should be followed. In re Mash, 28 Cal. App. 692, 153 Pac. 961.

[3] The provisions in the order as to the custody of the child, and the direction of the lower court that each of the parties should give a bond conditioned that the minor should not be removed from the jurisdiction of the court, is reasonable regulation authorized by section 214, Civil Code of California. Cole v. Superior Court, 28 Cal. App. 1, 4, 151 Pac. 169.

The order is affirmed.

We concur: KERRIGAN, J.; RICHARDS, J.

ARMSTRONG v. SACRAMENTO VALLEY REALTY CO. et al. (Civ. 2227.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 28, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 26, 1921.)

1. Compromise and settlement ⟸20(1)—Notice in writing of additional appraiser lists held waived.

Where a compromise agreement provided that one party should be paid by the other parties a certain sum in cash and a further specified sum in lands at a certain value to be ascertained by means of an appraisement, and that each side should select 15 names of proposed appraisers, placing the names in sealed envelopes, and that, if three names were found to be common to both lists, these three should be the appraisers, and, in carrying out this provision, three names were found to be common to both lists, but one of the three appraisers refused to act, the fact that when the stakeholder went to the representative of the parties who were to make the payment, and demanded the selection of additional lists for the purpose of choosing another appraiser, such parties declined to submit them on the ground that the agreement made no provision for additional lists in such case, amounted to a waiver of a written notice.

2. Specific performance ⟸114(2)—Complaint held sufficiently to plead consideration.

In action to specifically enforce a contract of compromise, the complaint of the party to be paid under the compromise agreement sufficiently alleged an adequate consideration for the agreement where it contained a direct statement or averment that the other parties thereto did receive an adequate consideration, and in addition contained in its allegations an affirmative showing that they all received an adequate consideration, and that as to them the agreement was just.

3. Compromise and settlement ⟸6(3)—Compromise of litigation held adequate consideration.

Where one of the parties to a compromise agreement was a party to the litigation settled by such agreement, the compromise of such litigation was not only a valuable, but an adequate, consideration for her obligation; it being immaterial whether her obligation was primarily her own or was entered into in behalf of some of her co-obligors.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⟸39—Agreement of vendor to procure consent of wife to execution of conveyances does not render contract void.

A contract wherein one of the parties agrees that he will procure the consent of his wife to the execution of certain conveyances therein provided to be made is not void, although, under Civ. Code, § 3390, it might be a contract that could not be specifically enforced.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⟸8—Vendor may agree to convey lands owned at the time by another.

One may agree to convey lands which at the time of contracting are owned by another, it being presumed that the contracting party is advised that he can at the proper moment procure the title or procure the holder thereof to make or join in the proper conveyance.

6. Specific performance ⟸10(1) — Contract may be enforced in part.

That legal title was outstanding as to part of the property sued for, was not a complete defense, but plaintiff would be entitled, in any event, to specific performance as to such portion of the property as stood in the names of defendants or any of them.

7. Compromise and settlement ⟸11—Failure of contract providing for appraisal to provide for selection of another appraiser in case one already selected refused to act held immaterial.

Where a compromise agreement provided for payment in part in land to be valued by an appraisement, each side to select fifteen names of proposed appraisers, and if three names were found to be common to both lists, these three to be the appraisers, the contract was not ineffective because failing to provide a method of selecting an alternate in place of an appraiser so selected who refused to act; for, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1636, 1643, 1655, it would be assumed that a vacancy arising from such a refusal to act should be filled in a manner provided in the contract for filling other vacancies, namely, by resort to additional lists of fifteen names submitted by each side, such fixing of values being merely a means to an end, and not of itself a vital part of the agreement; and in such a case the refusal of one set of parties to the contract to join in the selection of a third appraiser justified the trial court, sitting as a court of equity, in itself fixing the values and affording such parties an opportunity to complete the transaction upon the values thus fixed.

8. Specific performance ⟸128(1) — Monetary relief may be granted.

Where, through no fault of plaintiff, specific performance cannot be decreed, the court, if it has jurisdiction, will grant, as an alternative, monetary relief, which, in an action strictly at law, would be by way of damages.

9. Compromise and settlement ⟸20(2)—Interest allowed from breach of agreement.

On defendants' breach of a compromise agreement by refusing further to perform and by declaring to plaintiff that further performance was impossible, plaintiff was entitled to interest from the date of such breach.

10. Specific performance ⟸128(1) — Money judgment held proper.

In action for specific performance of a compromise agreement, where the court had extended to defendants an opportunity to convey in accordance with the agreement, of which opportunity they declined to avail themselves, the court thereupon properly afforded relief by way of a money judgment for the sum provided in the agreement to be paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by W. S. Armstrong against the Sacramento Valley Realty Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 185 Pac. 874.

Claude F. Purkitt and W. T. Belieu, both of Willows (Courtney L. Moore, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Frank Freeman and George Freeman, both of Willows, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and respondent and against the appellants in an action brought against them to enforce the terms of a contract dated on April 27, 1917. Though the record in the case is somewhat voluminous, the actual matters in dispute may be brought down to a very narrow compass.

On December 6, 1910, the respondent and other persons owned 1,251 shares of the capital stock of Armstrong-Quatman Company, a corporation, and the appellant Mrs. Quatman owned the remaining 1,249 shares. On said day said corporation entered into a contract with the appellant Sacramento Valley Realty Company, a corporation, whereby Armstrong-Quatman Company sold to the latter corporation certain tracts of land situated in the counties of Glenn and Colusa for the agreed price of $25,000, payable in small installments.

The appellants C. L. Donohoe, A. H. Quatman, and H. J. Barceloux were stockholders in the Sacramento Valley Realty Company, and they made themselves parties to said contract of December 6, 1910. Divers differences having arisen among the parties, the respondent commenced an action against the parties to the contract. In this action Mrs. Quatman became an intervener, asserting by way of intervention that she had an interest in the proceeds of the sale as owner of 1,249 shares of stock. Judgment went against all the defendants therein and the intervener, and they all appealed the case to the Supreme Court. The action of that tribunal is reported in 179 Cal. 648, 178 Pac. 516.

[1] While that appeal was pending the parties got together on the terms of a proposed compromise. These terms were embodied in a lengthy agreement dated April 27, 1917, which agreement constitutes the foundation of the present action. It will be seen that Mrs. Quatman, claiming, as she did, practically one-half the proceeds of sale to arise from the earlier contract, was vitally interested in the outcome of the compromise agreement. This compromise agreement provided substantially that the various suits pending between the parties, some 20 in all, should be dismissed; that the appellants herein should pay to the respondent the sum of $5,000 in cash and a further sum of $12,796.01 in lands at a certain value to be ascertained by means of an appraisement. It is out of the provisions for this appraisement that most of the points on this appeal arise. The agreement provides that each side should select fifteen names of proposed appraisers, placing the names in sealed envelopes, and that if three names were found to be common to both lists, these three should be the appraisers. No specific provision was inserted in the agreement for the selection of an alternate in case one of the three should refuse to act, although it was provided that, if three names were not found to be common, then additional lists of fifteen names should be prepared until the requisite number was thus obtained. Three names were found to be common to both lists, but one of the three appraisers refused to act. The agreement provides that such additional lists should be prepared on two days' notice in writing, and no such written notice was given. However, the stakeholder went to the representative of the appellants and demanded the selection of additional lists, but the appellants declined to submit them on the ground or claim that the agreement made no provision for additional lists in such case. This amounted to a waiver of a written notice, since such claim demonstrated that a more formal notice would have been unavailing. The respondent promptly prepared his additional list. The appellants contended, and on this appeal contend, that the omission of the agreement to make specific provision for supplying the place of an appraiser who refused to act rendered the entire agreement incapable of performance and consequently null and void. No claim was made by any of the appellants prior to the commencement of this suit, so far as the record informs us, that the agreement was inequitable, unjust, or unconscionable, nor that the money agreed to be paid was not justly due. It is a case where the litigants withhold both the land and the money and refuse to submit a list of appraisers on the plea that it is not so nominated in the agreement.

[2] All the appellants make the point that the complaint does not show that they received adequate consideration for their undertaking, and that as to them it is equitable and just. While the appellants devote much space in their briefs to this point, it is sufficient to say that the complaint contains a direct statement or averment that they did receive an adequate consideration, and, moreover, contains in its many allegations an affirmative showing that the appellants and each of them received an adequate consideration, and that as to them the agreement is just. No more is required. No more could be stated.

[3] The appellant Letitia Beretta Quatman makes the further point that, while the complaint may show that the agreement is equitable and just and founded on an adequate consideration as to the other appellants, yet as to her it fails to do so. But she was a party to this litigation—the very controversy that resulted in the compromise agreement. She had intervened in the principal suit and had appealed from an adverse judgment therein. The compromise of the litigation in which she had so vital an interest was not only a valuable, but an adequate, consideration for her obligation, and it matters not whether her obligation was primarily her own or was entered into in behalf of some of her co-obligors. In this view of the matter, the complaint shows that the consideration for her obligation was adequate. It does not seem to be seriously disputed that such consideration may be sufficiently shown by the general allegations of the complaint; but any doubt on the subject is fully settled by the following extract from a late opinion:

"It is not necessary, however, that the complaint for specific enforcement should declare, in the very words of the Code, that there was 'an adequate consideration for the contract' and that it was 'just and reasonable.' * * * The proper mode of pleading is to set forth the facts from which the court may conclude that the contract is supported by an adequate consideration and is, as to the defendant, fair and just." Magee v. Magee, 174 Cal. 276, 162 Pac. 1023.

[4-6] 2. The appellants insist that the agreement is void for the reason that C. L. Donohoe contracts therein that he will procure the consent of his wife to the execution of certain conveyances therein provided to be made. But, first, such a provision does not render a contract void, although it might be a contract that could not be specifically enforced (section 3390, Civ. Code); and, secondly, in this case the appellant Donohoe has entered into no such stipulation. There is a provision in the agreement that a conveyance from her would be sufficient. It is in no way unlawful for a party to agree to convey lands which at the time of contract are owned by another. In such case it is presumed that the contracting party is advised that he can at the proper moment procure the title or procure the holder thereof to make or join in the proper conveyance; but in any view that is his own affair. He is none the less answerable for his breach, even though he may have placed himself in a position where he cannot comply with the terms of his contract. This principle is a complete answer to the claim of appellants that the respondent cannot maintain this action because he knew at the time of contract that the appellants did not own the property involved. However, it is not shown that he knew this, although it is shown that at least a portion of the legal title stood in the names of others. But respondent was nevertheless entitled, in any event, to specific performance as to such portion of the property as may have stood in the names of appellants or any of them. Farnum v. Clarke, 148 Cal. 610, 84 Pac. 166.

3. Complaint is made that the court found without sufficient evidence that Frank Freeman had executed a certain quitclaim deed, but neither party is complaining that this deed was not executed, neither party assigns this is a breach, and neither party is injured by the finding. The delivery of such a deed was preliminary to the payment of the first or initial check of $5,000, and neither party complains that this check was not delivered, nor does either party set out its delivery or nondelivery in their pleadings as a breach. The whole matter is unimportant.

[7] 4. Other points urged, save one, are unimportant, and they require no special attention. This one excepted point is the failure of the agreement to provide a method of selecting an alternate in place of an appraiser refusing to act. The appellants boldly insist that this condition blocks the enforcement of the agreement, although they make no pretense of controverting the justice of the respondent's claim to the land or money. The agreement to select three names from the lists of fifteen necessarily implied the names of persons who would be willing to act. This is not a violent nor an unreasonable interpretation of the agreement. It is fundamental that a contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contract. Section 1636, Civ. Code. It must receive such an interpretation as will make it lawful, operative, definite, reasonable, and capable of being carried into effect, if this can be done without violating the intention of the parties, as such intention existed at the time of contract. Section 1643, Civ. Code. Stipulations which are necessary to make a contract reasonable are implied. Section 1655, Civ. Code. In the light of these obvious principles of interpretation, no embarrassment is encountered in holding that a vacancy arising from the refusal of an appraiser to act should be filled in the manner provided in the contract for filling other vacancies, to wit, by resort to additional lists of fifteen names submitted by each side. If this is a correct view, then the appellants committed a breach of the agreement when they refused upon request to submit additional lists. If this view is open to question, then we have a condition where, owing to the incompleteness of the agreement, no method of carrying it into effect is provided, and equity can adopt the method most in harmony with the covenants of the parties. In either view, the court was authorized to entertain the action and to render equitable relief.

The selection of the appraisers was merely a means to an end and is not of itself a vital part of the agreement. It was no more than a method of selecting unbiased appraisers. The court is an unbiased appraiser, and under the authorities is competent to appraise the land. As said by the Supreme Court of Washington in the case of Cogswell v. Cogswell, 70 Wash. 178, 126 Pac. 431:

"The matter in suit having been settled by the solemnly executed contract of the parties, that contract having been partly performed on both sides, the failure to arbitrate relating only to a nonessential incident, not giving ground for a rescission, it follows that the appellants have mistaken their remedy. They should have applied to the court for the enforcement of the contract by fixing the price of the land."

And quoting from another case:

"In such a case the courts hold that the matter of determining the price is matter of form, rather than of substance; and if it becomes evident that it cannot be determined in the manner provided for in the contract, by reason of the refusal of one party to do what in equity he ought to do, the court will determine it upon the application of the other." Town of Bristol v. Bristol Waterworks, 19 R. I. 413, 34 Atl. 359, 32 L. R. A. 740.

To substantially the same effect are Cooke v. Miller, 25 R. I. 92, 54 Atl. 927, 1 Ann. Cas. 30, and Grosvenor v. Flint, 20 R. I. 21, 37 Atl. 304. In Parsons v. Ambos, 121 Ga. 98, 48 S. E. 696, the umpire died, and the court itself determined the values. The court said:

"So, too, in contracts of sale the parties may stipulate * * * that the value of the property shall be ascertained by appraisers before either has the right to sue. This fixing of values, however, is a mere incident and not of the substance of the contract. It rather serves the office of evidence, than of a finding which construes the contract or determines rights."

[8] We entertain no doubt that the refusal of the appellants to join in the selection of a third appraiser justifies the trial court, sitting as a court of equity, to take the matter in hand and itself fix the values and and afford the appellants an opportunity to complete the transaction upon the values thus fixed. Upon their failure so to do, it is well settled that the court could grant, as an alternative, a judgment for monetary relief. Our Supreme Court says:

"And, finally, it is indisputable that where, through no fault of the plaintiff in equity, specific performance cannot be decreed, the court, having obtained jurisdiction of the subject-matter properly within its cognizance, will grant as an alternative monetary relief, which in an action strictly at law would be by way of damages." Messer v. Hibernia S. & L. Soc., 149 Cal. 122, 84 Pac. 835.

[9] 5. The court allowed the respondent interest on the sum found due, or rather on the sum admitted to be due, from July 1, 1917. At or about this date the appellants committed a breach of the agreement by refusing further to perform and by declaring to the respondent that further performance was impossible. From that date the respondent was entitled to interest.

[10] 6. The court extended to the appellants an opportunity to convey, of which opportunity they declined to avail themselves. The court thereupon afforded relief by way of a money judgment for the sum provided in the agreement to be paid. This method of procedure is open to no objection, and is in harmony with the usual practice.

We find no error in the record and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

ELLIS v. CHAMBERS, State Controller, et al. (Civ. 2208.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 5, 1920.)

Mandamus ⊂⊃14(3)—Writ denied, where respondents are willing to do acts desired.

Application for a writ of mandate, to be directed to the state controller and state treasurer, requiring them to credit proceeds of certain checks to "the proper state highway fund," will be denied, where it appears that respondents have at all times been willing, and are still willing, to credit any payments received on account of any co-operative projects to any funds lawfully designated by the state engineering department.

Application by W. R. Ellis for writ of mandate, to be directed to John S. Chambers, as Controller of the State of California, and Friend W. Richardson, as Treasurer of the State of California, requiring them to credit proceeds of certain checks to "the proper state highway fund." Writ denied.

Dunn & Brand, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robt. T. McKisick, Deputy Atty. Gen. (C. C. Carleton and James L. Atteridge, both of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondents.

PER CURIAM. It appears to the court in this proceeding that the respondents have at all times been willing, and are now ready and willing, to credit any payments received from the general government on account of any co-operative projects to any fund or funds as may be lawfully designated by the state engineering department.

It follows that no writ of mandate should issue herein; and it is so ordered.

NEW RICHMOND LAND CO. v. IVANOVICH. (Civ. 3738.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⊂⊃84—Provision giving vendor right to forfeit payments in event of default does not give purchaser option to abandon contract.

Where a contract for the purchase of land on installments provided that in event of the purchaser's default the vendor might forfeit all rights under the agreement and retain amounts paid, the provision was one clearly for the benefit of the vendor giving him an option, but the purchaser has no option which will allow him to abandon the contract on pain of forfeiture of installments paid.

2. Evidence ⊂⊃461(1)—Parol evidence inadmissible, where written contract is definite.

Where a written contract for the purchase of lands on installments was definite and gave the purchaser no right to abandon on pain of forfeiting payments made, parol evidence offered for the purpose of showing that the parties intended the purchaser should have the right to abandon is inadmissible, in view of Civ. Code, § 1639.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by the New Richmond Land Company against Martin Ivanovich. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ralph L. Hathorn, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Faulkner & Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover a balance alleged to be due under a contract by the terms of which the defendant agreed to purchase from the plaintiff certain lots of land in the city of Richmond, the purchase price to be paid in monthly installments. Defendant made a number of such payments, and then abandoned the contract, whereupon the present action was brought to recover the balance of such installments.

In support of his appeal the defendant contends that, according to the terms of the contract entered into between the plaintiff and himself, in the event that he should fail to make the specified payments, the only remedy of his vendor was the retention by him of the amount of money already paid on the purchase price, the respective rights and obligations of the parties being thereby terminated, which excluded any right on the part of the vendor to recover any unpaid balance. The provision of the contract upon which this claim of the appellant is predicated reads as follows:

"The due performance of all covenants and agreements on the part of the buyer is a condition precedent whereon depends the performance of the agreements on the part of the seller. In the event of a failure of the buyer to comply with the covenants and agreements, or any part thereof, on his part entered into, the seller shall be released from all obligations in law or equity to transfer and convey said property, or any part thereof, and the buyer shall forfeit all rights under this agreement, and all rights to any and all moneys which he shall theretofore have paid hereunder, as liquidated damages for such default, and not as a penalty."

[1] We are unable to concur in appellant's construction of this provision of the contract. It is clearly one intended for the benefit of the vendor by which, at his option, in the event of the vendee's default, he is relieved of his obligation to convey the lots sold, and may regard as forfeited all payments theretofore made by the vendee, or, waiving the forfeiture, he may require the vendee to complete his contract. The vendee is given no option, but must abide by the election of the vendor. Smith v. Mohn, 87 Cal. 489, 25 Pac. 696; North Stockton v. Fischer, 138 Cal. 100, 70 Pac. 1082, 71 Pac. 438; Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Shenners v. Pritchard, 104 Wis. 287, 80 N. W. 458.

In Wilcoxson v. Stitt, 65 Cal. 596, 4 Pac. 629, 52 Am. Rep. 310, where a similar contract was under review, it was held that under a contract for the sale of land, in which the vendee agrees to pay a balance of the purchase money on or before a certain date, and the vendor agrees to convey upon such payment, and which provides that if the vendee shall fail to make such payment he shall forfeit all right to the land, and the vendor shall be released from all obligations to convey, "and the agreement shall be void," if the vendee neglects or refuses to pay the vendor has the option to avoid or enforce the contract, and may, if he so elects, sue and recover the unpaid balance of the purchase money.

The instant case is distinguishable from the case of Beckwith Land Co. v. Allison, 26 Cal. App. 473, 147 Pac. 482, and other cases relied upon by the appellant. Here, as we have seen, it was optional with the plaintiff whether he should declare the amounts paid forfeited, or should insist upon performance of the contract; while in the cases relied upon by the appellant the contract unconditionally provide that upon failure of the purchaser to comply with the conditions to be performed by him a certain sum was to be forfeited as damages for his nonfulfillment of those conditions. In such a situation it is plain, as stated in those cases, that the purchaser has an option to purchase without any obligation beyond the fact that he is subject to the loss of his forfeit money if he does not complete the transaction.

[2] Finally, we think the court properly excluded parol evidence offered for the purpose of showing that the parties intended that the purchaser should have the right to abandon the contract at any time upon suffering the loss of payments already made. Here the contract is free from uncertainty or ambiguity, and, accordingly, the intention of the parties, must be ascertained from the formal agreement. See Civ. Code, § 1639; Payne v. Com. Nat. Bank, 177 Cal. 68, 169 Pac. 1007, L. R. A. 1918C, 328.

BOZARTH v. BIRCH. (Civ. 3671.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 24, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 23, 1921.)

1. Fraud ⟸34—Rescission essential to recovery for undue influence.

In an action for damages based solely on defendant's exercise of undue influence over plaintiff in the procurement of a contract whereby plaintiff, who had lent to the corporation in which defendant was stockholder and director, surrendered his notes and stock, the complaint, not averring rescission of the contract, did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

2. Fraud ⟸34—Rescission held not essential to attack on surrender of notes and stock by one unduly influenced and deceived.

In an action sounding in fraud by plaintiff against defendant stockholder and director in the corporation to which plaintiff had lent, on account of defendant's having induced plaintiff to surrender his notes of the corporation and stock, complaint held not based wholly or chiefly on defendant's undue influence over plaintiff, so as to necessitate rescission before suit, but to sound in fraud, consisting in the fraudulent design and false representation of defendant whereby plaintiff was induced to part with his notes and stock without adequate consideration.

3. Fraud ⟸31—Defrauded party may rescind or sue for damages.

One defrauded has the choice of remedies, either to disaffirm the contract through its rescission, or to affirm it and sue for damages.

4. Fraud ⟸11(1)—Misrepresentations as to insolvency of corporation statements of fact.

Defendant stockholder and director's alleged misrepresentations to plaintiff lender to the company, to induce him to surrender his notes and stock, as to the insolvency of the corporation and its imminent danger of bankruptcy, held statements of fact based on defendant's superior knowledge of the affairs of the corporation.

5. Fraud ⟸52—Evidence of defrauded party's unsoundness of mind admissible.

In an action by the lender to a corporation against its stockholder and director, who induced him by fraud and undue influence to surrender his notes and stock by misrepresenting the insolvency of the company and its imminent danger of bankruptcy, evidence as to plaintiff's unsoundness of mind was admissible, as tending to show he was more easily led by defendant's misrepresentations.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1050(1)—Evidence of defendant's wealth and business experience harmless to him in view of verdict.

In an action by a lender to a corporation against its stockholder and director who, by fraud and undue influence, misrepresenting the company's imminent bankruptcy, induced plaintiff to surrender his notes and stock, evidence as to defendant's wealth and business experience, if inadmissible, in view of Civ. Code, §

3294, was harmless to defendant, where the verdict awarded plaintiff only a sum which represented the actual value of his stock at the time of the transaction in question.

7. Trial ⟸248—Instructions having reference to facts not abstract.

Instructions which were not only correct in point of law, but had immediate reference to the facts as pleaded and proven in the case, were not abstract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by C. W. Bozarth against A. Otis Birch. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Schweitzer & Hutton, Geo. H. Woodruff, and Clyde C. Shoemaker, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John C. Stick and Muhleman & Crump, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of $9,550 damages. The complaint set forth facts upon which the plaintiff predicated his prayer for damages in substance as follows:

That the Lyon-McKinney-Smith Company was a corporation having its principal place of business in Los Angeles, with a capital stock of $100,000 divided into 1,000 shares of the par value of $100 per share; that plaintiff was the owner and holder of 194 shares of the capital stock of said corporation from the time of its incorporation in the year 1902 up to the 20th day of August, 1916; that in the year 1912 the defendant became a stockholder in said corporation, and also a director thereof; that from time to time thereafter he acquired additional shares of stock therein, until on January 1, 1916, he was the owner of the majority of its stock; that during the same time the corporation had become indebted to the defendant in the sum of approximately $100,000, so that he was on the last-named date the largest creditor thereof; that by reason of his said ownership of the majority of the stock of said corporation, and of the fact that he was its largest creditor, the defendant had come to completely dominate the board of directors of said corporation and the officers thereof, and also the control and financial policy thereof, and had thereby craftily stimulated and fostered in the minds of the said officials thereof the idea that, if he were to become dissatisfied or displeased with the conduct of the affairs of said corporation, he could and would wreck the business of the same; that the plaintiff had also, from time to time, loaned various sums of money to the corporation, until on August 19, 1916, it was indebted to him in the sum of $13,000, evidenced by two certain promissory notes, one for the sum of $10,500, bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and one for the sum of $2,500, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, which principal sums, with accumulated interest, were then due and unpaid; that these sums of money had been loaned by plaintiff to the corporation for its accommodation, use, and benefit, and that, in order to so loan the same, the plaintiff had himself borrowed the sum of $9,000 of said moneys so loaned by him to it, upon which he was at said time paying interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and of which last-named indebtedness he would be unable to pay either the principal or interest except out of the moneys due as principal and becoming due as interest from the corporation to him; that on January 1, 1916, the plaintiff suffered a nervous breakdown, and was incapacitated for business, or for any proper understanding of the conduct and affairs of said corporation, which enfeebled mental and bodily condition of the plaintiff continued thereafter up to and after August 20, 1916; that at some time prior to August 19, 1916, the said defendant conceived the design of despoiling the plaintiff of his said 194 shares of the capital stock of said corporation without paying him any adequate compensation therefor through his control of said corporation, and through his manipulation and control of its board of directors, and that, on August 19, 1916, in furtherance of his said design, he falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that said corporation was insolvent, and was in immediate danger of bankruptcy, and that, at a meeting of said corporation held on said day, with intent to intimidate the said plaintiff and lend stress to said representation, the said defendant proposed that an assessment be levied on the capital stock of said corporation at the rate of 20 per cent. of the par value thereof, if paid in cash, or of 40 per cent. of the par value thereof if paid in stock; that at said meeting the said defendant further falsely and fraudulently stated and declared that the plaintiff could not have paid to him his interest on his notes of said corporation any more; that at the time of the making of these statements by the said defendant they were knowingly false and untrue, in that said corporation was not insolvent, and was not in condition to make no more payments of the interest on plaintiff's notes to him, but that the said plaintiff, by reason of his enfeebled mental and physical condition, and of the fact that he had thereby been unable to keep himself informed as to the actual condition of the affairs of the corporation, believed the said statements and false assertions of the defendant to be true, and was greatly distressed thereby; and that, while he was in this state of distress, the defendant offered said plaintiff, immediately following said statements, to buy his said notes of said corporation from him, paying him the face value thereof, without accrued interest, but only upon condition that the said plaintiff would turn over to said defendant all of his said stock in said corporation without any other consideration therefor than the payment of the said face value of the plaintiff's said notes, and that said plaintiff, under the belief and influence of said defendant's false assertions that said corporation was insolvent, and in immediate danger of bankruptcy, and unable to pay the interest on his notes, and also under the compulsion and distress occasioned thereby, and being thus overreached and oppressed by the defendant, transferred to him his said notes for the sum of $13,000, the face value thereof, without accrued interest, and also transferred to him his said 194 shares of the capital stock of said corporation, without any other or further consideration therefor; that said notes were at said time of the reasonable value of the sum of $13,000, and that said stock was at said time of the reasonable value of $19,400; and that, by the aforesaid acts and grievances complained of, the plaintiff has suffered damage in the sum of $25,000.

The defendant demurred to the plaintiff's complaint on several grounds, and also moved to strike out several portions thereof; and, the said demurrer having been overruled, and said motion denied, filed his answer, denying specifically most of the material averments of said complaint, and denying any unfairness or overreaching on his part in his transactions with the defendant. He also set up as a separate and affirmative defense that the plaintiff had, prior to the institution of this action, and after he had become mentally competent and thoroughly cognizant of all the acts and things of which he complained in this action, instituted an action against said corporation for certain recoveries, by which said action said plaintiff had confirmed his said transactions with said defendant, whereby he was now estopped from maintaining the present action.

The case went to trial before a jury upon the issues as thus framed, at the conclusion of which the jury rendered its verdict in the plaintiff's favor, fixing his damages at the sum of $9,550, for which sum judgment was presently entered, and from such judgment defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1-3] The first contention of the appellant is that the trial court erred in its order overruling its demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint, for the alleged reason that the cause of action attempted to be set forth therein was one based upon the exercise of undue influence upon the part of the defendant in procuring the contract from plaintiff for the transfer of his notes and stock, and that, this being so, it was requisite for him to have averred a rescission of said contract; and that, lacking such averment, the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In making this contention the defendant relies upon the two cases of Bancroft v. Bancroft, 110 Cal. 374, 42 Pac. 896, and McDougall v. Roberts, 185 Pac. 483. It may not be denied that, if the appellant's premise to the effect that this is an action based solely upon the defendant's exercise of undue influence over the plaintiff in the procurement of the contract in question, his conclusion as to the insufficiency of the plaintiff's complaint in the respect indicated would be correct under the foregoing cases; but an inspection of said complaint, as hereinbefore stated, in substance convinces us that this action is not based wholly, or chiefly, upon the defendant's undue influence over the plaintiff in the procurement of said contract, but that it is one essentially sounding in fraud, consisting in the fraudulent design and false representation of the defendant by which the plaintiff was induced to part with his notes and stock without adequate consideration. The two cases above cited as upholding the appellant's contention expressly limit the application of the doctrine therein declared to cases wherein undue influence is alleged to be the sole inspiring cause of the contract complained of; and, in our opinion, this doctrine should not be extended to cases, like that at bar, wherein advantageous contracts have been procured by false and fraudulent misrepresentations as to matters of fact, even though a plaintiff, by reason of mental infirmities, has been the more easily misled and unduly influenced thereby. This being so, the well-established rule applicable to cases sounding in fraud, which gives to the plaintiff his choice of remedies, either to disaffirm the contract through its rescission, or to affirm it and sue for damages, should be given application to the facts of the case at bar; and the plaintiff herein having elected to seek the latter remedy, his complaint must be held to have sufficiently stated a cause of action.

[4] As to the objections which the appellant urges to the plaintiff's complaint upon the other grounds, we think they are not well taken, for the reason that the defendant's alleged misrepresentations as to the insolvency of the corporation and its imminent danger of bankruptcy were not made as mere matters of opinion, but as statements of fact based upon the defendant's superior knowledge of the affairs of the corporation. Being so made to the plaintiff, at a time when, by reason of his impaired physical and mental powers, he was not in a condition to know or learn the truth respecting the defendant's assertions, he has, we think, sufficiently brought himself within the principles governing fair dealing between parties to contracts, as laid down in the case of Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 Pac. 1011. We think, also, and for the reasons above stated, that the motion of the defendant to strike out certain portions of the plaintiff's complaint was properly denied.

[5] The defendant's next contention is that the trial court erred in admitting evidence as to the plaintiff's unsoundness of mind. We confess ourselves not quite able to follow the refinement of the appellant's reasoning in support of this contention. The gravamen of the plaintiff's complaint was that, by reason of his physical and mental infirmities, he was the more easily misled by the defendant's representations as to matters of fact which, had he been in his normal state of mind and body, he would have known, or could have learned to be untrue. Seven witnesses testified as to his enfeebled condition, some of whom even went so far as to declare him entirely incompetent on the date of the transaction in question. Had he brought suit to set aside said transaction as entirely void, the above evidence would, it is conceded, have been admissible; and we fail to see why the same evidence would not be competent in an action wherein the defendant is alleged to have been able to successfully misrepresent an existing condition because the plaintiff's weakened mental state made it impossible for him to know or learn the truth. The case of Ripperdan v. Weldy, 149 Cal. 667, 87 Pac. 276, cited by the appellant on this point, has no application to it that we can discover. The point is not well taken.

[6] The appellant further urges a number of respects wherein he claims the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of the jury upon the special issues presented to it for determination at the defendant's request. We have examined each of these findings in the light of the pleadings in the case and of the evidence educed in support thereof, and from such examination we are satisfied the findings of the jury upon these issues are each sufficiently supported by the evidence in the case. It would not be profitable to review these in detail; nor do we deem the several alleged errors of the trial court in the admission of evidence, conceding them to be such, sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal of the case—as, for example, the alleged error of the court in admitting evidence as to the defendant's wealth and business experience. It is argued that this sort of evidence is only admissible in actions wherein exemplary damages may be awarded; and it is urged by the appellant that this is not, in its nature, such an action, since section 3294 of the Civil Code confines such damages to actions "for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, express or implied."

It may well be doubted whether an action for damages founded upon misrepresentation and deceit, with particular circumstances of oppression, is not one of those actions upon tort to which the rule governing exemplary damages would apply; but however that may be, the evidence upon which the appellant has urged this objection does not appear to have been prejudicial, since the verdict of the jury awarded to the plaintiff not the large amount of damages which he prayed for, but only a sum which represented the actual value of the plaintiff's stock at the time of the transaction in question, as fixed by the testimony of the defendant himself.

The final contentions of the appellant are that the court erred in the refusal to give, or in the modification of, certain instructions requested by him, and in the giving of certain other instructions which appellant insists are merely abstract statements of the law relating to fraud and deceit. As to the first of these contentions, we find that the alleged errors of the trial court had reference to the appellant's claim that, this being an action based upon undue influence, it was not maintainable, except upon proof of the rescission of the contract obtained thereby. This point has already been disposed of in an earlier part of this opinion.

[7] As to the point that the court's instructions upon the subject of fraud and deceit were merely abstract statements of law, and hence ought not to have been given, we hold that this contention has no merit, since the instructions complained of were not only correct in point of law, but had immediate reference to the facts as pleaded and proven in the case.

No error appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Injunction ⊂=146—Injunction pendente lite should not be granted where verified answer denies allegations of complaint.

An injunction should not be granted pendente lite upon a complaint, where, in response thereto, a verified answer is filed explicitly and unequivocally denying the allegations of such complaint; therefore where the lessee of lands sued to compel the lessor and mortgagee to reinstate and relocate 10 shares of water stock as an appurtenance to the land, and the mortgagee by verified answer denied that he was the purchaser of the stock or claimed to be the owner thereof, etc., a temporary injunction should not have been granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by S. Moriyama against Charles F. Veysey and others. From an order granting a temporary injunction, defendant named appeals. Reversed.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for appellant.

James L. Allen, of Brawley, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant Charles F. Veysey from an order granting a temporary injunction.

The complaint alleged that on the 12th day of September, 1918, the defendants Groshen, owners of certain land in Imperial county, leased to the plaintiff for a term of three years the said land for farming purposes, also giving to the lessee the right to the use of the water stock located on the land; that said water stock consisted of 416 shares of stock of Imperial Water Company No. 8 owned by the lessors and appurtenant to the land, which said stock was sufficient to provide for the furnishing of water to the land; that the corporation was organized for the purpose of distribution of water for irrigation, and that by the issue of the shares of stock the company obligated itself to furnish all water to irrigate the said land for farming and domestic purposes, and that said corporation at all times had sufficient water in its canals to supply the needs of the lands of all of its stockholders and other persons entitled thereto; that said land is valueless for farming purposes except when furnished with water for irrigation. It was further alleged that defendants Groshen, being indebted to defendant Veysey, mortgaged the described land to Veysey to secure that indebtedness; that as additional security therefor the defendants pledged to Veysey their said shares of water stock; that as additional security for the protection of Veysey against sale of the water stock for delinquent assessments and for the payment of taxes defendants Groshen assigned to Veysey the rents accruing from said lands, said rents to be applied against any overdue interest owing to Veysey, except sufficient amounts to be carried to cover taxes and water assessments to keep them from becoming delinquent; that on the 9th day of October, 1918, an assessment was levied by the water company on said water stock, which assessment, not having been paid, was declared delinquent, and afterwards, on the 29th day of November, 1918, the corporation sold 10 shares of said stock to pay said assessment, and Veysey was the purchaser at said sale and now claims to be the legal owner and holder of said 10 shares of stock; that the defendant corporation at all times knew of said facts existing respecting the mortgage and pledge to Veysey and his purchase of the stock at said delinquent sale; on information and belief, that said 10 shares of stock had not been transferred on the books of the corporation to other lands and remains and still is appurtenant to said land, and that the water company "has heretofore furnished to plaintiff, as tenant of said lands, sufficient water for the irrigation of said lands and plaintiff is entitled to have such water." It was further alleged that on November 29, 1918, the water company notified plaintiff "that said 16 shares of water stock had been sold and unless the owner of the land should purchase an additional 16 shares of stock in said corporation no future delivery of water would be furnished for use on said lands; that although plaintiff has demanded that said corporation furnish water to said lands, and offered to pay for such water, the said corporation refused and still refuses to furnish any water to said lands;" that plaintiff has demanded of the defendant Veysey that he arrange with the defendant water company to allow plaintiff to use said water stock and procure water for use on said lands, and said defendant Veysey has failed and refused so to do; that a like demand was made of the defendant Floren Groshen, to which demand the defendants Groshen have not replied; that the plaintiff has paid the rent due and for all water used on the land. Further facts were alleged showing loss and damage suffered and that will be suffered by the plaintiff by nondelivery of the water, and that the defendants Groshen are insolvent.

The defendant Veysey in his answer (which, like the complaint, was duly verified) denied that as additional security, or otherwise, for the payment of the indebtedness of defendants Groshen to him, said shares of stock were pledged to him; denied that he is now the equitable owner of said shares of stock or of said land, or of any thereof; denied that as additional security or for the protection of Veysey against the sale of said water stock for delinquent assessments, or otherwise, or for the payment of taxes, or for any other purpose, the defendants Groshen, or either of them, assigned to him the rents accruing or arising from the land described in the lease, or any of such rents; denied that the water company sold 10 shares of the stock mentioned in the complaint to pay any assessment, or for any purpose whatever, to the defendant Veysey, and denied that the defendant Veysey was the purchaser at any such sale, or that he is now the owner or claims to be the owner of said 10 shares of water stock, or any water stock in said corporation whatever. There are other denials in the answer of facts alleged in the complaint, but those herein stated are sufficient for the present purpose. At the hearing on the order to show cause which was first issued in this matter there was read in evidence, in addition to the complaint and answer, a complaint in an action commenced by Veysey against defendants Groshen on December 30, 1917, "to foreclose a mortgage on the land and shares of water stock described in the complaint herein, and in which complaint duly verified by said Veysey it was stated, 'That as collateral security for said mortgage said defendants pledged with said plaintiff 387 shares of stock in the Imperial Water Co. No. 8,'" which said stock and land were and are the same stock and land described in the complaint in this action. Said action of foreclosure of mortgage was thereafter dismissed without prejudice.

From the evidence thus produced, it was established (if we may presume that the mortgage and pledge in the foreclosure action were the same mortgage and pledge referred to in plaintiff's complaint herein) that the mortgage and pledge to appellant were executed prior to the making of the lease by defendants Groshen to plaintiff. It is likewise established that appellant, under oath, by his answer, denied the equities of the complaint, in this, among other things, that he denied that he purchased any of said shares of water stock, or that he is or claims to be the owner thereof. If this be true, it would be impossible for him to comply with the injunction which commands that he "reinstate and relocate said ten shares of stock as an appurtenance to the lands described in the complaint herein."

"The rule is well settled that an injunction should not be granted pendente lite upon a complaint alone where, in response thereto, a verified answer is filed explicitly and unequivocally denying the allegations of such complaint." Martin v. Danziger, 21 Cal. App. 563, 564, 132 Pac. 284.

We think that plaintiff was not entitled to a temporary injunction against appellant.

The order is reversed.

HOPPIN v. MUNSEY. (L. A. 2845.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 19, 1921. Rehearing Denied June 16, 1921.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⊂=187—Acceptance of payments overdue extends time for balance only for reasonable time.

The acceptance by a vendor of payment of a portion of the overdue interest after the installments on the principal were all overdue does not eliminate the provisions of the contract that time was of its essence, that the purchaser's failure to make the payments should release the vendor from all obligation to convey, and that the payments already made should be forfeited by such failure, but its only effect as to the future was to give the purchaser a reasonable time after the payment within which to perform his part of the contract.

2. Appeal and error ⊂=931(4)—Finding as to reasonable time for payment of balance due on contract implied.

What is a reasonable time within which a purchaser is required to pay the balance due on his contract after the vendor has accepted payment of a portion of the interest when all the principal was overdue depends on the particular circumstances in the case and is primarily a question of fact for determination by the trial court, and in support of a judgment for the vendor the Supreme Court must assume that the trial court had found such reasonable time had expired before the vendor refused to accept a subsequent payment.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⊂=341(3)—Evidence held to warrant finding reasonable time for further payments had expired.

In a suit by the assignee of a purchaser to recover money paid by the purchaser upon a contract for the sale of land, evidence that less than one-sixth of the purchase price had been paid, and that all of the accrued interest had not been paid, and that the purchaser had never been put in possession of the premises, held to sustain the court's finding that a reasonable time for the payment had elapsed when the purchaser tendered a new payment four months after the last payment of a portion of the interest had been accepted.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⊂=148—Tender of deed unnecessary if it would be fruitless.

Under Civ. Code, § 1511, subd. 3, providing that formal tender is excused when the person who should have made it is induced not to do so by an act of the other party naturally tending to have that effect, a tender of a deed of conveyance by the purchaser to the vendor is not necessary to entitle the vendor to forfeit the contract where the declarations of the purchaser indicate that such a tender would be fruitless.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⊂=148 — Tender of deed held excused by purchaser's statement he could not pay.

Where the purchaser informed the vendor when the latter declined to accept a small payment upon the accrued interest and demanded a payment upon the principal that he could not pay anything on the principal at that time, but hoped at the end of the season to be able to pay a small portion of it, the tender by the vendor of a deed of conveyance was unnecessary to entitle him to forfeit the purchaser's rights under the contract.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⊂=95(2)—Payments held forfeited to vendor notwithstanding acceptance of partial payments after maturity.

Where a contract for the sale of land provided that on the purchaser's failure to complete the payments the amounts theretofore paid should be forfeited to the vendor, the acceptance by the vendor after all payments of the principal had become overdue of a portion of the accrued interest does not preclude his right to forfeit the payments made by the purchaser, especially where the purchaser did not tender payment of the balance until more than four months after the vendor had conveyed to another with the purchaser's knowledge.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⊂=95(2), 101—Repeated acceptance of small overdue payments held not waiver of forfeiture requiring vendor to give notice of intention to forfeit.

The fact that the vendor had in the past repeatedly accepted small payments on the accrued interest, though it waived previous defaults, did not waive the condition of the contract for forfeiture of the payments made on the purchaser's failure to complete the payments, and does not require the vendor to give formal notice of intention to forfeit, especially where the purchaser had not been given possession and his conduct showed a disposition to postpone performance indefinitely for speculative purposes.

8. Appeal and error ⊂=1056(3)—Exclusion of evidence as to an option held harmless where option could not give any rights.

In an action by the assignee of a purchaser for breach of a contract for the sale of land, the exclusion of evidence that, before the vendor had refused to accept further payments by the purchaser, he had given an option to another for the same property, was harmless, where the option does not appear to have been supported by any consideration, and there was no evidence that it was carried out before its expiration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by H. I. Hoppin against Fred E. Munsey on a contract for the sale of real estate. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George W. McDill, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Donald Barker, of Los Angeles (Wm. H. Neblett, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action by the assignee of a vendee to recover money paid by his assignor to the vendor upon a contract of sale of real estate, including certain taxes paid on the land. The defendant had judgment in the court below, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The contract of sale was made between Munsey, the defendant, and one F. W. Abbott, assignor of plaintiff as aforesaid. The complaint alleges that on September 14, 1914, Munsey and Abbott executed an agreement whereby Munsey agreed to sell to Abbott certain real estate for $1,600, payable as follows: $250 in cash, then and there paid; $675 on or before September 10, 1915, and $675 on or before September 10, 1916, with interest on said installments from the date of the contract until paid at 7 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly; that he had from time to time made certain payments on the contract covering portions of the interest accruing thereon, amounting in all to $152.68—the last payment being $5 on March 31, 1917—and had also paid certain taxes upon the land amounting to $45.85; that on August 20, 1917, Munsey, without having tendered to Abbott a deed of said property and without having demanded the payment of the remainder of the contract price from him, sold and conveyed the property to one Clara H. Mackey; that thereafter and before the commencement of this action Abbott tendered to Munsey the whole amount of principal and interest then due on said contract of sale and demanded of Munsey that he cause said property to be conveyed to Abbott; that Munsey refused the sum offered and refused to cause any conveyance of the property to be made to Abbott; and that after said demand and refusal Abbott assigned to the plaintiff all his rights and claims against Munsey. The prayer was for a judgment for the sum of $448.51.

The answer admitted, by not denying, the allegation that Munsey had not tendered a deed to Abbott and the allegations that Abbott had tendered to Munsey the principal and interest due on the contract and had demanded a conveyance thereof from Munsey to him, which Munsey had refused to execute or cause to be executed. These allegations therefore stand as admitted for the purposes of the case.

The answer further alleged that the contract provided that time was of the essence thereof, and that on the failure of Abbott to comply with its terms Munsey should be released from all obligation in law and equity to convey the property, and that Abbott should thereupon forfeit all right thereto and to all moneys theretofore paid thereunder; that prior to said conveyance by Munsey to Mackey as alleged in the complaint Abbott was in default for failure to pay the principal and interest due on the contract price; that thereafter, and before said conveyance to Mackey, Munsey had demanded of Abbott the payment of all of the remainder of the principal and interest of the contract price, but said Abbott failed to pay the same; that because of said default and failure he (Munsey) had declared a forfeiture of the rights of Abbott under the contract; and that defendant was thereby released from all obligation to convey to Abbott and was entitled to retain the money paid to him by Abbott.

The court found that Munsey conveyed the property to Mackey on August 21, 1917, but that before doing so, and after the maturity of the whole of the contract price, Munsey demanded from Abbott the payment of the principal thereof, and that he was at that time excused from tendering a deed of the property to Abbott by the fact that Abbott then and there declared that he was unable to pay the same and failed to comply with the demand for payment; that Abbott made no payment or offer of payment of the contract price or any part thereof between the time he declared himself unable to pay the price and the month of January, 1918; that the tender so made in 1918 was not made within a reasonable time after the acceptance of the last payment of $5 on the overdue interest, which was on March 31, 1917; that the conduct of Abbott was such as to justify Munsey in acting on the belief that Abbott could not and did not intend to pay the price within a reasonable time after such waiver as resulted from the acceptance of said $5. It also found that the contract was in the form alleged in the answer, and that Munsey had declared a forfeiture of the rights of Abbott before making the conveyance to Mackey and after having demanded of Abbott the payment of the balance owing upon the contract price, and that Munsey was justified in refusing the tender made in January, 1918. It thereupon concluded that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any part of the money paid on the contract by Abbott and rendered judgment accordingly.

The facts admitted by the pleadings are to be taken in connection with the evidence in the case, so far as they may assist in determining the weight thereof and the inferences to be drawn therefrom. Since the findings were in favor of the defendant, the evidence must be considered in the light most favorable to the defendant, and the testimony of the defendant is to be considered as the truth, so far as it is inconsistent with the evidence offered in behalf of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff contends that these findings are contrary to the evidence, and, second, that, even if correct, they do not support the judgment.

The following facts appear from the evidence: The first installment of the price was due on September 10, 1915. Up to that time Abbott had made six payments, amounting in the aggregate to $70.92, which was not sufficient to pay even the interest then accrued. Thereafter and prior to September 10, 1916, when the whole sum fell due, seven small sums were paid, amounting to $54.76.

The default continued, and on February 12, 1917, nothing more having been paid, Munsey gave to Abbott a notice in writing, signed by Munsey, as follows:

"In reply to your note of the 10th, just to hand, I wish to notify you that unless you pay up the interest amounting to $84 before the 10th of March, 1917, I will have to cancel deal with you on lot.

"I have waited long enough for payments past due, but will not wait longer on interest, which is a year now past due.

"Then when you catch up with interest I will expect some money paid on lot in a reasonable time.

"As I told you before I was willing to give you a chance as long as you kept interest paid up and am willing to still give you chance if you will keep interest paid, but now you are so far behind on interest I must insist on it being paid as per above notice."

Thereafter Abbott paid $10 on March 5, 1917, $12 on March 18, 1917, and $5 on March 31, 1917. Nearly all of the payments had been made by checks sent to Munsey by mail These payments lacked $60 of paying the overdue interest. On July 31, 1917, Munsey received from Abbott through the mail a check for $22. No offer of payment had been made in the meantime. The same day Munsey called on Abbott and returned the check, saying that he could not accept such a small amount. Abbott said that he was unable to pay any more; that if Munsey would wait until the summer season was over he might possibly pay up the interest. Munsey asked for a payment on the principal, to which Abbott replied that he could not make a payment on the principal nor pay the interest due at that time. The question was then asked of Munsey, "What else did you say to him as to your reason for declining the amount?" to which the answer was, "In the first place that he had gone a year and some months behind in his interest; that I had given him previous notice four months previous and I supposed that he had not been able to meet it, and was surprised to receive such sum, after four months had expired on this notice and that I needed the money and that I sold the lot." Abbott never was in possession of the property, and he had no right of possession thereof under the contract. Abbott's testimony was to the effect that Munsey demanded full payment, and that he (Abbott) said that he was unable to make payment, but that he was negotiating a loan and expected to pay up when he got the money. As the sale to Clara H. Mackey was for $1,500, which was only about $50 more than was due from Abbott, the court evidently doubted the good faith of Abbott's statement about the loan.

[1] It may be admitted that the acceptance by Munsey of the two small payments on March 18 and March 31, 1917, operated as a waiver of the demand contained in the notice of February 12th and of any right to declare a forfeiture as of the date of March 10th fixed in said demand. It waived all past defaults in performance, but it did not alter the terms of the contract with regard to the future or eliminate as to future occurrences the three provisions that time was of its essence, that if Abbott failed to comply with its terms Munsey should be released from all obligation to convey, and that the payments already made should be forfeited by such failure. Its only effect as to the future was to give Abbott a reasonable time after the payment on March 31, 1917, within which to perform his part of the contract. Unquestionably it did not extend the time of payment further than that. It therefore follows that immediately upon the expiration of such reasonable time Munsey could have made tender of a deed and demanded full payment, and that upon the failure of Abbott to comply with the demand he could at once have begun an action against Abbott for specific performance, or to foreclose Abbott's rights, or for damages for breach of the contract. Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 10, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Keller v. Lewis, 53 Cal. 118; Fairchild v. Mullan, 90 Cal. 194, 27 Pac. 201.

[2, 3] The question of what is a reasonable time depends in each case upon its own particular circumstances. It is primarily a question of fact for the determination of the trial court. In support of the findings and judgment this court must assume that the trial court decided that such reasonable time had expired before the refusal of Munsey to accept the payment of $22 offered on July 31, 1917. Abbott had shown no desire to meet his obligation promptly during the long period of indulgence that had already elapsed and Munsey was under no obligation to continue that indulgence or tax his own patience further. Less than one-sixth of the purchase price had been paid in cash at the time of the making of the contract and no further part of the price had been paid or offered. The payments made on interest had not been sufficient to discharge that already accrued. The whole contract price was long past due and all the money was due immediately upon the acceptance of the $5 on March 31st. Abbott had never taken possession. No circumstances appear which appeal to a court of equity as necessary grounds for a considerable extension of time. We think the conclusion that the reasonable time for performance implied by the principles of equity had elapsed prior to July 31, 1917, was warranted by the circumstances of the case.

The result is that on that day Munsey had the right to refuse further time, demand full performance then and there, and decline to accept any partial payments, and then to assert his right under the terms of the contract to declare it ended and the payments forfeited to his use. He had that right on September 10, 1916, the day fixed for the final payment by the terms of the contract, and when the reasonable time expired after the payment of March 31, 1917, his rights were the same as if the contract had originally fixed the period of expiration of such reasonable time as the time for full payment.

[4] Furthermore, it may be noted that, while the tender of a deed by Munsey, or the existence of a lawful excuse, would ordinarily be necessary as a condition precedent to any right of Munsey to proceed in the enforcement of the contract by suit, as for specific performance, or for damages, he is not here seeking such relief, but is only contending that the contract could not be enforced against him after such default by the vendee. We need not determine whether or not for the latter purpose a tender is necessary, for we think the facts disclosed by the evidence were sufficient to excuse such tender, even if it were otherwise required. A tender is not necessary where the conduct or declarations of the vendee are such as to show that it would be unavailing.

"It is a maxim that the law does not require a man to do a vain and fruitless thing, so it has been held that a strict and formal tender is not necessary where it appears that if made it would have been vain and fruitless." 3 Elliott on Contracts, § 1972.

The want of a formal tender is excused when the person who should have made it is induced not to do so by any act of the other party "naturally tending to have that effect, done at or before the time at which such performance or offer may be made." Civ. Code, § 1511, subd. 3.

[5] On July 31, 1917, when Munsey declined a small payment on the interest and asked for a payment on the principal, Abbott informed him that he could not pay anything on the principal or interest at that time, but that, if he would wait until the summer season was over, he "might possibly" pay up the interest. This informed Munsey that Abbott was then unable to pay anything, and that the most he then hoped for was that at the end of the summer season he might be able to pay a very small portion of the price, all of which was at that moment long past due. In view of the past delays, Munsey could come to no other conclusion than that the tender of a deed at that time would be wholly vain and fruitless. This continued failure and these statements would naturally tend to induce him not to go through such an idle ceremony, but, on the contrary, to act in the case upon the theory that Abbott did not expect a tender and neither would nor could pay the money and accept the tender if it were made. Abbott's statements were an admission to that effect. The tender was excused, and Munsey's rights are the same as if he had then made a formal tender and demand and had met with a failure and refusal.

[6] Under these circumstances Munsey had the right to treat the money paid as forfeited to him, to consider his obligation under the contract terminated, and to sell and convey the property to another person. The case was precisely the same as that existing in Skookum Oil Co. v. Thomas, 162 Cal. 539, 123 Pac. 363, after the failure of the vendee there to pay the third installment of the price at the expiration of an extension of the time given therefor. The vendor thereupon elected to treat the contract as at an end and refused a subsequent offer of the balance of the price. The opinion, in referring to the contract, designates it as an option, but the contract is set forth, and from its terms it clearly appears that after the first payment of $10,000 was made, if not before, it became a contract of sale, so framed as to make time of its essence, and the context of the opinion shows that it was so considered. The deed was deposited in escrow, to be delivered upon full payment of the price. The contract was essentially the same in effect as that in the present case. The suit was to recover the price paid, upon the theory that the vendee had the right to rescind upon the refusal by the vendor to accept the tender of the balance due on the price. The court said that—

"Under such a contract the refusal of the vendor to accept a tender made by a purchaser, in default, and to convey to the purchaser after such default, does not effect a rescission of the contract, nor entitle the vendee to recover the money paid. Neither will equity relieve such purchaser who has made an unexcused default and has not fulfilled conditions precedent to the vesting of his right of action." 162 Cal. 545, 123 Pac. 365.

So in Oursler v. Thacher, 152 Cal. 744, 93 Pac. 1009, the court quoted and approved the following passage from the opinion in Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 14, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17:

" 'While it is essentially true that in case of a rescission the vendee may demand that he be restored to his original condition, it does not follow that a vendor who refuses to convey after such breach by the vendee thereby rescinds. To the contrary, in refusing to convey after the vendee's default he is not treating the contract as at an end, but is expressly standing upon it, and basing his rights upon its terms, covenants, and conditions.' Also: 'But the vendor, in refusing to accept the tender and to repay the money, is neither violating his contract nor rescinding it, nor treating it as at an end. He is standing squarely upon its terms.' "

The meaning of this, of course, is that the vendor in such a case is standing upon the terms of the contract by appropriating the money paid to his own use and is without liability for its return. In Glock v. Howard it is said further:

"It would be to the last degree unjust and inequitable to allow a vendee, after his default under such a contract, to put the vendor in default by a mere tender. The practical effect of such a rule would be that a vendee without risk could speculate indefinitely in the land of the unfortunate vendor. The vendee would enter into a contract in which time would be declared of the essence, and stipulate under conditions precedent, as in this case, to make payment at a certain time. Failing to make payment, he would three months, six months, one year, or, as in this case, over three years, after the date of the failure, make an offer to perform, and if the land had risen in value, according to the theory of respondents here, could compel performance; but in every case he could recover the moneys paid."

In this case it is to be observed that Abbott did not make a tender of the purchase price until more than four months after the conveyance by Munsey to Mackey, of which sale he had knowledge. It follows from what has been said that the plaintiff had no right to recover any portion of the purchase money which Abbott had previously paid.

[7] The plaintiff seeks to avoid the effect of these principles by the claim that the repeated acceptance of payments, however small, upon the contract price, not only operated as a waiver of all previous defaults, but also constituted a waiver of the provisions of the contract declaring time of its essence, and that the purchase money should be forfeited upon a failure to pay at maturity. His position is that after such waiver the aforesaid provisions cannot be again asserted or enforced until the vendor shall have served the vendee with notice that at the expiration of a stated period, which must be a reasonable time, performance would again become due and would be demanded. In this he relies upon Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126, and Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751. These cases do not hold that such stipulation for forfeiture may not be restored and enforced by the vendor in any other manner than by giving a definite and specific notice of the intent to do so. There is a declaration to that effect in Monson v. Bragdon, 159 Ill. 66, 42 N. E. 383, which is quoted in Boone v. Templeman, but the quotation is given in support of the statement that from the facts alleged in the complaint "a court might infer a waiver of the conditions regarding forfeiture and time," and that because of such possible inference "they supported the general allegation of the complaint that Templeman had waived those conditions." The general allegation of waiver was attacked by a special demurrer for uncertainty. It is evidently this attack that was in mind when the court said that it was "supported" by the particular allegations showing such waiver. On general principles there can be no doubt that if, after such waiver as the law infers from acceptance of partial payments after maturity, the conduct of the vendor and vendee in subsequent dealings is such as to justify the inference that both parties understood that the conditions regarding forfeiture were to be treated as restored and were in force, and that the vendee understood that he was then in default, the vendor may have the advantage of the forfeiture as completely as he may obtain it by a definite notice to the vendee, and when, in this situation, the vendor demands full payment, and the vendee admits his utter inability to comply, the rule that a tender of a deed by the vendor need not be made when it would obviously be unavailing becomes applicable, and he may treat the failure and inability of the vendee as an abandonment of the contract, declare the money paid forfeited, and resell the property to another, without liability to refund to the vendee the money paid. Especially is this true when the vendee has not been given possession and his conduct has shown a previous disposition to postpone performance indefinitely and has evidenced a design to keep up the relations solely for speculative purposes, as is indicated by his conduct here. Neither of the cases cited is contrary to this conclusion. The Boone Case was a suit by the vendee against the vendor for specific performance, and not for a recovery of money paid, as upon a rescission. Stevinson v. Joy was a suit by the vendor to quiet title. There was a trial, and the court found that the conditions as to forfeiture had been waived, and that the vendee had offered to pay the whole sum then due on the price. The vendee was in possession and had made valuable improvements on the land. The question above stated was not involved in either case. In the Boone Case the demurrer admitted all facts alleged, and in the Stevinson Case the findings were against the vendor's contention. They present the opposite condition so far as inferences are concerned to that here presented. In this connection it may be again remarked that Abbott made no offer to pay any money until January 9, 1918, and that before he attempted to do this he had discovered that Munsey had already conveyed the property to Clara H. Mackey, and undoubtedly knew that Munsey could not comply with the demand. Immediately upon his refusal to do so Abbott demanded a rescission of the contract and a return of the money paid. These facts are significant on the question of Abbott's good faith. In the present case the finding of the court is against the contention that at the time the forfeiture was declared and the property reconveyed by the vendor there was any waiver in force which enlarged or continued the rights of the vendee, and, as we have seen, the evidence supports this finding.

The plaintiff also relies upon the decision of Hayt v. Bentel, 164 Cal. 680, 130 Pac. 432. In that case there was an express allegation and finding that the vendor had waived the delay in making payment under the contract. What is said about the effect of acceptance of payments after maturity must be understood to refer to the fact that the court had made all inferences which might arise from that fact in favor of the proposition that it constituted a waiver. These cases have no application where the finding is to the contrary and there is no uncontradicted proof of an express waiver. For these reasons the cases relied upon are inapplicable to the present case.

[8] It is claimed by the plaintiff that the court erred in refusing to allow proof that on July 30, 1917, the day before the conversation between Abbott and Munsey, Munsey had given an option to another person to buy the real property. We do not think this error, if it was one, was material. The contract was offered and it is set forth in the record. It does not appear to have been made upon any consideration and it expired on August 9th. There is no evidence that it was carried out, and, unless there was consideration, it was not binding. Apparently it did not in any respect bind Munsey to comply therewith or prejudice the rights of Abbott in the matter.

No other points are presented that deserve consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

ELLIS v. STEPHENS et al., State Board of Engineering. (Sac. 3141.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 20, 1921.)

Highways ⊂⊃99¼, New, vol. 14 Key-No. Series—Engineering department must deposit federal aid in fund under their control, and could not deposit it in general fund to reimburse loss on sale of bonds.

St. 1917, pp. 692, 694, §§ 9, 13, relating to the construction of state highways, providing that unexpended moneys shall be under control of the engineering department, and shall be transferred to its credit, and that federal aid moneys shall be credited to such fund or funds as it may designate, and that all expenditures for highways shall be under its full charge, and that all moneys appropriated for such purpose shall be made payable on demand of said department, etc., was intended to authorize expenditure of federal aid for such highway purposes as it was authorized to expend the state funds, and to that end designate a fund under its control, and hence the advisory board of the department must cause federal aid fund to be deposited in some road fund under their control, and they could not cause it to be deposited in the general fund of the state to reimburse a contemplated loss on a resale at a discount of highway bonds purchased by the state board of control from surplus money, pursuant to Pol. Code, § 679, since this would violate the express prohibition of Const. art. 16, § 2, authorizing the issue of such bonds and sale thereof, subject to the control of St. 1915, p. 652, section 4 of which forbids sale at less than par, and St. 1913, p. 564, § 3, providing as to bonds purchased with surplus money, that they shall not be sold at a price resulting in a net loss to the state.

In Bank.

Application by W. R. Ellis for mandamus against W. D. Stephens and others, constituting the State Department of Engineering. A writ was denied by the District Court of Appeal of the Third District, and on petition therefor the matter was transferred to the Supreme Court for hearing. Writ granted.

Dunn & Brand, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, of San Francisco, and R. T. McKisick, of Sacramento, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. Petitioner prays for a writ of mandamus directing the members of the department of engineering of the state of California to make a proper order indicating to the state treasurer the highway fund to which to credit the proceeds of certain checks on the treasurer of the United States aggregating $329,011.82, now in his possession. These checks were issued in payment of the obligation of the United States to the state of California under a contract entered into between the state highway commission and the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, whereby the United States agreed to pay a portion of the costs of the construction of certain state highways therein designated under plans thereby approved and adopted. This contract for government aid to the state in building these highways was authorized by act of Congress, approved July 11, 1916 (39 Stats. at Large, 355), whereby certain moneys were appropriated for the purpose of aiding the various states in the construction of such highways as were approved by the Secretary of Agriculture. A writ of mandate was denied by the District Court of Appeal of the Third District, and upon petition for transfer to this court, the matter was transferred to this court for hearing. It appears from the answer of the defendants that they have ordered the proceeds of said checks to be credited to the "surplus of the general fund" of the state to make up a contemplated deficiency due to a loss expected to be suffered by the purchase and sale of $3,000,000 par value of the "third state highway bonds" of 1919, being a portion of the $40,000,000 bond issue authorized by the amendment to the Constitution in that year. Const. art. 16, § 2 (see St. 1919, p. 1518). It is proposed by the state board of control, acting in concert with defendants, to purchase the $3,000,000 of the third state highway bonds at par, and to sell them at the market discount of 6.4138 per cent., thereby suffering a loss of $192,414.

The petitioner contends that this procedure is in violation of law, and that it is the duty of the state officer to deposit this fund in the proper highway fund. It is alleged by the defendants that the proposed procedure was adopted by the state board of control, acting in concert with the defendants because of the fact that state bonds bearing 4½ per cent. interest per annum could not be sold for more than 93.5862 per cent. of such par value, and that it is the purpose of the defendants and state board of control to cover this loss by the application of the funds coming from the United States government to that difference.

The United States statute in question makes it clear that the fund derived from the United States government under the abovementioned act to aid the state in the construction of "rural post roads" represents the amounts paid by the federal government as its share of the cost of construction. These amounts may be paid either upon completion of the work, or if so arranged, during the progress of the work. The federal statute directs (section 6 [Comp. St. § 7477f]) that after the approval of the plans for the highway—

"The Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon set aside the share of the United States payable under this act on account of such project, which shall not exceed 50 per centum of the total estimated cost thereof. No payment of any money apportioned under this act shall be made on any project until such statement of the project, and the plans, specifications, and estimates therefor, shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture. * * * The Secretary of Agriculture and the state highway department of each state may jointly determine at what times, and in what amounts, payments, as work progresses, shall be made under this act. Such payments shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, on warrants drawn by the Secretary of Agriculture, to such official, or officials, or depositary, as may be designated by the state highway department and authorized under the laws of the state to receive public funds of the state or county."

The United States statute authorizes the treasurer of the United States to pay not exceeding 50 per cent. of the cost of work by paying that amount to the state instead of paying it directly to the contractor or others doing the work.

As the voters of the state have provided for certain funds in connection with the financing of the acquisition and construction of highways known as the "third state highway fund," "third state highway interest and sinking fund," "third state highway revolving fund," and "third state highway sinking fund" (Const. art. 16, § 2), and as the money was advanced by the state to pay the one-half of the cost of the highways agreed to be paid by the United States government, it would seem that the logical destination of the aid from the United States would be in the fund depleted by such payment.

In this particular instance, a contract having been entered into between the authorized officers of the state and of the United States by which it was agreed in advance that the United States should pay certain amounts to the state in connection with the improvement of certain highways to be constructed by the state of California, the substance of such an arrangement is that the state of California pays for only such portion of the highway as is not covered by the appropriation from the federal government; that is to say, its one-half of the cost. The amount paid to the state is a reimbursement of the state and of the particular funds used by the state in the progress of the work.

So far as the United States government is concerned, the payment of the funds to the proper state officer terminates its interest in the fund. In no instance is the fund payable by the United States government until the work for which it is apportioned has been actually performed. As the money thus paid by the United States government belongs to the state of California, it is subject to the control of the state, acting through its appropriate officials. The duty of the state and its officers to the United States government has been fully performed when the highway approved by the Secretary of Agriculture had been constructed by the state in accordance with the contract. It is no concern of the government of the United States what is done by the state with the funds turned over to it. The control of such funds so paid is one entirely for the determination of the state Legislature, or, if thereto authorized by Constitution or statute, by such other officers of the state as are given control of the funds.

We will turn now to a consideration of the law of the state bearing upon the question. Section 13 of the act relating to the construction of state highways (Stats. 1917, p. 694) provides that all co-operative engineering work now existing or to be engaged in by the state with the United States government shall be placed under the department of engineering; that the advisory board shall have full power to determine the kind, quality, and extent of such work under co-operation with said government before entering into agreement with said government for such work. It further provides:

"All unexpended moneys provided for by law on the aforesaid co-operative basis shall be expressly placed under the full control of the department of engineering and the state controller shall transfer such funds to the credit of the said department. * * * All moneys received by the state treasurer from the United States government under project agreements relating to federal aid road work shall be credited by the state controller to such fund or funds as the state department of engineering shall designate."

The question here involved is whether the advisory board of the state engineering department must cause funds received from the United States government to be deposited in some road fund under their control, or whether they can cause it to be deposited in the surplus of the general fund of the state for the purpose of reimbursing those funds for loss caused by the sale of the state highway bonds by the board of control on the market at a discount.

While the authority of the advisory board, as above stated, is in terms broad enough to authorize them to deposit the money in question in any fund in the state treasury designated by them, that general authority must be read in the light of their powers, and the purpose of the legislation. By section 9 of the act (Stats. 1917, p. 692) the department of engineering is given full possession and control of all roads and highways which have been declared and adopted as "state roads" and "state highways" and all "state roads" and "state highways" which may hereafter be acquired and constructed. It is provided that—

"All expenditures by the state for highway purposes, except as otherwise hereafter provided by law, shall be under the full charge of the department of engineering, and all moneys appropriated for such purpose shall be made payable upon the proper demand of said department when approved and audited by the state board of control."

It is also provided that—

"Said California highway commission shall have the supervision and direction of all state roads and state highways now existing and the improvement, maintenance, repair and protection thereof, and have charge of and perform all other duties relating to state roads and state highways which may be imposed upon said commission by said advisory board."

It is apparent from this legislation that when the Legislature authorized the advisory board to designate the fund or funds into which payments from the federal government should be made it was intended that such payments should be made into funds under the control of the advisory board. It could not have been the intention, for instance, to delegate to the engineering advisory board the power to place these moneys in funds created to build state prisons, reform schools, insane asylums, or in the fund for the purchase of land for some then existing or contemplated state institution, or in the fund for state aid to orphans, half-orphans, and abandoned children. It is clear from the scope and purpose of the act creating the advisory board and the state engineering department, and from the duties and powers of such department, that the purpose and intent of the Legislature was to authorize the expenditure of this federal aid by the state engineering department for such purposes in connection with public highways as it was authorized to expend the funds of the state, and to that end to designate to the state treasurer and controller some appropriate fund under its control in the state treasury. Respondent board contends that, this being true, their appropriation of the money for the purpose of paying a deficiency in funds caused by the inability to sell state highway bonds at par, as required by the Constitution, is a proper exercise of the powers vested in them.

It is manifest that if such an appropriation of public money violates an express provision of the law it is not authorized by implication arising from the power of the board to designate the fund in which the money must be carried on the books of the treasurer and controller.

An examination of the Constitution and statutes on the subject makes it clear that such a use of public moneys is expressly prohibited by law. The constitutional amendment approved July 1, 1919 (Const. art. 16, § 2; Stats. 1919, p. 1518), authorizing issuance of the $40,000,000 bond issue, provides that the state highway act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, pp. 650, 652, § 4) relative to the advertising and sale of bonds shall control in the disposition of the bonds thereby authorized. This statute provides that the state treasurer shall sell the bonds to the highest bidder for cash at public sale, and shall not accept any bid which is less than the par value of the bonds plus accrued interest. It is for this reason that the state board of control proposes to purchase the bonds at par. Their authority to purchase bonds is found in section 679 of the Political Code, which authorizes the board of control to purchase state bonds when they have "surplus money" at their disposal for that purpose, and directs that the treasurer shall make appropriate transfers of funds upon his books in the event of such purchase from the surplus fund to the bond fund. "Surplus money," under this statute, is money agreed upon by the state treasurer and the members of the state board of control as not necessary for immediate use. Such amount so designated can be used for the purchase of bonds as therein authorized. Stephens v. State Treas., 195 Pac. 651. It is also provided in the same act (Stats. 1913, p. 564), section 3:

"Any bonds purchased or held under the provisions of this act may be sold or exchanged for other bonds of any of the classes described in section 1 of this act, and the money received from any such sale may be reinvested by the state board of control in the purchase of any such bonds; provided, that no such sale or exchange shall be made at a price which will result in a net loss to the state; and provided, further, that any interest or premium collected or received by the state from any bonds purchased or held under the provisions of this act shall be credited by the state treasury to the fund to be known as the 'bond investment fund,' which fund is hereby established. The state treasury shall semi-annually, on the last days of June and December, transfer one-half of the amount then in said fund to the general fund, and shall transfer one-half of the amount then in said fund to the state school land fund." (Italics ours.)

This legislation, like the constitutional amendment, and most legislation regulating the sale of state and municipal bonds, is predicated upon the theory that there will be purchasers found for the bonds at not less than par. Nor is any provision made in the law for a sale of bonds purchased by the state board of control which cannot be sold except at a loss. On the contrary, this constitutional amendment expressly prohibits a sale of bonds for less than par, and the statute authorizing the purchase of the bonds of the state by the state board of control expressly prohibits a sale thereof at a net loss. Thus it would be the duty of the state board of control to hold all bonds purchased by it until authorized by the Legislature to dispose of them at a loss, if such loss is a necessary incident of a sale. So far as the purchase of state bonds by the state board of control is concerned, the transaction is essentially a bookkeeping one by which surplus funds of the state, that is, funds not immediately necessary for the purpose to which they are appropriated, may be transferred to the fund which the bonds were intended to create, thus making such funds immediately available pending the actual sale of the bonds to private parties. When so sold, the money derived therefrom would replenish the surplus fund of the general fund, and be distributed therefrom when needed to the appropriate fund from which the money was originally diverted.

As the state treasurer is prohibited from selling the highway bonds at less than par, it is clear that the state board of control, in purchasing such bonds, must bid par and accrued interest. That board is in turn prohibited from selling said bonds "at a price which will result in a net loss to the state." Stats. 1913, p. 564, supra. The state board of control proposed to buy bonds at par, and, in pursuance of an understanding theretofore had with a syndicate of bond buyers, to resell to them at 93.5862 per cent. It is clear that this will result in a loss to the state of the difference between the par value of the bonds and the percentage paid by the syndicate, and it is immaterial whether that loss takes the form of an allowance to the bond buyers as commissions or what the form of such loss may be, the fact will still remain that the state, by such purchase and sale, has suffered a loss to the extent that the par value of the bonds is depreciated. The phrase "net loss to the state" relates to the difference between the purchase price of bonds paid by the state board of control, and the net returns from the sale of such bonds by them. If the net returns of the sale are less than the purchase price of the bonds, there is a net loss, and this is prohibited. The purpose of the Legislature in prohibiting a sale of bonds at a "net loss" was to prevent a loss in the several funds established by law, and temporarily transferred to the surplus fund of the general fund.

If the statute authorizing the state board of control to purchase and resell state highway bonds issued under the constitutional amendment of 1919 should be construed according to defendants' contention, so that sale could be made by such board of control at a discount below par, the statute so construed would be clearly unconstitutional, as violating the provisions of article 16, section 2, authorizing and requiring the sale of said bonds for not less than par. The fact that the Legislature has authorized the state board of control to purchase the bonds at par and sell at a discount, if we so construe the law, would not justify the sale of these bonds in violation of the constitutional requirement that they be sold at or above par. The plain intent of the constitutional requirement is that the state shall receive the par value of the bonds, and any legislation which would justify a purchase and sale by officers of the state as a means of ultimately disposing of the bonds at less than par would be clearly unconstitutional. If, therefore, the legislative provision authorizing the state board of control to purchase and sell bonds is construed as contended for by the defendants, the law would be unconstitutional so far as applied to the third state highway bond issue.

But we do not so construe the statute. It is clear that the people, in adopting the constitutional amendment, and the Legislature, in authorizing the purchase and sale of bonds by the state board of control, did not intend that these bonds should be sold at a discount either by the treasurer or by the state board of control. It is no doubt true, as suggested by the Attorney General, that no one anticipated the situation that subsequently arose because of the war, whereby state and municipal bonds bearing 4½ per cent. interest were salable on the market only when offered for less than par. On the other hand, the very purpose of the constitutional requirement that the bonds should not be sold for less than par was to anticipate such a situation by prohibiting such a sale at all, for, if there was no danger of the bonds being sold for less than par, there was no reason for making the requirement that they must be sold at par.

The defendants' answer is framed upon the theory that there will be no net loss to the state by reason of the sale of the bonds as contemplated, because, if the bonds are not sold, highway work must be suspended, and great loss will result therefrom to the state. The loss prevented by securing funds for the continuance of the work is not to be added to the selling price of the bonds to ascertain whether there has been a net loss to the state. The gain to be derived by the state from the use of the money is not an element that enters into the question of whether there has been a net loss. In determining that loss only two items are to be considered, the cost of the purchase of the state bonds by the state board of control, and the net returns from the sale thereof. If the latter are not equal to or greater than the former, the sale is not authorized. Let it be observed that we are considering only the case of state bonds, so bought and sold.

It is clear from the foregoing that the defendants have no authority to direct the payment of this money into the surplus of the general fund for the purpose of paying the difference between the par and selling value of the bonds, whether in the form of commission or otherwise. It is also clear that the legislation authorizing the respondent board to designate the fund into which this money should be paid contemplated that it should be paid into funds which, under the statute organizing said board, are under the control of that board for the creation, maintenance, and repair of state highways.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate be issued directing the defendants to designate to the treasurer and controller the fund into which this money shall be paid, which fund shall be one already existing by law for the construction, maintenance, or repair of state highways, or one created or designated by the respondent board for that purpose.

In re ANDERSON'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9071.)

1. Wills ⟸155(3)—Arguments or entreaties not enough to constitute "undue influence."

That a testator has been influenced by the arguments or entreaties is not enough to make the influence undue, there being no "undue influence" unless the pressure has reached the point where the mind of the testator gives way before it so that his will does not represent his conviction or desire, but that of another.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Undue Influence.]

2. Wills ⟸166(1)—Evidence to show undue influence on testator of normal mind and body must be very strong.

Evidence to justify setting aside a will for undue influence, consisting simply in the pressure of importunity and entreaty, must be very strong in the case of a testator of normal strength of mind, in the full possession of his faculties, unimpaired by infirmity.

3. Wills ⟸166(12)—Evidence of undue influence must prove circumstances inconsistent with spontaneity of testator's act.

Evidence of undue influence upon a testator must show that pressure was brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act, and, though it may be circumstantial, it must do more than raise a suspicion, but must amount to proof of circumstances, inconsistent with the spontaneous character of the testator's act.

4. Wills ⟸166(5)—Will, considering amount of testatrix's estate, held not unnatural.

Where testatrix, after making her will, received considerable property from her husband, that she gave all her estate to her aunt instead of to her husband, if no child survived her, or that she gave one-half to her aunt instead of all to her child if one survived her, were not so unnatural, as to be inconsistent with the claim that the will was her spontaneous act, considering the small amount of the estate at the time of making the will the validity of which must be determined by the situation at the time it was executed.

5. Wills ⟸166(5)—Testamentary request that testatrix's aunt be made guardian of child, not unnatural.

A provision of a will, requesting that testatrix's aunt, the beneficiary of her will, be made guardian of her child, instead of her husband, was not so unnatural as to be inconsistent with the claim that the will was testatrix's spontaneous act, considering the old age of testatrix's husband and the sex of the husband and aunt.

6. Wills ⟸166(2)—Evidence held insufficient to show undue influence of aunt, made beneficiary of niece's will.

Where the relations existing between a testatrix and her aunt, the sole beneficiary of her will, were as close as those usually existing between a mother and daughter, and the aunt accompanied the testatrix to the office of the attorney, who drafted the will, but remained outside the room while testatrix conferred with him, and there was no evidence of the aunt importuning or otherwise exercising any pressure upon testatrix to make a will in her favor, and thereafter testatrix and her husband moved elsewhere where they lived together apart from the aunt for some time, the evidence was insufficient to show the exercise of undue influence by the aunt.

7. Wills ⟸163(2)—No presumption of undue influence from intimate relation between testatrix and beneficiary.

That an intimate and affectionate relation existed between a testatrix and her aunt, sole beneficiary under her will, did not give rise to a presumption of undue influence.

8. Wills ⟸163(5)—Acts of beneficiary held not such activity in procurement of will as to create presumption of undue influence.

The activity of testatrix's aunt, in the procurement of a will making her the beneficiary, was not such as to raise a presumption of undue influence, where she obtained a letter of introduction to the lawyer who prepared the draft of the will, and went with the testatrix to his office, where she remained in an outer room during testatrix's interview with him, as the activity necessary to give rise to such a presumption must be in the use of the relation between the beneficiary and testatrix for the overcoming of the will of the latter.

9. Wills ⟸53(2) — Declarations indicating mental state at time of utterance inadmissible, where such mental state not germane.

Declarations, indicating declarant's intention, feeling, or other mental state being competent only when they indicate such mental state at the time of their utterance, are not admissible when declarant's mental state at that time is not germane to the issue.

10. Wills ⟸165(2)—Declarations of testatrix some time after execution of will inadmissible, facts shown being immaterial and prejudicial, on issue of undue influence.

In the contest of a will on the ground of undue influence, testimony of a nurse in attendance on testatrix some months after the making of the will that she heard decedent praying God to forgive her sin and help make it right with her husband, and testimony of her husband that she several times requested him to get an attorney to draw some papers undoing an unjust act toward him, which her aunt and uncle caused her to do, were inadmissible, being hearsay, and indicating only that testatrix had changed her mind and regretted the will she had made; such facts being prejudicial and immaterial on the issue of undue influence at the time of the execution of the will.

11. Wills ⟸165(4)—On issue of undue influence testatrix's letter to beneficiary, stating will had been made at latter's request, inadmissible.

On an issue as to undue influence, a letter by testatrix to her aunt, the beneficiary under the will, to the effect that the will had been made at the latter's request, was not admissible, being merely a declaration as to a past event, and not indicative of the condition of mind of the testatrix at the time she made the will.

12. Wills ⟸165(4)—On issue of undue influence testatrix's request that husband protect her against her aunt, the beneficiary, held admissible.

In the contest of a will on the ground of undue influence, a request by testatrix of her husband that he protect her against her aunt, sole beneficiary under the will, was admissible, though hearsay, it indicating her then state of mind toward her aunt, which was material, having a reasonably direct bearing on what her mental attitude may have been when she executed the will not long before.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Proceeding by Cora T. Jenkins, to probate the olographic will of Hazel Anderson, deceased. From an order in favor of contestant, Henry Anderson, refusing the admission to probate of the will, proponent appeals. Reversed.

R. L. Thompson and R. M. Barrett, both of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

J. R. Leppo and Kellogg & Kyle, all of Santa Rosa, and Roy W. Stoddard, of Reno, Nev., for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal from an order refusing the admission to probate of a certain olographic instrument purporting to be the will of Hazel Anderson, deceased. The order was made after formal contest and jury trial. The authenticity of the instrument was not questioned, and the grounds of contest assigned were that it had been executed under the undue influence of the proponent, who was the sole beneficiary and is the appellant here, that it had been executed when the testatrix was of unsound mind, and that it had been revoked. At the trial a nonsuit was granted as to the two latter grounds, and the cause submitted to the jury upon the single issue as to undue influence. Upon this issue the jury found against the instrument, and upon their verdict the order appealed from was made. Of the grounds urged for reversal but two require consideration. They are (1) that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, and (2) errors in the admission of evidence. The first of these grounds necessitates a review of the evidence.

The proponent of the will is an aunt of the decedent, and the contestant is the decedent's husband. The decedent had been left an orphan when very young and had been brought up in the family of her aunt. The very closest relations existed between them, fully as close as those usually existing between a mother and an affectionate and tractable daughter, and they regarded each other as if that were in fact their relation. The deceased was a woman of education, intelligence, and individuality, and there is not present in the case any element of the control or domination of a weak or subnormal mind by a stronger or more vigorous personality. There was some testimony as to occasions when the deceased and her aunt had differed about minor matters, some of them purely personal to the deceased, such as matters of dress, and the deceased had given way to her aunt. But there was nothing more shown than the deference which, as between mother and daughter, the younger woman might very reasonably and properly show to the opinions of the older. The case is but one of a close and intimate relation, as of mother and grown daughter, with no more of subserviency on the part of one to the other than may naturally and properly exist in such a relation.

At the time of the decedent's marriage the parties were living in Reno, Nev. The aunt's husband was managing a general store there, assisted by his wife, and the niece was employed in the store. There she met the contestant, who was one of the principal stockholders of the corporation owning the store, and married him. He was very much older than she, he being 67 at the time and she 27. He had been married previously, and had a family of grown children. He was also a man of wealth, while she had nothing.

Something over a year after the marriage, the deceased became pregnant, and in February, 1918, she and her aunt came to San Francisco to make purchases in preparation for the expected child and to attend to some other matters. It had been planned that the husband should accompany them, but his wife informed him that her aunt preferred that they should go alone, and he permitted them to do so. While the two women were thus alone in San Francisco, the instrument in question was executed. The decedent's mother had died in childbirth, and the decedent greatly feared the same fate for herself, and the will was undoubtedly made by her because of her approaching confinement and the danger incident to it. Her only estate at the time consisted in some personal belongings and shares of stock of the value of about $6,000 in the corporation owning the store at Reno managed by her aunt's husband, all of which the decedent's husband had given her from time to time after their marriage.

The will made by the decedent under the foregoing circumstances gave one half of her estate to her aunt, and the other half to any child or children that might survive her. If no child survived her, the whole estate was to go to her aunt. The will also named the aunt as executrix, and expressed the wish that she be appointed the guardian of the estate of any child who might survive the decedent. The will also stated that the decedent made no provision for her husband for the reason that he had ample means of his own and needed no provision from her separate estate.

There is no evidence of the aunt importuning the decedent or otherwise exercising any pressure upon her either to make a will or to make one in her aunt's favor. All that appears is that the decedent before coming to San Francisco had expressed a wish to make a will, and had told her aunt that she wished her to have what she had when she died. The sole witness as to the immediate circumstances under which the will was executed was the aunt, who was called for the purpose of testifying upon the point by the contestant himself. He is, of course, not bound by her testimony (section 2049, Code Civ. Proc.), and the jury were at liberty to reject any of it that did not seem to them worthy of belief, but, rejecting it, there is no evidence to take its place, and, as was said of a similar case in Estate of Kilborn, 162 Cal. 4, 120 Pac. 762, the case is without evidence upon the point. The circumstances as testified to by the aunt, were that shortly after the arrival of the two women in San Francisco, at the suggestion of the niece, the aunt made inquiry of a woman, with whom they had business, as to a competent lawyer. The woman recommended a Mr. Clark, a reputable attorney, and gave the aunt a letter of introduction to him. The aunt and the niece presented this letter together, the aunt asked him about some matters of her own, and then retired from the room while the niece consulted him about her will. The aunt remained without the room during the interview between the lawyer and the niece, except that at one time she was called in by the niece, who wished to inquire about a date. When the ladies left, the lawyer was to prepare a draft of a will which would express the wishes of the niece as told to him by her. This he did, and the ladies later returned, and the niece obtained the draft. From this draft she prepared the will in question here, writing it in her room one afternoon when the aunt was out, and putting it in her aunt's suit case in a sealed envelope. On her aunt's return she told her what she had done, and asked her to put the will in the safe of the store at Reno. The aunt kept the will until her return to Reno, and then placed it in the safe as requested.

There was also considerable evidence as to events occurring subsequent to the execution of the will, but for the most part this evidence is wholly immaterial upon the issue of undue influence, and yet is of a character to influence the jury strongly against the will, since it indicates that the decedent immediately before her death had changed her intention as to the disposition of her property and desired to revoke the will, a desire which her untimely death alone prevented her from carrying into effect. It seems that at the end of their stay in San Francisco the two ladies went to Sacramento, where they were met by the decedent's husband. From there the aunt returned to Reno, and the niece and her husband went to Santa Rosa pursuant to a plan they had to settle in California, if they found a place agreeable to them. They found Santa Rosa agreeable, and the husband purchased a home and a farm there at an aggregate cost of about $18,000. These he had conveyed to his wife, so that at her death her estate consisted of this property as well as of the $6,000 in stock and the personal belongings which she had at the time she made the will. The husband and wife remained at Santa Rosa, the aunt visiting the niece but once and then for but a few days, and at the suggestion of the husband, in order that some one might be with his wife while he was away on business. Some three months after the making of the will, the expected child was born, but born dead. The mother was able to be about within a few days, but blood poisoning then came on, and she died on the eighth or the ninth day after the birth.

A nurse who was in attendance testified over the objection of the proponent of the will that some days after the birth she found the decedent by the side of her bed praying and repeating over and over, "Dear God, just now forgive my sin, and help me to make it right with Mr. Anderson."

The contestant, over the objection of the proponent, was permitted to testify to a number of conversations with his wife occurring after her confinement. According to his testimony, she several times requested him to get an attorney who might draw some papers undoing an unjust act that she had done toward him, and which her aunt and uncle were the cause of her doing. He put her off, saying that they could go to Reno and fix the matter directly with the aunt and uncle. In reply to this suggestion she asked that in case they went to Reno he protect her, as her aunt and uncle would be very cruel to her. Two days before her death she prepared a preliminary draft of a letter to her aunt and also a letter. The letter was mailed by her husband at her insistence, but was not received until after her death, and on its receipt was destroyed by her uncle. The preliminary draft read:

"June 13—1918, Santa Rosa, Cal.

"Dear Auntie: Will you kindly forward the original will which you witnessed in San Francisco when we were down there. I have not been able to sleep at night and feel when I get these papers here and get that ignoble act undone.

"Hope you and children are well.

"Hazel Lenore Anderson."

The letter itself, according to the contestant's testimony, read:

"Santa Rosa, California, June 13, 1918.

"Dear Auntie: Will you kindly forward those papers, which at your request was drawn up in San Francisco. I wish to revoke that ignoble act done, and forward same to me immediately. I have not been able to sleep since you left me.

"Hazel Lenore Anderson."

Although the decedent had expressed her wish to her husband to undo an "ignoble" act which she had done toward him, and although the husband read both the foregoing preliminary draft and the letter itself before the letter was mailed, and the matter was the subject of more than one conversation between them, the fact, according to his testimony, is that he did not know that his wife had reference to a will she had made, and did not know until after her death that she had made a will.

[1-3] The foregoing being the facts and circumstances of the case as shown by the evidence, the question presented by the appellant's first contention is, Are they sufficient to prove affirmatively, as a conclusion fairly to be drawn from them, that it was actually the fact that in executing the will the mind and will of the testatrix were overpowered by her aunt? Viewing the question purely as one of fact to be determined from the facts and circumstances shown in evidence, it would seem plain enough that the evidence is sufficient to raise only a suspicion, if even that, that the mind of the testatrix may have been overpowered, and is not sufficient to justify as the basis for judicial determination and action the definite conclusion that it was in fact overpowered. It is no easy thing to overpower the mind of a normal person in full possession of his senses by the mere pressure of importunities and entreaties, and there is certainly not even a suspicion in the present case that any more drastic or compelling form of pressure was used. The mere fact that one person has been influenced by the arguments or entreaties of another is not enough to make the influence an undue one. It is not undue unless the pressure has reached a point where the mind of the person subjected to it gives way before it so that the action of such person, taken in response to the pressure, does not in fact represent his conviction or desire, brought about perhaps by argument and entreaty, but represents in truth but the conviction or desire of another. As was said in Estate of Donovan, 140 Cal. 390, 394, 73 Pac. 1081, quoting from Chaplin:

"The true test of undue influence is that it overcomes the will without convincing the judgment."

This can happen but rarely in cases of persons of normal strength of mind in the full possession of their faculties, unimpaired by infirmity. The evidence which would justify the conclusion that it had occurred in any particular case of that character would have to be very strong indeed. This, of course, is not true where the mind of the person subjected to the pressure is naturally weak or is impaired by sickness, extreme physical weakness, or some other cause, and it will be found upon examination that in nearly every case where a will has been set aside as the result of undue influence consisting simply in the pressure of importunity and entreaty, there has existed the element of a mind and will weak or for some reason impaired. That element is not present here, and it is simply incredible, upon the facts presented in the case before us, that the mind of the testatrix, a woman of mature years and of at least normal strength of mind, intelligent, in the full possession of her faculties, and in good health, was overcome by the pressure of importunities and entreaties on the part of her aunt. There is in fact no evidence that such pressure was exerted. The outstanding features of the case are simply: That the testatrix was a mature and intelligent woman of sound mind; that she was married to a man of wealth very much older than herself; that she was devotedly attached to her aunt, whom she regarded as her mother; that she had a little property of her own, given her by her husband, consisting almost entirely of stock in the corporation managed by her aunt's husband; that she was expecting a child, and was fearful of the result of her confinement; that she wished to make provision as to the disposition of her estate and the care of her possible child in case she should die; that under the circumstances she made a will after consultation with a lawyer, and when she and the aunt were away from their home together; and that the will provided for the division of her estate between the aunt and her child, if there should be one, and otherwise for its all going to the aunt, requested that the aunt be appointed guardian of the child, and stated that no provision was made for her husband, as he had ample means of his own.

It is doubtful if these circumstances would justly raise even a suspicion. Much less do they come up to the test prescribed in Re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 17, 30 Pac. 101, a test which has been reiterated and reapplied in numerous subsequent decisions by this court. It was there said at page 33 of 95 Cal. at page 106 of 30 Pac.:

"Evidence must be produced that pressure was brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act; but this evidence itself need not be direct. Circumstantial evidence is sufficient. It must, however, do more than raise a suspicion. It must amount to proof, and such evidence has the force of proof only when circumstances are proven which are inconsistent with the claim that the will was the spontaneous act of the alleged testator. I think there is nothing beyond suspicion shown here."

[4, 5] Applying this test, What one of the circumstances in this case is there which is "inconsistent with the claim that the will was the spontaneous act of the alleged testatrix?" The only one upon which stress is laid is the provisions of the will itself, and in particular that it should give the estate to the decedent's aunt instead of to her husband, from whom she had received it all. But when we consider the small amount of the estate she was disposing of, consisting as it did when she made the will only of personal belongings and stock in the store corporation to the amount of $6,000, and the fact that her husband, as she says, had ample means, it was not unnatural that she should wish her little to go to her aunt and foster mother. This situation was considerably changed by the subsequent very substantial gifts to her of the home and farm at Santa Rosa, and it may well be that it was due in some part to this that she subsequently desired to revoke the will. But the validity of the will must be determined by the situation as it existed at the very time it was executed, and the situation then was that she was disposing of a comparatively small amount. Stress is also laid on the provision of the will requesting that the aunt be made guardian of her child. This also is a not unnatural provision, when we consider the ages and sexes of the parties. The husband was 69, and a man, and the aunt was 47 and a woman. It was not unnatural that the testatrix should expect and hope that it would be the latter who would have the bringing up of her infant child in case she herself should pass away. The only feature of the will whose naturalness can be at all justly questioned is not that it gives the testatrix's estate to her aunt instead of to her husband, but that it gives one-half to her aunt if the child survives, instead of giving it all to the child. But here again, when we consider the small amount that would be left to the aunt in such a case, some $3,000, and the burden that would be assumed by the aunt, if the raising of the child were intrusted to her, any unnaturalness of the will in this respect largely, if not entirely, disappears.

[6] The circumstances of this case are not dissimilar from those in numerous other cases which have from time to time been presented to this court, and so far as we are aware it has been held without exception that such circumstances are insufficient to justify a finding of undue influence. In the very case from which we have just quoted of In re McDevitt, the facts were that the testator was an old man, an invalid suffering from cancer, from which he finally died, a bachelor living with a brother, that his will was executed at the house of this brother, and left everything to him and to his children to the exclusion of the children of two deceased brothers living in the same city, and with whom the testator was on friendly terms. There was also evidence that the brother, who was the beneficiary, had abused the testator, and that the latter was very much afraid of him. The only particular in which the facts in the case differ from those before us in a respect favorable to the contestant here is that the brother was not present, even outside the room, when the testator was consulting his lawyer and the will was executed. The jury found that the will was executed under the undue influence of the brother, and on appeal the verdict was set aside as not supported by the evidence. Among other things pertinent to the present discussion contained in the opinion is the following:

"General influence, not brought to bear upon the testamentary act, however strong or controlling, is not undue influence. There must be proof that the influence was used directly to procure the will, except in those cases where the beneficiaries or parties instrumental in having the will executed sustained a confidential relation to the testator. This case is not within the exception."

In Re Langford, 108 Cal. 608, 41 Pac. 701, the testator left the bulk of his estate to a second wife to the practical exclusion of his children by a former marriage. The jury found that the will was executed under the undue influence of the wife, and on appeal the verdict was set aside as not supported by the evidence. There was evidence that the testator habitually deferred to the wishes of his wife, that he appeared to be afraid of her, and that he declared on several occasions that his children should have his property when he died. The court said of the case, as might be said of the present one:

"This is not the case where a man makes a will upon his deathbed, surrounded by those who turn out to be his devisees; nor is it a case where a weak person at the time of the execution of his will is teased and tormented by the importunities of relatives who do not allow him to be out of their sight, or to have any opportunity for quiet thought or independent advice."

The single particular in which the facts were less favorable to the contestant than those appearing here is that the will was executed at the office of the testator's lawyer, where he had gone alone. This, of course, is an important feature, but its importance is much reduced in the present case by the fact that for the whole period of three months between the execution of the will and the confinement of the testatrix she was, except for a few days, with her husband and away from her aunt, and was not even intending to return to live near her aunt. Any element of undue influence must have been removed; she had ample time to change the disposition she had made, and yet there is no suggestion that such change was desired by her until after her confinement. As was said in the Langford Case:

"He had ample opportunity to fully and freely think out what he wanted to do, and to change any conclusion he might have arrived at, if he so desired."

In Estate of Calef, 139 Cal. 673, 73 Pac. 539, the testatrix had made a will giving a substantial legacy to the contestant and making only a small contingent provision for one Mabel Tickell. Thereafter she made a codicil, giving Mrs. Tickell a substantial amount and correspondingly reducing the legacy to the contestant. Both will and codicil were offered for probate, and the contestant contested the validity of the codicil on the grounds that it had been executed under the undue influence of Mrs. Tickell, and that the testatrix was of unsound mind at the time. The jury found against the codicil on both grounds. It appeared that the testatrix was a widow without children. Her husband, however, had had three children by a former marriage, one of whom was the mother of Mrs. Tickell. The testatrix always had great affection for this stepdaughter and her daughter, and called them her daughter and granddaughter, and treated them as such. About 2 years after making the will she suffered an attack of paralysis, from which she finally died. Immediately after suffering this attack she went to live at the home of her stepdaughter, the mother of Mrs. Tickell, and remained there until her death. Shortly before going there she had told her lawyer to prepare a draft of the codicil in question and send it to her at her stepdaughter's home. This the lawyer did, and upon receipt of the draft the testatrix made a copy of it in her own hand as an olographic instrument. At the time she did this Mrs. Tickell was with her, and, the eyesight of the testatrix being bad, read the draft to her. There was also evidence of unsoundness of mind, although how substantial the evidence was does not appear. About a year after the making of this codicil the testatrix died. It must be evident that in nearly every particular the circumstances of this case were more favorable to the contestant than those of the present case, but, nevertheless, the court held that they were insufficient to justify the verdict of undue influence.

In Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. 257, 104 Pac. 6, the testator had made a will substantially preferring one son to his other children. The evidence for the contestants showed that the will was executed on the day preceding the testator's death, that he was a man of advanced years, in poor health, and greatly weakened mentally, and that the testator reposed great confidence in the son who was preferred, and the latter had from time to time importuned his father to settle his affairs. The will was executed by the testator at his home after consultation with a lawyer. The son accompanied the lawyer to the house when he went there for the purpose of having the will executed, but was not in the room either at the preliminary consultation or at the time of execution. It was held that the evidence did not justify a finding that the will had been executed under the undue influence of the son.

In Estate of Lavinburg, 161 Cal. 536, 119 Pac. 915, the testator, a man of advanced years, had made a will leaving the bulk of his estate to two daughters to the exclusion of a son to whom he was much attached and of two other daughters. The will was attacked as made under the undue influence of one of the daughters benefited, and the jury found against the will. It appeared that the testator had made a second and very unhappy marriage; that the will was made when he was in serious trouble with his wife and greatly perturbed because of it; that he placed the utmost confidence in the daughter who was claimed to have unduly influenced him; that immediately prior to the making of the will he had transferred to her a large part, if not practically all, of his estate, to hold as trustee for him; that she suggested at the time of this transfer that he should make a will, and he immediately consulted a lawyer for that purpose and did so, and that the daughter exerted great influence over her father and boasted of it. It was held that the evidence was no more than sufficient to raise a suspicion, and did not amount to proof of undue influence, and the verdict of the jury was set aside. It is to be noted that in the particular that the daughter not only occupied a relation of affection and great confidence toward her father, but was as well an actual trustee for him for a considerable portion of his estate, the facts were stronger in favor of the contestant than in the present case. On the other hand, it should be said that the will was executed wholly without the presence of the daughter, and importance is attached in the opinion of the court to that fact. It did appear, however, that the daughter had gone with him to the trust company, whose attorney prepared the will on the occasion when he consulted that attorney in regard to making a will.

In Estate of Morcel, 162 Cal. 188, 121 Pac. 733, the testatrix left her entire estate to her husband to the exclusion of her daughter by another man. The jury found that the will had been executed under the undue influence of the husband, who not only lived with the testatrix on terms of affection and confidence, but who had been intrusted by her with her business affairs, she being ignorant and illiterate. Of the details of the case in general, it is necessary to say only that they were no less favorable to the contestant than the circumstances of the present case. There is one particular, however, that is worthy of note, and that is the important particular of the circumstances immediately surrounding the execution of the will. It is worthy of note because those circumstances closely resemble those surrounding the execution of the present will and to the extent to which they differ are more favorable to the contestant. The circumstances were that the testatrix's husband not only went with her when she went to the office of their lawyer for the purpose of making a will, but, unlike the aunt in this case, he actually remained in the room with her when she gave instructions as to the provisions she desired, and executed the will drawn in accord with those instructions. The court, nevertheless, set aside the verdict of undue influence as not justified by the evidence.

In this immediate connection, the decision in Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 Pac. 932, should be noted. There a widow of advanced years, ill and about to undergo a severe operation, made a will in favor of her husband's brother and sister and her housekeeper to the exclusion of her heirs. The estate was large, and the will was contested on the grounds of unsoundness of mind and of undue influence on the part of the three beneficiaries, particularly on the part of the brother-in-law. The contestants were nonsuited, and on appeal the order of nonsuit was upheld. The physician of the testatrix testified that her mind was somewhat impaired by age, and there was also the evidence of acquaintances that in their opinion she was of unsound mind. It also appeared that the brother-in-law had been her business adviser and manager ever since the death of her husband, so that a fiduciary relation was involved as well. The circumstances surrounding the execution of the will closely resemble those now before us. A lawyer was summoned to the house of the testatrix by the brother-in-law, and, going there, was taken to the room of the testatrix, where there was also present one of the other beneficiaries. The lawyer and the testatrix were, however, left alone while she gave him instructions about the will she desired. The next morning she went to the lawyer's office to execute the will, accompanied by the brother-in-law, who, however, was not present in the inner office when the will was executed. If a nonsuit were proper in the case of a will executed under these circumstances in favor of a fiduciary agent by an ill woman of advanced years, whose mind was somewhat impaired by age, certainly a nonsuit would have been proper in the present case.

In Estate of Gleason, 164 Cal. 756, 130 Pac. 872, the will involved was one whereby the testator left his entire estate to his wife to the exclusion of his sister. It appeared that the testator at the time of his marriage was a man of 60, while his wife was only 22, and even at that youthful age had had such a varied matrimonial career that the testator was her third husband; that he had been married before, and had been devotedly attached to his first wife, with whom he had lived happily for 30 years, and had married the second wife within a year after her death and upon a short acquaintance; that he had numerous sick spells, for relief from which he was accustomed to take morphine; that the second wife secured the will within a few hours after its execution, inquired of one of the witnesses to it if he had in fact witnessed it, and then placed it in her safe deposit box, and that within seven weeks after the execution of the will the testator died. It also appeared that while the will had been executed without the presence of the wife and at the office of a notary public where the testator had gone for the purpose, the testator returned to the office of the notary within a few minutes in a state approaching nervous collapse, and, referring to the will and to the fact that he had required the notary to acknowledge its execution as well as to witness it, said:

"But I had to do it. I had to do it right or hell would pop at home; I could not stay there."

Certainly these circumstances and such evidence go much further to justify a suspicion at least of undue influence than those of the present case, but it was held that they were insufficient to have justified a finding of undue influence by the second wife.

It would serve no useful purpose to discuss the comparatively few decisions of this court in which an order setting aside a will for undue influence has been upheld. Suffice it to say that in practically all of them there entered either the element of a weak, unsound, or impaired mind, including a mind impaired by great physical weakness, or the element of a will procured by one who occupied a fiduciary relation to the decedent, who was not a natural object of the decedent's testamentary bounty, and who yet benefited substantially by the will. Examples of the first class of cases are Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 Pac. 598; Estate of De Laveaga, 165 Cal. 607, 133 Pac. 307, and Estate of Jones, 166 Cal. 108, 135 Pac. 288. An example of the second class is Ross v. Conway, 92 Cal. 632, 28 Pac. 785. Not infrequently both elements are present, as was true in Estate of Nutt, 181 Cal. 522, 185 Pac. 393. Not infrequently there enters also the element of some fraud or deceit practiced by one occupying a confidential relation. None of these elements is present in the case at bar.

[7] The contestant contends that because of the intimate and affectionate relation which existed between the decedent and her aunt there arises a presumption of undue influence. This feature was present in most, if not all, of the cases which we have just reviewed at length, and it is apparent that if there be such a presumption here and it is controlling, it was likewise present in those cases, and should have been there held to be controlling, and a different result reached. In many of them, furthermore, the same contention as to a presumption was made and was discussed and overruled. See, for example, Estate of Langford, 108 Cal. 608, 622, 41 Pac. 701. It has also been presented in a number of cases we have not referred to. Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 117 Pac. 532, is an example. There, a mother made a will giving her property to two sons to the exclusion of a third. The relation between one of the sons who was a beneficiary and his widowed mother was not only the close relation which naturally exists between mother and son, but the son had also had charge for years of all her business affairs. There was no evidence whatever as to the circumstances under which the will was executed and the contestant, the disinherited son, contended that because of the relations between his mother and his brother a presumption of undue influence arose which the latter had to overcome. The jury found against the will, and on appeal the verdict was set aside, the court saying, at page 461 of 160 Cal., at page 536 of 117 Pac., in regard to the claim that a presumption of undue influence existed:

"But no warrant is given to a jury to find that undue influence was exerted at the time the will was made from proof merely of such relation alone. Undoubtedly the relation between respondent and his mother was affectionate and confidential and that [sic] he would have a general influence over his mother proceeding from such relation. But the existence of such relation and this general influence raises no presumption that undue advantage was taken of it by respondent. There is no legal suspicion of undue influence arising from the existence of such a relationship, which imposes upon the son the necessity, when a will in his favor is attacked, of assuming the burden of proof that he had not unduly influenced his mother in making the will. The confidential relation and the opportunity afforded therefrom to exercise undue influence may, of course, always be taken into consideration with other evidence, when the question of undue influence is in issue. But the relation itself, and opportunity, are not sufficient alone to warrant a finding that undue influence was actually exerted. Proof, merely, that confidential relations existed between a testator and the main beneficiary under his will is not sufficient to destroy its validity, but there must be some proof, in addition to the relation, of facts or circumstances showing the use of that relation, at the time the will was made, overcoming the free will and desire of the testator, in order to invalidate the testament."

See, also, Estate of Baird, 176 Cal. 381, 168 Pac. 561.

[8] It is also claimed, however, that there was present in the case at bar the element of activity on the part of the aunt in the procurement of the will. The only evidence of such activity is that she obtained a letter of introduction to the lawyer who prepared the draft of the will, and went with the testatrix to his office and there remained in an outer room during the interview between the testatrix and the lawyer. But this is not the activity in the procurement of the will which is necessary in order to give rise to a presumption of undue influence. The activity must be in the use of the relation for the overcoming of the will of the testator. As was said in Estate of Ricks (to quote again):

"There must be some proof, in addition to the relation, of facts or circumstances showing the use of that relation at the time the will was made overcoming the free will and desire of the testator, in order to invalidate the testament."

It is also worthy of note in this connection that in Estate of Morcel, 162 Cal. 188, 121

Pac. 733, heretofore referred to, where the husband was accused of procuring the will of his wife by undue influence, the same activity as that shown here appeared, that is, the husband went with the wife to the lawyer's office when the will was drawn and executed (in fact he remained in the room during the whole time), the same contention as to a presumption arising was made as is made here, and the contention is directly overruled. Other cases of well-nigh identical facts where the same contention was made are Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414, 423, 73 Pac. 1070, 74 Pac. 441; Estate of Calef, 139 Cal. 673, 73 Pac. 539; and Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 Pac. 932.

Our conclusion then is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict of undue influence.

[9] As to the declarations of the decedent admitted over the objection of the proponent, the contention that their admission was error must also be sustained as to some. Such declarations were hearsay, pure and simple. The only exception to the rule against hearsay within which they could come is the exception which admits declarations indicative of the declarant's intention, feeling, or other mental state, including his bodily feelings. But such declarations are competent only when they are indicative of the declarant's mental state at the very time of their utterance, and only for the purpose of showing that mental state. It follows from this that unless his mental state at that time is material to the issue under investigation, the declarations are not admissible, even though they do show his mental state at that time, not because they are not competent for that purpose, but because that purpose is not germane to the issue. These general propositions are settled by a multitude of authorities, including some where the issue was one as to undue influence in the making of a will. See In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 296, 44 Pac. 577; In re Kaufman, 117 Cal. 288, 49 Pac. 192, 59 Am. St. Rep. 179; Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 Pac. 598; Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 117 Pac. 532; Estate of Gleason, 164 Cal. 756, 130 Pac. 872; Estate of Jones, 166 Cal. 108, 135 Pac. 288. Now the declarations of the testatrix admitted in the present case were admitted on the theory that they were competent only to show her state of mind when uttered, and the jury were so charged. But although admitted for this purpose alone, most of the declarations do not come within the exception to the hearsay rule. As may be seen from the foregoing statement of the exception, in order that a declaration be within it, two things are requisite: (a) The declaration must be indicative of the mental state of the declarant at the very time of utterance, and (b) his or her mental state at that time must be material to an issue in the cause, i. e., have a reasonable evidentiary bearing upon such issue.

[10] The declarations in the present case are of three sorts: First, there are the declarations indicative simply of the fact that at the time they were made, some three months after the execution of the will, the testatrix had changed her mind in regard to the disposition she wished to make of her property, and regretted the will she had made. If that change of mind and regret had been material, evidence of the declarations would have been competent. The point is that the fact that she had changed her mind and regretted what she had done was not material. It made no difference whether she had or not. The only evidentiary bearing of the fact on the issue before the jury, that of undue influence at the time of the execution of the will, lay in the possibility of reasoning from the fact that the testatrix had changed her mind and regretted what she had done that she had possibly acted only under undue pressure in the first instance. But this bearing is exceedingly slight and remote, or, in other words, the probative value of the fact that she had changed her mind as showing that she had not acted freely in the first instance, is almost, if not quite, nil. On the other hand, the fact that the testatrix had changed her mind was one which, if put before the jury, would almost certainly affect them greatly, and would in and of itself be given great weight by them, regardless of what its bearing on the real issue before them might or might not be. Under such circumstances, where the true evidentiary bearing of the evidence is at best slight and remote, and yet the evidence is of a nature such as to make it very prejudicial to the party against whom it is offered, the evidence should be excluded. See Adkins v. Brett, 193 Pac. 251.

[11] The second sort of declaration is the one contained in the letter by the testatrix to her aunt to the effect that the will had been made at the latter's request. This was not properly admissible for a reason just the converse of that applicable to declarations of the first sort. The fact declared, that the will was made at the request of the aunt, did have a very direct bearing on the issue in the case, and was quite material. But the declaration of this fact was not admissible because it was merely a declaration as to a past event, and was not indicative of the condition of mind of the testatrix at the time she made it. It was therefore not within the exception to the hearsay rule. Estate of Jones, 166 Cal. 108, 117, 135 Pac. 288.

[12] The third sort of declaration is the request by the testatrix of her husband that if they returned to Reno he protect her against her aunt and uncle, as they would be cruel toward her. This is the only declaration which meets both requirements necessary in order to bring a declaration within the exception. It (a) indicated her then state of mind toward her aunt, and (b) her then state of mind as so indicated was material, since the fact that she then feared her aunt had a reasonably direct bearing on what her mental attitude toward her aunt may have been at a previous and not far distant time, when she executed the will. Order reversed.

BOOLE v. UNION MARINE INS. CO., Limited, et al. (Civ. 3784.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 11, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 9, 1921.)

1. Insurance ⟸147(4)—Policy may incorporate law of foreign state.

A contract by an insurance company made in one state and executed elsewhere may, by its terms, incorporate the law of another state and make its provisions controlling upon both the insurer and the insured.

2. Insurance ⟸147(4)—Policy may stipulate that it be governed by foreign law.

The general rule is that, in the absence of statutory prohibition, the parties may stipulate that the policy shall be construed and governed by the laws, usages, and customs of a foreign state, and such laws, usages, and customs as are applicable shall be deemed to be a part of the written contract.

3. Insurance ⟸147(4) — Stipulation making marine policy subject to English law not contrary to public policy.

A marine policy stipulation that the English law should govern in determining what should constitute a constructive total loss under the policy held not violative of public policy, notwithstanding the provisions of Civ. Code, §§ 2705, 2717, as to what constitutes a constructive total loss, such provisions not being mandatory upon the parties.

4. Contracts ⟸167—Provisions of Code as to contract rights may be waived.

Generally, under Civ. Code, § 3268, except where otherwise declared, the provisions of the Civil Code, with respect to the rights and obligations under contracts, are subordinate to the parties' expressed intention, and the benefit of such provision may be waived by any party entitled thereto, unless such waiver would contravene public policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by W. A. Boole against the Union Marine Insurance Company, Limited, and another. From judgment for less relief than demanded, and an order denying plaintiff's motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Appeal from order denying new trial dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

Samuel Knight, F. Eldred Boland, and C. Irving Wright, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Farnham P. Griffiths and McCutchen, Willard, Mannon & Greene, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff sought to recover under two policies of insurance issued by the defendants, covering chartered freight on the oil barge Pinta, which was sunk in San Francisco Bay. The jury found that the barge was not such a constructive total loss as to entitle the plaintiff to recover under the terms of the policies, and returned a verdict in his favor for expenses incurred by him in raising the barge, but against him for the other sums asked. Judgment was duly entered. A motion for a new trial was made by plaintiff, and denied.

The judgment on the verdict was entered June 19, 1914. Appeal therefrom was not taken until October 15, 1919. On the same day there was taken an appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, which was made on September 15, 1919.

In this court the parties have proceeded upon the theory that the proper appeal to be considered is that taken from the order denying the motion for a new trial. We think not. The case falls squarely within the ruling of a recent decision of the Supreme Court, wherein it was held on facts identical with those presented in the case at bar that the only appeal to be considered was the appeal from the judgment. On the authority of that case, the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is dismissed. Wilcox v. Hardisty, 177 Cal. 752, 171 Pac. 947.

The policies of insurance issued by the defendants to the plaintiff provide that all claims for loss shall be adjusted according to the English law and practice, and that the settlement thereof shall be made in conformity with the laws and customs of England. Conceiving these clauses of the policies to govern the adjustment of the loss in this case, the court instructed the jury that the question of plaintiff's right to recover under his claim of a constructive total loss must be determined by the laws and customs of England, and that under such law there is a constructive total loss of a ship only when the cost of repairs exceeds the value of the vessel when repaired. It was stipulated that this was a correct statement of the English law, which differs from the California law, which provides that a constructive total loss of a vessel occurs when the cost of repairs would exceed one-half the value of the vessel. Sections 2705 and 2717, Civ. Code. It was admitted at the trial that the Pinta was not a constructive total loss under the English law, which was the basis of the court's instruction, and the resulting judgment for the defendants.

Appellant contends, in the first place, that the clauses of the insurance policies requiring that all claims for loss shall be adjusted in conformity with the English law and practice, and that all settlements thereof must be made in conformity with the laws and customs of England, do not, either expressly or by implication, exclude the California Code provisions as to what constitutes a constructive total loss; but that the claims arising under such policies shall be settled in accordance with the laws and customs of England only when such laws and customs are not in conflict with the provisions of the Code sections, which, he contends, are part of the insurance contracts. If the court shall conclude that, upon a fair construction of the contracts of insurance, the clauses of the policies referred to exclude the California statute law, it is appellant's contention in the second place that these clauses are void, as being in contravention of the domestic policy of the state expressed in the Code sections.

[1, 2] Contracts of insurance are not different from other contracts. In the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, insurance companies have the same right as an individual to limit their liability, and to impose whatever conditions they please upon their obligations, not inconsistent with public policy. 14 R. C. L. pp. 928–930. In cases of contract, it is well settled that the parties, by their own act and will, may agree to be bound by the law of a foreign jurisdiction, and such law will be enforced in the forum where the parties reside. Pritchard v. Norton, 106 U. S. 124, 129, 1 Sup. Ct. 102, 27 L. Ed. 104. A contract by an insurance company made in one state and executed elsewhere may, by its terms, incorporate the law of another state and make its provisions controlling upon both the insurer and the insured. Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York v. Cohen, 179 U. S. 262, 267, 21 Sup. Ct. 106, 45 L. Ed. 181.

The general rule is that, in the absence of statutory prohibition, the parties may stipulate that the policy shall be construed and governed by the laws, usages, and customs of a foreign state, and such laws, usages, and customs as are applicable shall be deemed to be a part of the written contract. 1 Joyce on Insurance, § 231d, p. 617; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Orlopp, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 284, 61 S. W. 336; 6 Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, pars. 652, 653.

[3, 4] We do not think the authorities relied upon by the appellant removed this case from the application of the general rule. Progresso S. S. Co. v. Marine Ins. Co., 146 Cal. 279, 79 Pac. 967, has no application, for the facts are different. In other cases the courts were construing the terms of insurance policies prohibited by express legislative enactments. In New York Life Ins. Co. v. Cravens, 178 U. S. 389, 20 Sup. Ct. 962, 44 L. Ed. 1116, and in Equitable Life Ins. Soc. v. Pettus, 140 U. S. 226, 11 Sup. Ct. 822, 35 L. Ed. 497, the statute of the state of Missouri was being considered, which provided that no policy of insurance issued by any life insurance company authorized to do business in that state, should, after the payment of two full annual premiums, be forfeited or become void by reason of the nonpayment of such premiums, but should be subject to certain rules of commutation. As pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case last cited, the Missouri statute was mandatory and controlling. We find nothing in our own laws making the provisions of the Code defining a constructive total loss, in the case of marine insurance, mandatory upon the parties. Appellant has cited no cases so holding. We are not aware of any legislative declaration that would prohibit the parties to such an insurance policy from contracting that the law of England shall govern in the determination of what shall constitute a constructive total loss under such policy. It is the general rule in this state that, except where it is otherwise declared, the provisions of the Civil Code, with respect to the rights and obligations of parties to contracts, are subordinate to the intention of the parties when ascertained in the manner prescribed by the laws relating to the interpretation of contracts. The benefit of such provision may be waived by any party entitled thereto, unless such waiver would be contrary to public policy. Section 3268, Civ. Code; Griffith v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 101 Cal. 627, 640, 36 Pac. 113, 40 Am. St. Rep. 96.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. STOCK. (Cr. 747.)

Criminal law ⊂=850—Mere leaving of jury by bailiff not ground for new trial.

It is not ground for new trial that the bailiff, in whose charge the jury were placed on retiring, left them for a moment in another's charge, neither he nor any one else conversing with nor approaching them in such time, so that no injury resulted to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

P. R. Stock was convicted of forgery, denied a new trial, and appeals. Affirmed.

Dick Foye Harding, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch and John W. Maltman, both of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant was convicted of forgery. From a judgment upon such conviction and an order denying a new trial he has appealed.

Upon retiring to deliberate upon their verdict, which was at the noon hour, the jurors were taken to lunch by the bailiff, into whose custody they had been ordered by the court. The bailiff was duly sworn to keep the jurors together in some private and convenient place, and not to permit any person to speak to or communicate with them, nor to do so himself unless ordered by the court, or to ask them whether they had agreed upon a verdict. The jurors, in charge of the bailiff, together with defendant, who also was in custody of the bailiff, descended the stairs leading from the courtroom to the lobby of the courthouse. When they reached the courthouse lobby the bailiff, wishing to deliver his prisoner to the jailer at the county jail, asked a deputy county clerk, who was near by, to watch the jurors and see that no one talked to them while he took his prisoner to the county jail. The bailiff and his prisoner were gone about a minute and a half, when the former, returning, again assumed personal charge of the jurors at or near the corner of the courthouse grounds. Meanwhile, as shown by the testimony of both the deputy clerk and the bafliff, the jurors marched in double file from the lobby of the courthouse to the place where the bailiff rejoined them. The deputy clerk stood off at one side during all this time, watching the jurors, but holding no conversation with them. Not for an instant were the jurors separated; no one approached them; no one spoke to or conversed with them. They were in plain sight of the bailiff from the time he came out of the county jail after delivering the prisoner to the jailer.

Though there doubtless was a technical violation of the court's instruction to the bailiff to take charge of the jury, we cannot say that there was such misconduct as to justify setting aside the verdict. The ultimate purpose of the court's instruction to an officer to take charge of the jurors is to prevent them from having improper intercourse with others. Their being placed in charge of the officer is merely a means of accomplishing that purpose. Therefore the mere fact that the direction of the court is violated does not of itself give the defendant the right to have the verdict set aside, for it is possible that the jurors may not be affected by the irregularity. And though the officer who disregards his oath, or the court's instruction to take charge of the jury, fails in performance of his duty, and his conduct, if not explained so as to show that the defendant was not prejudiced thereby, is an irregularity that may be ground for a new trial, nevertheless, where, as here, it appears that no injury to the prisoner has followed from the irregularity, the verdict will not be disturbed. People v. Symonds, 22 Cal. 352; People v. Bemmerly, 98 Cal. 299, 33 Pac. 263; People v. Cord, 157 Cal. 562, 571, 108 Pac. 511. It was clearly and affirmatively shown, by the very witnesses whom defendant called to prove the conduct of which he complains, that the jurors were not affected thereby.

We do not think it necessary to discuss the claim that the uncorroborated testimony given by the complaining witness was not sufficient to identify appellant as the one who committed the crime. The credibility of the witness and the weight of his testimony were questions for the jury, and its decision thereon is final.

Upon a review of the whole case we find no error or irregularity entitling defendant to a new trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WEAVERING v. SCHNEIDER. (Civ. 3664.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 6, 1921.)

1. Judgment ⊂=271—May not be entered by clerk on report of referee where reference is only for court's information.

While under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 639, 644, if reference be to try the whole issue, the clerk, on the filing of the referee's finding, may thereon enter judgment, not so where referee is to merely examine and report for the court's information on an issue.

2. Appeal and error ⊂=873(1)—Complaint may not be made of judgment other than that appealed from.

The appeal being solely from an unauthorized judgment entered by the clerk on a referee's report, appellant is not in a position to raise the point of a subsequent judgment of the court having been entered prematurely.

3. Appeal and error ⊂⊃781(6)—Settlement by parties ground for dismissal of appeal.

It is ground for dismissal of appeal in action for dissolution of partnership and an accounting that it appears that the parties have agreed on an adjustment and settlement of the accounts and assets.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Franciso; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Frederick Weavering against Fred Schneider. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

W. H. Barrows, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. M. More, of San Francisco (E. B. Mering, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought to dissolve a copartnership, and to obtain a settlement of the partnership accounts.

The record is in a confused condition. Briefly, it appears that the case was tried upon issues framed by the complaint and the answer and counterclaim of the defendant. On those issues, with one or two unimportant exceptions, the court found in favor of the plaintiff. One of its findings was to the effect that before a final judgment could be entered in the action it was necessary, for the information of the court, that an account be taken of the dealings and transactions between the parties, and a referee was appointed for that purpose. Thereafter, the referee, being in doubt—or assuming that the reference was general—prepared and filed findings of fact and conclusions of law, according to which the clerk of the court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant in the sum of $4,012.79; but the next day the court itself adopted the findings and conclusions of the referee and rendered judgment thereon, which also was duly entered. Several months thereafter the defendant appealed from the judgment entered by the clerk upon the report of the referee, claiming that the court had no power to vest the referee with authority to make findings of fact and conclusions of law upon which a judgment might be entered by the clerk, and, secondly, that, if it can be said that the judgment in question was in fact rendered by the court, nevertheless, the court itself at the time of its rendition was without jurisdiction to render a final judgment, for the reason that at that stage the partnership property had not been sold, or the assets marshaled and applied as the law directs.

[1] There is no merit in either of these contentions. If the order appointing the referee may be regarded as general, and unlimited, vesting him with power to try the whole issue as to the accounts, then it was the plain duty of the referee to make and file findings of fact and conclusions of law, upon which judgment would follow immediately, and the decision would stand as that of the court, subject to exception and review as if the action had been tried by the court. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 639, 644; Peabody v. Phelps, 9 Cal. 213; Terpening v. Holton, 9 Colo. 306, 12 Pac. 189. But here the order of reference merely authorized the referee to examine and report for the information of the court on the issue as to the account between the parties, so as to enable the court to pass on that issue, and so regarding the report a judgment was rendered by the court, which judgment we think was the only proper one in the case.

[2] The second objection of the appellant is directed to the jurisdiction of the court to enter a final judgment before the property of the copartnership has been sold and the assets marshaled; but he is in no position to raise this point, since his appeal is taken from the so-called judgment entered by the clerk in the first instance without the direction of the court. This is not the judgment in the case, and the appeal taken by the defendant is directed exclusively to it.

[3] Finally, it appears from an authenticated copy of a stipulation filed in this court that the parties have agreed upon an adjustment and settlement of the account and assets of the copartnership. From all of the foregoing, it follows that the appeal should be dismissed. It is so ordered.

THRESHER v. LOPEZ. (Civ. 3104.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 12, 1921. Rehearing Denied May 1, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 9, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1010(1)—Findings supported by evidence not disturbed.

Fact findings of the trial court supported by the evidence will not be disturbed.

2. Payment ⊂⊃89(1)—Money paid upon mistake of fact may be recovered under count of money received.

Money paid upon mistake of fact may be recovered under the common count as money had and received.

3. Payment ⊂⊃85(7)—Negligence of plaintiff is no defense unless it altered defendant's position.

Where plaintiff overpaid defendant, he may recover in an action for money received, regardless of his negligence, where defendant did not alter his position to his prejudice.

4. Payment ⟸85(1)—Overpayment under mistake of fact not voluntary.

Where plaintiff overpaid defendant under mistake of fact, recovery of the payment cannot be defeated on the theory that such payment was voluntary; it further appearing that defendant did not as a result of overpayment, change his position to his detriment.

5. Payment ⟸89(4)—Averment held a sufficient allegation of demand for repayment.

In an action for money had and received, it appearing that as a result of mistake plaintiff overpaid defendant, an averment that, although often requested so to do, defendant neglected and refused to pay plaintiff, is a sufficient allegation of demand for repayment.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1071(1)—Judgment will not be reversed for insufficiency of finding where if made it must have been adverse to appellant.

A judgment will not be reversed for an insufficiency in the finding, where, if a sufficient finding had been made, it would have been adverse to the appellant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by George P. Thresher against P. L. Lopez. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles H. Mattingly, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. W. Kidd, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal from a judgment against the defendant for the sum of $780.44 and plaintiff's costs.

[1] The complaint alleges three causes of action. One is for money had and received, one for a balance due on a mutual open and current account, and one for the recovery of an alleged overpayment of money upon the ground that it was obtained upon false and fraudulent representations. The findings are applicable to support the first cause of action, and the evidence sustains those findings which concern the first cause of action. It is true that there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, but, under such circumstances, it is elementary that the judgment of the trial court will not be reversed.

[2] The plaintiff employed the defendant to perform certain work, and paid therefor $3,126.85. The trial court found this to be an overpayment of $780.44. Finding 4 is to the effect that the plaintiff believed that the amount which he paid was owing and payable from him to the defendant, and that he did not know that he was overpaying the defendant—

"but that on or about July 17, 1918, plaintiff learned for the first time that he had overpaid defendant by mistake for the doing of said work and labor; that within a short time after so learning for the first time of said overpayment, plaintiff demanded of defendant that he repay to plaintiff the sums so overpaid by the latter, but that defendant refused, and has ever since refused, to repay said overpayment to plaintiff, or any part thereof."

The evidence amply supports this finding. Money paid upon a mistake of fact may be recovered under the common count of money had and received. West v. Houston, 4 Har. (Del.) 170; West Frankfort Bank & Trust Co. v. Baretti et al., 206 Ill. App. 261; Soderberg v. King County, 15 Wash. 194, 45 Pac. 785, 33 L. R. A. 670, 55 Am. St. Rep. 878; Holst v. Stewart, 161 Mass. 516, 37 N. E. 755, 42 Am. St. Rep. 442.

[3] The plaintiff, however negligent he may have been, may recover if his conduct has not altered the position of the defendant to his detriment. National Bank of California v. Miner, 167 Cal. 532, 140 Pac. 27.

[4] The cases cited by appellant to support his contention "that money voluntarily paid with full knowledge of all the facts and without fraud or coercion, cannot be recovered" support that position, but are not in point here because the court found, and the evidence shows, that the plaintiff acted without knowledge of the facts and through a mistake. There is nothing to indicate that the act of Thresher in having overpaid Lopez has placed the latter in a position where a detriment would result by reason of his being required to refund. Under such circumstances it is inequitable and dishonest for defendant to retain the money.

[5] Appellant makes the claim that there is neither an allegation or finding that a demand was made for repayment before the commencement of the suit. The complaint alleges that element of the cause of action in the ordinary language of an action upon the common count of money had and received, "that although often requested so to do, the said defendant has neglected, failed, and refused to pay the plaintiff the said sum," etc. We think this is a sufficient allegation of demand. The finding reads:

"Within a short time after so learning for the first time of said overpayment, plaintiff demanded of defendant that he repay to plaintiff the sums so overpaid by the latter, but that defendant refused, and has ever since refused to repay said overpayment to plaintiff, or any part thereof."

[6] Conceding that this is somewhat indefinite as to the date on which demand was made, the evidence shows that demand was made before the action was commenced, and the judgment will not be reversed for an insufficient finding, where, if a finding had been made, it must have been adverse to the appellant. Haight v. Costanich, 31 Cal. App. Dec. 237.[1] Counsel for appellant persists in the assertion that the findings were to the effect "that respondent, on March 4, 1918, knew the exact status of his account with appellant." There is no finding to this effect.

DANIELS v. McGUIRE. (Civ. 3781.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 7, 1921, as Amended April 25, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1068(1, 5)—Errors in instructions prejudicial to defendant are cured by a verdict for him.

Errors in the giving and refusing of instructions to the prejudice of defendant are cured by the verdict for defendant, and do not entitle him to a reversal of an order granting plaintiff a new trial.

2. Appeal and error ⊂⊃933(4)—Presumed to have been granted for insufficiency of the evidence.

Where the motion for new trial was made and granted before Code Civ. Proc. § 657, was amended, in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 141), the appellate court may presume that the motion, which was based upon insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict for defendant and on alleged errors occurring during the trial, was granted on the insufficiency of the evidence, in the absence of any other cause appearing in the record, especially where defendant on appeal asserted it was granted on that ground.

3. Appeal and error ⊂⊃979(1)—New trial for insufficiency of evidence conclusive, unless discretion abused.

The trial court has a wide discretion in granting or denying a new trial on the sufficiency of the evidence, and its action in that regard is conclusive in the appellate court unless there has been an abuse of discretion.

4. Appeal and error ⊂⊃979(2)—Abuse of discretion in granting new trial not shown, where there is substantial conflict in the evidence.

If there is substantial conflict in the evidence, the trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion in granting a new trial because the verdict is against the weight of the evidence.

5. Malicious prosecution ⊂⊃21(2)—Advice of counsel after full disclosure defense.

In an action for malicious prosecution, defendant can rely on advice of counsel as establishing probable cause for the prosecution only where he shows that, before receiving the advice of counsel, he made a full, fair, and honest statement of the facts then known to him.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

Action by Roderick V. Daniels against Thomas F. McGuire. From an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial after verdict for defendant, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur L. Shannon, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Aitken, Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine and Aitken & Aitken, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages from the defendant on account of alleged malicious prosecution. He averred that he was wrongfully accused by the defendant of opening, secreting, and embezzling letters transmitted through the United States mail, in violation of certain federal statutes. Two trials with jury have been had. The first resulted in a disagreement. On the second trial, the present case, the jury returned a verdict for the defendant. Plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was granted, and from which order the defendant appeals.

The motion for a new trial was made on three grounds: Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; that the verdict was against law; and errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by plaintiff. While counsel for appellant asserts that the first of these grounds was the only one urged and considered at the hearing of the motion, the order granting the motion was general in its terms. It must therefore be affirmed if it could properly have been granted on any one of the grounds assigned.

[1] Alleged errors on the part of the trial court in giving instructions prejudicial to the appellant, and its refusal to give others requested by appellant, were cured by the verdict in appellant's favor, as he admits, and do not avail on this appeal.

[2] The motion was made and granted before section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to new trials, was amended in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 141). Therefore, aside from appellant's assertion that the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict was the only matter urged in support of the motion for a new trial, we may presume it was granted on that ground in the absence of any other cause appearing in the record. Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 506, 508, 123 Pac. 288.

[3] The courts have frequently commented upon the wide extent of discretion of the trial court in granting or denying a new trial on sufficiency of the evidence. Its action in this regard is conclusive in the appellate court, unless there has been an abuse of discretion.

[4] And, if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion when it has determined that the verdict or the findings are against the weight of the evidence, and that there should be a new trial. Gordon v. Roberts, supra, 162 Cal. 509, 123 Pac. 288; Morgan v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 13 Cal. App. 12, 14, 108 Pac. 735.

[5] We think that on the main questions in controversy in this case there was sufficient conflict in the evidence to justify the court in concluding, as it must be deemed to have concluded, that justice would be promoted by a new trial. The decisive issues relate to the questions, whether defendant had probable cause for making the charge against plaintiff in the first instance, and whether defendant was guilty of malice in making the charge in the next. The appellant sought to maintain the existence of probable cause in law in making the charges against the respondent by proving that he acted on the advice of counsel. From our reading of the testimony we can well understand how the trial court may have entertained a doubt as to whether appellant made to his counsel, before receiving his advice, a full, fair, and honest statement of the facts then known to him, bearing upon the alleged guilt of the respondent. If he did not do so, he was not entitled to rely upon the defense of probable cause. Stone v. Wolfe, 168 Cal. 261, 262, 141 Pac. 1190. There is other evidence from which the trial court may well have concluded that appellant was not free from malice in making the charges against the respondent.

The order granting the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

BESSING v. PRINCE. (Civ. 3496.)

1. Sales ⟹7—Contract held a sales, and not an agency contract.

A contract whereby one party appointed the second party his "direct and exclusive representative and agent" for certain territory for the sale of the first party's goods therein, and whereby the second party agreed to pay first party a specified royalty for each article manufactured by first party and sold by second party within such territory, held a contract whereby the first party agreed to sell goods to second party at specified price, and not a contract of agency.

2. Principal and agent ⟹89(5)—Complaint held insufficient to state cause of action for reimbursement for expenses incurred in endeavoring to make sales as agent.

In dealer's action against manufacturer for breach of contract to deliver to dealer articles to be sold by him in certain territory, complaint held insufficient to state cause of action for reimbursement for expenses incurred in endeavoring to make sales, in that it did not show that the contract was one of agency, not of sale.

3. Sales ⟹411—Complaint held insufficient to warrant recovery of profits for future sales.

In an action against a manufacturer for breach of a contract to sell vibrators to plaintiff to be sold by plaintiff in certain territory, complaint held insufficient for recovery of profits of future sales, in that it did not state what number of vibrators plaintiff could have sold, or the price at which they could have been sold by him, or that plaintiff ever ordered or demanded delivery of any vibrators other than those delivered.

4. Sales ⟹411—Complaint against manufacturer of defective goods held to state cause of action for profits plaintiff would have realized if vibrators had been fit for resale.

In dealer's action against manufacturer for breach of contract to deliver to dealer vibrators of merchantable quality to be sold by the dealer in certain territory, the complaint alleging that the manufacturer delivered a certain number of vibrators that could not be sold because of defects in the manufacture thereof, and that plaintiff had complied with the terms of the contract to be performed on his part, held to state a cause of action for recovery of profits which plaintiff would have realized by selling the vibrators if they had been fit for resale.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Theodore Bessing against James Prince. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Griffith Jones and John J. Craig, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On the 26th day of July, 1918, a contract in writing was entered into between Bessing, as party of the first part, and Prince, as party of the second part, which contained the following terms: It was stated therein that Prince appointed Bessing as his "direct and exclusive representative and agent" for certain western states for a period of one year from the date of the contract. In consideration of Bessing's selling the Prince vibrator for printing presses, and all improvements thereon, during the period of 12 months from that date, "according to price agreed upon by both parties hereinafter mentioned the gross amount of $10,000.00" for the described territory, the contract was to renew itself automatically. Prince agreed to furnish to Bessing "each of the three sizes of the Prince vibrator for printing presses at $10 per vibrator complete for service and shipment in Los Angeles, California." It was further agreed that "should party of the second part fail to produce the vibrators in sufficient quantity to fill his orders, then the party of the first part shall have the right to manufacture in sufficient quantity to fill the contract made, and paying the party of the second part five dollars ($5.00) as royalty for each vibrator so made and sold." Bessing brought this action to recover damages for breach of the contract.

The second amended complaint alleged:

"That at no time has the defendant furnished to the plaintiff any vibrator or vibrators complete for service and shipment in Los Angeles, though plaintiff has continuously since the execution of said contract demanded them, but, on the other hand, has furnished to this plaintiff about 50 vibrators which were not complete for service or shipment, and which were not merchantable or usable or salable, and which would not perform the purpose for which they were made, and for which they were to be sold by the plaintiff, in that the same were defectively manufactured and would not perform the work required of them on a printing press, by reason of all of which the vibrators sold by the plaintiff and which were furnished to the plaintiff by the defendant under said contract were wholly unfit for the purpose for which they were sold; and that defendant has at all times since the execution of said contract failed and refused after demand to furnish to plaintiff vibrators complete for service and shipment; that in endeavoring to sell said vibrators under the agreement hereinbefore mentioned, the plaintiff was put to the actual and reasonable expense of $316.70, the same being the actual expenses reasonably and necessarily incurred by plaintiff in an effort to sell said vibrators; and that the profit on the 50 vibrators furnished to the plaintiff by the defendant, and which could have been sold, and plaintiff's profit thereon realized, if the said vibrators had been usable, merchantable, or salable, would have been at least the sum of $500; that by reason of defendant's failure to furnish plaintiff vibrators complete for service and shipment as aforesaid, the plaintiff was unable to sell any of said vibrators, and unable to realize any profit on the same, or on any of the said 50 vibrators so furnished, and was deprived of the profits of future sales; and that in truth and in fact, if said vibrators had been complete for service and shipment as required by said contract, the plaintiff 'would have realized at least $2,500 on sales'; that the defendant at all times knew that the plaintiff was incurring said expense, which was reasonable and necessary, in an honest effort to sell said vibrators; and, further, that the profits to the plaintiff if the vibrators had been complete for service and delivery would have been at least the sum of $2,500, and that solely for said reasons plaintiff was unable to make and complete sales thereof to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $2,500, all of which was known to the defendant; and that it was well known to the defendant at the time of the execution of said contract and at all times since, that the purpose of said vibrators so to be furnished the plaintiff was for sale to persons operating printing presses; and that the quality of the vibrators so furnished was not such as to make them merchantable or usable in any way; and that defendant has at all times since the making of said contract refused to furnish to this plaintiff any vibrators except those that were not merchantable or usable as above specified."

To this complaint the defendant demurred on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained. The plaintiff, having failed to further amend, judgment was entered, dismissing the action. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

[1-3] Although the contract began with the statement that respondent appointed appellant as his agent, the contract as a whole shows that it was not a contract of agency, but, on the contrary, was a contract whereby respondent agreed to sell the vibrators to appellant at the price of $10 for each vibrator. It was specified in the terms, which we have quoted, that appellant should sell the articles at a price agreed upon by both parties. The complaint does not state what this agreed price was, or that the parties ever arrived at an agreement fixing the price at which the articles were to be sold. The complaint nowhere states the price at which they could have been sold by appellant if they had been furnished by respondent of a kind and quality fit for sale. Since the contract was not a contract of agency, the facts alleged in the complaint are not sufficient to establish the existence of any obligation on the part of respondent to reimburse appellant for the expenses incurred by appellant in endeavoring to make sales. The complaint does not state what number of vibrators appellant could have sold, or at what price they could have been sold by him, or that appellant ever ordered or demanded delivery of any number of vibrators other than the 50 which were delivered. Therefore, no basis is shown for the recovery of "profits of future sales."

[4] From the facts above stated it seems clear that no cause of action for any damages has been stated, unless it be for loss of profits on the 50 vibrators which were ordered and delivered, and which, as stated in the complaint, were not complete for service and were not merchantable or usable, and which would not "perform the purpose" for which they were made, in that they were defectively manufactured and would not perform the work required of them on the printing press. Since appellant, in his complaint, has not sought to recover any money paid by him for these vibrators, it might be inferred that he has never paid for them, although apparently they are still in his possession. But this inference is prevented by the general allegation that the plaintiff has complied with each and all of the terms of the contract on his part to be performed. This being true, he has a valid claim against respondent to recover damages equivalent to the amount of profits which he would have realized by selling the vibrators if they had been fit for resale.

The judgment is reversed.

HARLAN v. WILLARD et al. (Civ. 3489.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 8, 1921.)

1. Equity ⊂⊃65(2)—Doctrine that one guilty of attempt to consummate a fraud will not be heard in equity held not applicable to plaintiff.

Where plaintiff, seeking to recover on a contract whereby decedent was to will her one-half of his estate in return for her being his housekeeper, had previously applied for letters of administration, and sought, as decedent's wife, to acquire one-half of his property at suggestion of decedent's son that it would keep down scandal, and the court found that she did not have any intent to defraud the estate, the doctrine that one guilty of attempt to consummate a fraud will not be heard in court of equity is not applicable to her.

2. Frauds, statute of ⊂⊃75—Oral contract to become decedent's housekeeper, in return for which he was to will her property; held not obnoxious to statute.

Oral contract made in 1901, by which plaintiff was to become decedent's housekeeper, in return for which he was to will her one-half of his property, held not obnoxious to the statute as then existing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Mamie E. Harlan against Edgar H. Willard and another individually and against the Title Insurance & Trust Company, as administrator of the estate of C. A. Willard, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Turnbull, Heffron & Kelley and R. W. Pontious, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff by the judgment herein was determined to be the owner of one-half of the property of the estate of C. A. Willard, deceased. It was decreed that defendants held the same in trust for her benefit. From that judgment this appeal is taken.

In 1901 the plaintiff was employed as a waitress in a restaurant, and was then 20 years of age. C. A. Willard was then of the age of 41 years. Prior to his acquaintanceship with the plaintiff he had been married and divorced, and there were two children of that marriage, to wit, Edgar H. Willard and Dorothea Laura Blodgett, appellants here. According to a statement made by Willard to the plaintiff (as to the correctness of which no dispute is shown in the record), Willard's first wife had remarried, and Laura Blodgett, the daughter, had been adopted by her stepfather when about the age of 10 years. After forming the acquaintance with the plaintiff, Willard began to pay particular attention to her and frequently took her to places of amusement Sometimes a married sister of the plaintiff accompanied the two; at other times they went alone. About a month after the acquaintanceship began, Willard, according to the testimony of the plaintiff, made a proposal to the plaintiff which is best shown by presenting a narrative of her testimony on that point:

"Q. Did you ever have a conversation with Mr. Willard about becoming his housekeeper? A. I did. We were dining out, but I do not remember where. He wanted to know if I would be willing to come and keep house for him; be his housekeeper. He told me if I would come and be his housekeeper and help him and stay as long as he lived; that he would furnish me a home and my clothing, and take care of me in case of illness, and at his death he would leave me half of anything that he had. Q. What did you say at that time, if anything? A. Well, I would not give any definite answer. I wanted to think it over. Q. Did you ever discuss the matter at a further time? A. Often after that. Q. Give as nearly as possible these conversations and your replies. A. Well, they were all practically the same. He wanted that I should keep house for him and do what any housekeeper would do. There was nothing more than I told you. He wanted me to do what any housekeeper is supposed to do in keeping house; to cook, wash dishes, sweep and dust, and take care of him, if he was sick, but there was nothing else mentioned."

Plaintiff testified further that, after considering the proposal for some time, she accepted the offer. For a while the three, Willard, plaintiff, and her sister, jointly occupied a set of apartments, Willard making use of one bedroom, the two women another, and all having their meals together. The housework was attended to by plaintiff and her sister. Later on, the plaintiff resided with Willard in one of a set of flats owned by him, and continued to perform the household duties agreed upon, and continued to so perform them for 17 years and up to the time of Willard's death; she bestowed much personal attention and painstaking care upon the latter, who was at times addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors. Willard's business was that of a saloonkeeper. From about the year 1910 on the couple lived in a house toward the building of which plaintiff contributed some money which she had received from the sale of a lot. Plaintiff testified to repeated statements made by Willard of his intention to fulfill his agreement to divide his property equally between her and his son Edgar. She testified that he had said because his daughter Dorothea had been adopted by her stepfather, she was no longer his child, and that he did not want her to have anything of his. Other witnesses testified to having heard Willard assert that he intended to leave to the plaintiff one-half of his property, and Mrs. Scott, the sister of the plaintiff, testified to having been present when Willard made the original proposal to her sister in the terms already stated. It is not argued, and upon the evidence the case admits of no such contention, that the finding of the court as to the making of the contract in the manner and upon the conditions described by the plaintiff is not abundantly supported. The fact that plaintiff admitted that she had during the years mentioned lived with Willard as his wife is made the ground for the claim that the contract as made was against good morals, and therefore illegal. The contract, as found by the court to have been made and as testified to by the plaintiff, contained no condition that the agreement of Willard depended upon the relation of a mistress being assumed by the plaintiff. Under such a condition of the evidence and findings, the question suggested is entitled to little consideration. It is proper to state, however, as pertinent to the consideration of certain later acts of the plaintiff, that she had during the 17 years been introduced by Willard as his wife, and had been understood by friends and acquaintances to occupy that relation toward him. As a matter of fact, at the time plaintiff accepted the proposal of Willard she was married to a man named Harlan, and, so far as we are able to determine from the record presented, was never divorced from the latter. At the time first referred to, however, she was living apart from her husband, and never thereafter resumed marital relations with him. After the death of C. A. Willard, the son Edgar went to an attorney at law (this according to the testimony of the attorney), where he represented that plaintiff was the widow of his father, and that he and the widow were the only heirs. He also made the statement to the attorney of his knowledge as to his father's intention to leave one-half of his estate to the plaintiff, and that he (Edgar) intended to carry out those wishes. It was upon the statement of alleged facts as given by the son Edgar that the attorney drew an application for letters of administration on behalf of the plaintiff and later an application for an allowance to be made to the plaintiff as widow. Both of these applications were presented to the court with the knowledge of the plaintiff, and she testified in verification of the alleged facts therein set forth. Later, however, upon the facts being presented as to plaintiff not being the legal wife of Willard, these proceedings in her behalf were abandoned, and no money or property was appropriated by her under any order made therein. Plaintiff testified that she had allowed these proceedings to be taken, affirming her alleged status as the widow of Willard, because of the solicitations of the son Edgar, who persuaded her that everything was all right, that she had always been known as his father's wife, and that it would save any scandal to have the proceedings gone through with in that way; that she was influenced further in so doing because of Willard's statement to her that Dorothea was not to receive any part of his property, and that she was innocent of any intent to secure anything from the estate to which she was not entitled. The court made findings upon this matter favorable to the plaintiff in the following terms:

"She believed that she and Edgar H. Willard were the sole persons entitled to share in the estate of Charles A. Willard, and believed that by doing said acts and things in said estate she would receive only that portion of the estate to which she was entitled under the contract set forth in plaintiff's complaint; that the defendant Edgar H. Willard, for a long period of time prior to the death of said Charles A. Willard, had known * * * of the existence of the contract alleged in plaintiff's complaint between plaintiff and said Charles A. Willard; that the said Edgar H. Willard advised the plaintiff to apply for letters of administration in said estate, and assisted her in making said application, and advised plaintiff that it was proper and for the best interests of said estate that she apply for letters of administration as the widow of said Charles A. Willard, and that such action by said plaintiff would prevent unnecessary scandal; that this plaintiff had no intention of deceiving the court in the matter of said estate, and had no intention of defrauding said estate or securing a wrong or unlawful advantage against said estate or the heirs of said Charles A. Willard; that plaintiff at no time attempted to secure a larger portion of said estate than one-half thereof, and believed that in said proceedings in relation to the probate of said estate she was securing only that part or portion of the estate to which she was legally entitled; that no money was paid to this plaintiff under the order for family allowance; and that she at no time received any money or value under said order for family allowance; that it is not true that the said Mamie E. Harlan was the widow of the said Charles A. Willard, but that this court find that the said representations were not made by the said plaintiff with the express or any purpose or intention of imposing upon the court or for the purpose of gaining for herself an interest in the estate or the assets thereof."

[1, 2] Appellants cite a number of cases to the point of their contention, to wit, that where a party has been guilty of an attempt to consummate a fraud, he will not be heard in a court of equity in any matter concerning the same subject to secure relief favorable to himself. Without taking up these cases for the purpose of particular analysis, it may be conceded that they all hold in agreement with a sound doctrine of equitable practice. The distinction important to be drawn between these cases and this is that here, as the evidence showed and the court found, the plaintiff in filing the petition for letters of administration and her application for a family allowance, based upon the claim that she was the widow of Willard, did so without the intent to defraud the estate, or the heirs, of anything. The excuse perhaps showed no legal justification, but even though that be true, the lack of a fraudulent purpose to get something to which she was not legally entitled takes the case without the rule as insisted for by appellant. The contract of 1901 was not obnoxious to the statute of frauds as then existing. The trial judge made a particular finding regarding the agreement under which plaintiff advanced money with which to purchase the lot or build the house occupied by the plaintiff and Willard, in 1910, but we cannot see how that finding affects the judgment, which is based upon the contract asserted by the plaintiff, to wit, that made in the year 1901. The findings of the court as to the material matters involved in the pleadings seem to be within the issues and to sufficiently determine all of these. No error appears requiring that the judgment should be reversed.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEWIS v. FARMERS' GRAIN & MILLING CO. (Civ. 3000.)

1. Sales ⟹201(4)—Delivery through carrier not complete until vendor gives notice shipment is ready.

Where shipment is made by common carrier, delivery is not completed until the seller has relinquished his control over the car which he is loading, and given notice to the carrier that it is ready for shipment.

2. Sales ⟹201(4)—On sale f. o. b. point of shipment, title remains in seller until goods placed on car.

Where goods are sold f. o. b. point of shipment, title does not pass from the seller until goods are placed on the cars by the seller.

3. Sales ⟹218½—When title passes by delivery to carrier held for court.

While the question whether the parties intended delivery to the carrier to vest title in the purchaser is one of fact, if the facts are not in dispute, it is a question of law for the court.

4. Sales ⟹187 — Seller entitled to interest from time of delivery.

Seller held entitled to interest from the date purchaser received delivery of grain.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Action by George E. Lewis against the Farmers' Grain & Milling Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Benjamin W. Shipman, of Los Angeles (Henry O. Wackerbarth, Jos. A. Adair, and Henry E. Carter, all of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $1,326.55 and costs. Defendant admits a principal indebtedness of $569.11. The action is upon an express contract for the purchase of quantity of grain. On the 28th day of August, 1914, the plaintiff granted the defendant the following option:

"Los Angeles, Cal. Aug. 28, 1914. In consideration for one (1) dollar to me in hand paid, I hereby give an option to the Farmers' Grain & Milling Co. to buy my crop of Light Seed oats, consisting of about 1,600 sacks at a price of $1,25 per hundred pounds, free on board cars at Owensmouth. This option is to be in force until Sept. 6, 1914, and if not exercised by the Farmers' Grain & Milling Co. before noon of that date it shall be null and void. Geo. Lewis."

On the 31st day of August the defendant exercised the option by letter and asked confirmation by return mail. Instead of writing, plaintiff went to the office of the defendant, and confirmed the exercise of the option verbally. Thereafter the plaintiff ordered a car from the Southern Pacific Railway Company at Owensmouth for the purpose of loading it with the oats. The railway company's agent spotted the car, and the plaintiff placed therein 541 or 542 sacks of oats as contracted. While the car was not completely loaded it, together with the oats, burned. No bill of lading had been issued by the railroad company, and no notice had been given to the agent of the railroad company that the car was ready for shipment.

[1-3] The defendant insists that at the time the oats were burned they still remained the property of Lewis. Both sides agree that the risk of loss followed title. Upon this appeal it is necessary to determine who owned the oats at the time they were destroyed. The answer to this question involves a construction of the contract composed of the option agreement and the letter exercising the option with the view to determining whether this entire contract thus constituted was executory or executed. If it be regarded as an executory contract, title could not be said to have passed, for where shipment is made by common carrier it is held that delivery is not completed until the vendor has relinquished his control over the car and given notice to the carrier that it is ready for shipment. Hutchinson on Carriers, c. 4 (3d Ed.) § 125; Basnight v. Atlantic Ry. Co., 111 N. C. 593, 16 S. E. 323; Schouler on Bailments and Carriers, c. 3; Tate v. Yazoo, etc., Ry. Co., 78 Miss. 842, 29 South. 392, 84 Am. St. Rep. 649; Ill. Cent. Ry. Co. v. Smyser, 38 Ill. 354, 87 Am. Dec. 301. If delivery to the railway company were to be regarded as constituting delivery to the defendant, it must be upon the theory that the railway company became the agent of the consignee. Therefore, if no delivery was made to the railway company, none was made to the defendant. The contract in the case at bar contains a provision not found in any of the cases cited by the respondent, for in none of them did the vendor agree to deliver the property on board the means of transportation at the point named in the contract. It is true that in the great majority of cases where litigation has arisen concerning the contracts providing for f. o. b. delivery of goods no question has existed as to risks. Such cases usually involve a dispute concerning expenses of delivery, and in cases of that character it is held that the term f. o. b. means "free on board." The question is frequently raised as to whether under a provision for delivery of goods "f. o. b." such a delivery is one sufficient to pass the title and risk of transportation to the vendee. If the point specified for delivery f. o. b. is the initial point of shipment, title is passed to the vendee, and he assumes the risks of transportation by delivery at that point. If the provision is for delivery, f. o. b. at the final point of destination, the vendor retains the title and also the risk of transportation to the point named in the contract (note to Lawder & Sons. v. Mackie Grocery Co., 97 Md. 1, 54 Atl. 634, 62 L. R. A. 798, and cases there cited), and title passes upon such delivery to the vendee, who thereupon assumes risks of loss or destruction. Lord v. Edward, 148 Mass. 476, 20 N. E. 161, 2 L. R. A. 519, 12 Am. St. Rep. 581. But in no case of which we are aware has it been held that under a contract for delivery of goods free on board cars title passed to the vendee before delivery at some point. In Vogt v. Schienebeck, 122 Wis. 491, 100 N. W. 820, 67 L. R. A. 756, 106 Am. St. Rep. 289, it is said that authorities generally hold that "a sale f. o. b. cars means that the subject of the sale is to be placed on cars for shipment without any expense or act on the part of the buyer, and that as soon as so placed the title is to pass absolutely to the buyer, and the property be wholly at his risk, in the absence of any circumstances indicating a retention of such control by the seller as security for purchase money, by preserving the right of stoppage in transitu." The necessary implication from this and other similar decisions is that until so placed title remains in the seller, and the property is wholly at his risk. Williston on Sales, § 280, states the rule to be that where the contract provides for the delivery of goods f. o. b. at the point of shipment it is presumed that the title then passes, but if required to be delivered at the point of destination the property does not pass until such delivery. In the case at bar there is nothing in the contract or the record outside of it to overcome this presumption. While the question as to whether or not the parties intended delivery to the carrier to vest title in the purchaser is one of fact (Dannemiller et al. v. Kirkpatrick et al., 201 Pa. 218, 50 Atl. 928), if, as in this case, the facts are not in dispute, it is a question of law for the court.

[4] The judgment is modified by reducing it to the sum of $569.11, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 21st day of October, 1914, this being the date on which the defendant received the delivery of the grain, etc., not in dispute upon this appeal, and as so modified it is affirmed.

McNEELY v. HILL. (Civ. 3486.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 7, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 6, 1921.)

1. New trial ⊂137—Notice stating motion will be made on the records equivalent to saying it will be on the minutes.

Requirement of Code Civ. Proc. § 659, that notice state whether motion for new trial will be on affidavits or the minutes of the court or both, is substantially complied with by statement that it will be on the records; the minutes being part of the records.

2. New trial ⊂163(2)—Order on ground of contributory negligence in effect for insufficient evidence.

An order granting, on the ground of plaintiff's contributory negligence, defendant's motion for new trial, in effect grants it on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to justify the implied finding of plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence.

3. Appeal and error ⊂854(6)—Order granting new trial if general sustained if authorized by facts in record on any of the grounds of motion.

If the statement in the court's minutes that motion for new trial was granted on the ground alone of plaintiff's contributory negligence be excluded, there remains a general order granting the motion, entitling defendant to the benefit of it, if the facts in the record would authorize it on any of the grounds of the motion.

4. New trial ⊂68—On motion for insufficiency of evidence court may draw inferences different from those on the trial.

The trial court, on a motion for new trial for insufficiency of the evidence, may draw inferences from the evidence opposed to those drawn by it on the trial, provided they are not unreasonable.

5. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1015(2)—Interference with granting of new trial for insufficiency of evidence held justified by conflicting evidence as to contributory negligence.

Evidence as to contributory negligence of motorcycle rider who rode into excavation on having his light too low held conflicting, so that granting of new trial on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain an implied finding of absence of contributory negligence cannot be interfered with; it being impossible to say that there was a clear abuse of discretion, and that the trial court was not reasonably justified in granting the motion.

6. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1144—On affirmance of general order for new trial, trial will not be limited to a single issue.

New trial having been granted generally, though on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to show absence of contributory negligence, the court on affirmance of the order will not interfere with its terms, so as to limit the trial to the single issue of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Robert McNeely against James Hill. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial to defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Alderson and K. A. Miller, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. F. McCulloch, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was employed by one Connell, the owner of a lot in the city of Los Angeles, to make an excavation therein preliminary to the erection of a building. The lot was located at the north end of Santee street. For a long time prior to the time when the excavation was made there had been a roadway across this lot by which the public had commonly and usually traveled between Santee street and other lands leading to Los Angeles street. Of this the plaintiff and the defendant had full knowledge. The defendant at the time stated maintained said excavation and an incline running into the north end thereof, without any barriers, lights, or other warning to prevent persons from falling into said incline or excavation. On the night of April 15, 1917, the plaintiff, while traveling to his place of employment, and while attempting to pass from the north end of Santee street across said lot, fell into the excavation and was injured thereby. He brought this action to recover damages for said injuries alleged to have been suffered by defendant's negligence. The defendant, in addition to denying any negligence on his own part, pleaded the affirmative defense of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. A verdict and judgment having been entered in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant moved for a new trial, which motion, according to the minutes of the court, was granted "on the ground alone of plaintiff's contributory negligence." The plaintiff appeals from that order.

[1] The notice of intention to move for a new trial stated that the motion would be made upon certain stated grounds "and upon the records, papers, and files in said action." Appellant contends that the notice was insufficient to authorize the court to hear the motion, because it did not comply with the requirements of section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that the notice shall designate the grounds upon which the motion shall be made "and whether the same will be made upon affidavits or the minutes of the court or both." We think that the statement, although formally defective, did in substance comply with the rule. This is so because the minutes of the court are a part of the records of the court. Therefore a motion made upon the records is a motion made upon the minutes of the court.

[2, 3] Appellant next contends that the order purports to have been made for one sole reason which is not among the statutory grounds upon which a motion for a new trial may be granted. The grounds for the motion as presented to the court included that of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. When, upon the foundation of such motion, the court granted it on account of plaintiff's contributory negligence, this in effect was an order granting the motion upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the implied finding of the jury that the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence which caused or contributed proximately to the accident and injury. It may further be suggested that, if this limitation of the reasons for the order be excluded, there still remains a general order granting the motion, and respondent would be entitled to the benefit thereof if the facts contained in the record would authorize the motion to be granted upon any ground upon which he relied in presenting his motion. However, it is our opinion that the motion was granted upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and for the particular reason above stated.

[4, 5] We come now to the principal question in the case. It is claimed by appellant that the evidence as to the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiff is not conflicting, and affirmatively shows that the plaintiff was not guilty of such negligence. The rule is conceded that an order granting a motion for a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence will not be reversed on appeal unless an abuse of discretion appears. In considering the evidence upon such motion, the trial court "has power to draw inferences from the evidence opposed to those which were drawn by it upon the trial, provided they are not unreasonable." Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 451, 456, 168 Pac. 1033, 1035. The accident in question here occurred at about 2 o'clock in the morning. The plaintiff testified that he was riding on a motorcycle at a speed of about 15 or 20 miles an hour; that his motorcycle had a headlight; that he first saw the excavation when he was about 20 feet from it; that it was because of the headlight that he saw the excavation. He further stated:

"When I have got my light on the motorcycle I generally turn it down, so I can keep out of tacks and glass and so on. When I have got it up I can see better. When you have got it down, you can't see over 20 or 25 feet."

Describing what he did when he saw the excavation he said:

"I turned to my right, shut off my engine, shut off my gas, and of course I worked my brake with my foot. I done all that at the same time."

From this evidence the jury might have determined that the plaintiff, by turning down his light, had voluntarily shortened the distance wherein he could see objects in front of him to such an extent that he was unable to stop his machine within the lighted area while moving at the speed at which he was traveling, and that in so doing he was guilty of negligence which was the direct and proximate cause of his fall into the excavation. Conceding that there was some evidence tending to exonerate the plaintiff from the charge of negligence, it results that the evidence upon that point was conflicting to such a degree that on appeal the decision of the lower court, either in granting or in refusing a new trial, should not be reversed. Where the evidence is thus conflicting, a motion for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court. With its decision thereof interference is unwarranted unless there clearly appears an abuse of such discretion. We cannot say that the court was not reasonably justified in granting the motion in this case.

[6] Finally, it is suggested by appellant that, if this action is to be tried a third time, the trial should be limited to the single issue of plaintiff's contributory negligence. It has long been settled that a court of appeal, in reversing and remanding a cause, may direct on what issues it shall be retried. Robinson v. Muir, 151 Cal. 118, 125, 90 Pac. 521. In this instance, however, since the order is to be affirmed, we deem it inappropriate to interfere with its terms as entered by the court below.

The order is affirmed.

ILFELD v. PORTER. (Civ. 3398.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 9, 1921.)

Bills and notes ⟸94(2)—Settlement of disputed claim held good consideration for check.

Where there was basis for the claim of lessor of sheep at the expiration of the lease that the lessee was then obligated to return to lessor the full number of sheep received, and could not account for the admitted deficiency merely by paying $5 per head, and the lessee threatened to have such number of sheep seized from lessee's flock, there was a bona fide dispute, the compromise of which was good consideration for lessee's check to lessor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Louis Ilfeld against Burr W. Porter. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chas. L. Childers, of El Centro, and Marron & Wood, of Albuquerque, N. M., for appellant.

Clarence H. Jordan, and Julia M. Braam, both of Los Angeles, and J. S. Larew, of El Centro, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On the 19th day of November, 1914, by agreement in writing, appellant, Louis Ilfeld, leased to respondent, Burr W. Porter, and to J. E. Porter 2,500 "well-improved white ewes" for a period of 4 years from that date. The lessees agreed, among other things:

"That they will, at the expiration, or sooner termination, of this contract, return and deliver to the party of the first part a like number of sheep of the same class of improved quality and description as hereinbefore described, of the following ages and numbers of each, as follows, to wit: 625 ewe lambs; 625 ewes of 1½ years; 625 ewes of 2½ years; 625 ewes of 3½ years; same to be delivered at or near the ranch of Burr W. Porter near Navajo, Ariz.; that they will mark and brand all the increase of said sheep during the existence of this contract in the same mark and brand of the parties of the second part."

On the first day of July of each year the lessees were to pay to the lessor as rent the sum of $1,250, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from maturity, if not paid when due. It was further agreed that—

"The parties of the second part hereby agree and bind themselves to return and deliver to the party of the first part, between the 1st day of November and the 19th day of November, 1918, the full number of sheep herein acknowledged to be received, and of like quality and ages as follows. to wit: 625 ewe lambs; 625 ewes 1½ years; 625 ewes of 2½ years; 625 ewes of 3½ years, to be of the raising of the sheep of the parties of the second part in as good condition, and with as much wool thereon, as the sheep they herein acknowledge to have received."

It was further agreed that—

"If the said parties of the second part shall neglect or refuse to keep or perform any of the provisions and covenants of this contract on their part to be performed, then and in that event the party of the first part may, at his option, retake possession of all of the said sheep and the increase thereof, and declare this contract terminated; and there shall be a settlement by the parties hereto in the same manner and with the same effect as if this contract had been terminated by the expiration of its term. The title of said sheep, however, to remain in the name of the party of the first part."

It was further agreed:

"It is expressly agreed between the parties hereto that the said parties of the second part may have the right to sell the wool and all wether lambs, wethers, and old ewes which are not fit for further breeding."

It was further agreed:

"If by reason of any unavoidable accident or circumstance not due to the act or fault of the parties of the second part, they should be unable to return the entire number of sheep, or of the ages or condition above stated, then, in that event, they covenant and agree to pay to the party of the first part the sum of $5 per head for each sheep that shall be lacking to make up the said full number of 2,500 as hereinabove specified, and the parties agree that the said sum of $5 per head is hereby fixed upon and agreed between them as the value of said sheep in the event of their failure to return the same to the first party as herein specified, and that the value of any sheep not so returned or redelivered to the first party shall be as herein specified, and shall bear interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from the time when such delivery shall be due."

It was further agreed:

"Said parties of the second part shall retain enough ewe lambs each year during the term of this contract out of the increase of the sheep herein acknowledged to be received, so as to be able to deliver the full number of sheep of the ages hereinbefore specified, at the termination of this contract."

On the 13th day of November, 1918, respondent made and delivered to the plaintiff his check on the Holbrook State Bank of Holbrook, Ariz., drawn in favor of appellant for the sum of $1,859.63. This check was duly presented to the bank for payment, but payment was refused for the reason that respondent had directed said bank not to pay same. Appellant brought this action to recover judgment for the amount of the check, with interest from its date. Answering the complaint, respondent alleged that he received no consideration for the check (except as later stated in the answer), and that the same was procured by fraud and misrepresentation on the part of the plaintiff and by reason of mistake on the part of defendant; and denied that the whole amount of said check, or any part thereof, remained due from the defendant to plaintiff except the sum of $51.96. The answer then set out the agreement of lease first hereinabove mentioned, and alleged:

1. That, pursuant to said agreement, the lessees took charge of the sheep and properly cared for them during the entire term of the agreement, and fully and faithfully performed all of the conditions of the agreement on their part.

2. That at the expiration of the term, the lessees returned to the plaintiff all of the sheep delivered to them under the agreement, together with all of the increase thereof then living, but that, by reason of unavoidable circumstances not due to the act or fault of the lessees, they were unable to return the entire number of sheep received by them from the plaintiff pursuant to said agreement at the termination thereof, 307 ewes and 304 lambs of said flock having died.

The answer further alleged that, pursuant to said agreement, the defendant paid to the plaintiff the sum of $3,000 in cash, and the sum of $3.04 in services in weighing sheep—a total of $3,003.04—leaving a balance due plaintiff on account of the loss of aid 307 ewes and 304 lambs at $5 per head, in the sum of $51.96; that, at the time the said sheep were returned to plaintiff, and the said payment made, the defendant owned a flock of sheep in the same vicinity exceeding in number the aggregate of the sheep and lambs lost from the flock that had been delivered to the lessees under said agreement, said sheep so owned by defendant being of a value at least equal to that of the sheep of said flock received from the plaintiff under said agreement; that, at the time of the return of said sheep to the plaintiff, as aforesaid, he represented that he had a contract to sell the ewes of said flock for the sum of $10 per head, and the lambs for the sum of $5.90 per head, and thereupon plaintiff demanded of said defendant that he pay the sum of $10 per head for all of said ewes lost as aforesaid, being the further sum of $5 per head, and also that defendant pay the sum of $5.90 per head for all lambs lost as aforesaid, being the further sum of $.90 per head, and represented to defendant that, unless he acceded to said demand and paid to plaintiff the further sum of $1,859.63, the plaintiff could and would seize from defendant's said flock a number of ewes and lambs, respectively, equal to the number lost from said flock as aforesaid, and threatened so to do; that at the time defendant did not have said contract before him, and was without legal advice, and believed that unless he made the payment demanded by plaintiff the said plaintiff could and would carry into execution his threat to seize defendant's sheep as aforesaid, and under such belief defendant executed and delivered to plaintiff the check herein sued upon; that thereafter, on the same day that said check was executed and delivered as aforesaid, defendant examined said contract, and received advice from counsel, and thereupon became convinced that he did not owe plaintiff the said sum of $1,859.63, or any sum in excess of $51.96, and was under no obligation to pay the same, and defendant thereupon notified the said Holbrook State Bank not to pay said check; that defendant admits an indebtedness to plaintiff in the sum of $51.96, said amount being included in the said check for $1,859.63 herein sued upon, and defendant hereby offers to allow plaintiff to take judgment for the said sum of $51.96 and the costs of this action heretofore accrued.

The action having been tried upon the issues thus presented, the court made findings of fact which are in agreement with the averments of the answer, and further found that the flock of sheep owned by respondent in the same vicinity were "not of the descendants of the said sheep delivered to the defendant and the said J. E. Porter by plaintiff, and not principally of the raising of said defendant and said J. E. Porter." Judgment was rendered for the amount admitted by the answer, to wit, $51.96, with costs incurred by plaintiff up to the date of filing said answer; defendant being awarded his costs thereafter incurred. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The finding to the effect that, in connection with plaintiff's demand for a final payment of $1,859.63, he represented to the defendant that he could and would seize from defendant's flock the number of ewes and lambs mentioned in the findings, and threatened so to do, if construed as referring to any intended seizure without process of law, is not sustained by the evidence. The finding that the defendant did not have said agreement before him at the time when said demand was made and the check given, if construed as meaning that defendant did not have the contract in his possession or that he did not know the contents thereof, is not sustained by the evidence. Before the check was given, appellant's agent made two visits to respondent, about two weeks apart, in connection with the return of the sheep. The question concerning appellant's right to get sheep from respondent, whether raised out of the sheep delivered by appellant or out of other sheep owned by respondent, was discussed at the time of the first interview. Respondent admitted in his testimony that, before the agent came the second time, he was advised that appellant was making the contention that he was entitled under the contract to sheep out of respondent's flock; that he had the contract there; that there was a dispute between them as to the construction of the contract; that he had read the contract after this contention was made, and was not deceived as to the language contained therein. Respondent further testified that from the representation made to him by appellant's agent that he could and would seize respondent's sheep, he understood that it would be by law.

It does not appear from the evidence that there was any threat to use any force other than that incidental to process of law. Respondent admitted that in their discussion the dispute related to the construction of the contract solely on the question whether respondent had the right to return such of the descendants of appellant's sheep as he had, and pay him $5 a head for those deficient, or whether he was under obligation to supply the sheep from his other flock. The compromise which resulted in the giving of the check occurred after appellant's agent had been there two or three days, and just as the sheep were being loaded on the cars. Appellant testified that, while he was not entirely satisfied with the construction of the contract, he understood that he had settled the matter on the terms which resulted in his giving the check. We agree with appellant that neither the findings nor the evidence establish the fact that defendant did not have sheep of his own raising out of which he could have returned to the plaintiff the full number of sheep of the classes required by his contract. Respondent gave the following testimony:

"Q. What was the class and grade of sheep you bought from Mr. Clark? A. They are Rambouillet-Merino sheep.

"Q. Would they also be described as well-improved white ewes? A. Yes, sir; they would be classed as that.

"Q. They were free from blemish, and recently dipped, according to the other provisions of the contract? Those that you got from Mr. Ilfeld were quite largely also of the Rambouillet blood? A. They sheared a little more than half as much as the other sheep.

"Q. But they were apparently Rambouillet blood? A. Yes, sir; they were fair."

He further testified:

"Q. You had other sheep of your own raising; other lambs? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You had them at the time and place of delivery, a sufficient number of sheep and of the proper ages, of your own raising, to have complied with this contract? A. I had on the range, but not at the place of delivery.

"Q. It was near or adjacent to the place of delivery? A. Yes, sir."

The increase from both flocks were from the same bucks.

[1] From the undisputed facts of the case, which we think have now been sufficiently stated, it reasonably may be concluded that respondent was under obligation to return to appellant the full number of sheep received by him, of the specified ages and classes, and was not entitled to account for the admitted deficiency merely by paying the sum of $5 per head. At all events, these facts fully sustain the contention of appellant that the transaction between the parties which resulted in the delivery of the check was a voluntary compromise and settlement of a bona fide dispute, and was not induced by fraud or duress. There was therefore a valid and binding consideration of the check.

"It cannot, of course, be successfully disputed that the compromise of a doubtful claim asserted and maintained in good faith constitutes a sufficient consideration for a new promise, even though it may ultimately be found that the claimant could not have prevailed. This is true whether the claim be in suit or not. * * *" Union Collection Co. v. Buckman, 150 Cal. 159, 163, 88 Pac. 708, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 568, 119 Am. St. Rep. 164, 11 Ann. Cas. 609.

The case here presented is wholly outside the scope of those decisions which hold that a compromise of a claim is without consideration for a new promise where the claim is wholly without foundation, and known to the claimant to be so. Appellant's claim was made in good faith, and on probable cause.

The judgment is reversed.

WELCH v. ALCOTT et al. (L. A. 4897.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 27, 1921. Rehearing Denied June 23, 1921.)

1. Partnership ⟸53—Evidence held to establish partnership between parties.

In an action for dissolution of partnership and an accounting, evidence held sufficient to establish partnership between plaintiff and defendant as to real estate business and other operations.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Finding by the trial court on conflicting evidence will be deferred to on appeal.

Finding by the trial court on conflicting evidence will be deferred to on appeal.

3. Partnership ⟸53 — Admissions sufficient to establish.

Repeated admissions by defendant that he and plaintiff were partners, together with conduct as to purchases for firm account, etc., held, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1832, to warrant a finding that a partnership existed between them.

4. Partnership ⟸44 — Party asserting existence of partnership has burden of proof.

The party asserting the existence of partnership has the burden of proving the same.

5. Evidence ⟸588—It is for the trial court to reconcile inconsistencies or contradictions.

It is for the trial court in an action tried without a jury to reconcile inconsistencies or contradictions in the evidence.

6. Partnership ⟸328(1) — Presumption that transactions within scope of firm business were for benefit thereof.

A partnership engaged in the real estate business having been formed, there is a presumption that all transactions within the scope of the agreement between the parties were for the benefit of such partnership.

7. Pleading ⟸129(1) — Allegations not controverted must be taken as true.

Every material allegation of the complaint not controverted by the answer must under Code Civ. Proc. § 462, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true.

8. Trial ⟸396(7) — Findings should be confined to the facts in issue.

Findings should be confined to the facts in issue, and it is improper for the court to make finding on allegations in the complaint admitted by failure to deny.

9. Partnership ⟸10 — Agreement to divide gross earnings will not constitute partnership.

An agreement to divide gross earnings will not of itself constitute a partnership.

10. Partnership ⟸5 — Agreement to divide profits prima facie establishes "partnership."

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 2395, 2404, defining partnership as the association of two or more persons for the purpose of dividing profits, and that an agreement to divide the profits implies an agreement to divide the losses, an agreement between the parties to divide the profits of a business prima facie establishes the existence of a partnership between them.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Partnership.]

11. Partnership ⟸329—Findings on an issue of partnership may be made before or after an accounting in the court's discretion.

In a suit for dissolution and accounting wherein existence of the partnership was in issue, failure of the court to make findings prior to taking the account within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 632, requiring the court to file its decision on the trial of a question of fact within 30 days after the cause is submitted, was not error; findings on the issue of partnership before or after the accounting being clearly within its discretion.

12. Appeal and error ⟸1033(10)—Party not heard to complain of modification of judgment when in his favor.

A party will not be heard to complain of modification of a judgment after its entry while motion for new trial was pending when the modification was in his favor.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Edmund Welch for dissolution of partnership and for an accounting against Edward H. Alcott and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for trial of particular issue; otherwise affirmed.

See, also, 173 Cal. 530, 174 Pac. 34.

James P. Clark, of Los Angeles, and F. W. Gail, of Covina, for appellant.

Frank C. Prescott and Prescott & Prescott, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Welch.

James P. Clark, of Los Angeles, for respondent California Land & Water Co.

L. C. Gates, Chas. H. Brock, and W S. Allen, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Title Insurance & Trust Co.

Luther Brown, of Los Angeles, for respondent Imperial Valley Farm Lands Ass'n.

LAWLOR, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff, Edmund Welch, against the defendant Edward H. Alcott for the dissolution and accounting of an alleged partnership between them. The connection of the corporation defendants—Imperial Valley Farm Lands Association, California Land & Water Company, Title Insurance & Trust Company, and the First National Bank of Los Angeles, which we shall refer to as the "agent," "sales agent," "trustee," and the "bank," respectively—will hereafter appear.

It is alleged in the complaint that on or about October 1, 1912, the parties entered into a parol agreement of partnership to engage in a general real estate business in the city of Los Angeles and in the Imperial Valley; that the expenses "of the Los Angeles office of partnership" for stenographer, telephone, rent, advertising, and fixtures, and the expenses of the partnership at Brawley for telephone, automobile hire, advertising, improving or purchasing lands, were to be borne, and the losses and profits shared, equally between them; the defendant to attend to the Los Angeles office, keep proper books of account, and render monthly statements of expenses and profits of the partnership; plaintiff to attend to the duties thereof in the Imperial Valley in finding lands to list for sale or improvement, and to show intending purchasers lands held for sale by the partnership; that the partnership has been conducted from the formation thereof until March 1, 1914, except for the failure of the defendant to perform his duties thereunder; and that in certain specific instances he was "guilty of serious misconduct."

It is further alleged that certain real estate deals were had by the partnership, in some of which the commissions were divided equally, and in others were retained by the partner collecting them; that in the Libby Yokum to Chauncey W., Lillian E., and Mabel F. Owen deal, and in the Hans A. Johnson and Mrs. Gena O. Ringer to Chauncey W., Lillian E., and Mabel F. Owen deal, in which the commission was $3,200, defendant received two promissory notes made to his individual order for $1,600 and $1,700, respectively ($100 of the latter note representing a personal loan to Libby Yokum by defendant), which notes were delivered to and are held by the bank, and that the defendant and the bank refused to recognize plaintiff's interest therein, and that "defendant has been guilty of serious misconduct."

It is further alleged that after the partnership established a town site on the southeast one-quarter of section 4, township 11 south, range 14 east, San Bernardino meridian, at Imperial Junction (subsequently named "Niland"), defendant was guilty of serious misconduct in that he began advertising the property as his own and held out to the public falsely that he was its sole proprietor; that, after a consultation with plaintiff, it was agreed a contract of agency or sale should be entered into between the partnership and the agent whereby the partners should get 50 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales, but that defendant on his personal account entered into a contract with the agent by the terms of which it was given for seven years the exclusive right to handle, sell, and dispose of the town site upon the conditions that the agent receive 25 per cent. of the first proceeds of all sales for commissions, advertising, and the general expenses of handling and selling the property; that an additional 10 per cent. be then allowed to be expended on improvements; that of the balance the agent receive 60 per cent. and defendant 40 per cent.; that the agent thereupon appointed the sales agent its exclusive selling agent for the same period, agreeing to divide equally the net proceeds to which the agent became entitled under its agreement with defendant; that the defendant deeded the town site property to the trustee and it made a declaration of trust setting forth the respective rights in the town site, and acknowledging the receipt from defendant of the deed of conveyance of the town site property; that the trustee would hold it in trust for defendant, the agent, and the sales agent for the purposes indicated in the contracts between the respective parties; that it would sell lots, convey all titles, receive and disburse all moneys in connection with the town-site property, and pay the parties their proper portions after the expenses of making the sales and its commissions had been deducted.

Plaintiff prayed for a dissolution of the partnership; that an accounting of the affairs thereof be had; that a receiver be appointed pendente lite; for an order that the agent, the sales agent, the trustee, and the bank be enjoined and restrained from in any way disposing of or paying out and yielding up possession of any of the moneys or property of the partnership until the further order of the court, and for a decree enjoining defendants or their agents or representatives from interfering with the plaintiff in participating in the management of the partnership business and affairs.

The defendant and the four corporation defendants interposed separate demurrers to the complaint, which were overruled.

The defendant's answer is a specific denial of the allegations of the complaint, and while admitting that the deals set forth in the complaint were made, and that commissions were divided in certain of them, denies that he and plaintiff ever entered into an agreement of partnership, or that any of the transactions between them were based upon a partnership.

The defendant also alleges that the deal in which he was given the two promissory notes of $1,600 and $1,700, respectively, was one in which plaintiff had no interest whatever, admits the execution of the town-site contracts heretofore described, and alleges that he was not to receive less than $36,000, that he should retain all moneys which he had collected upon sales of 34 town-site lots which he had disposed of up to January 1, 1914, and that those contracts should be assigned to the agent. The answer denies that plaintiff ever at any time had any interest in the town site.

The answer also contains certain affirmative allegations, which are negatived by the findings.

The case was tried by the court, a jury having been waived by the parties. The trial commenced on December 3, 1914, and on February 26, 1915, when the evidence was closed, the court orally announced that the evidence introduced established a partnership between plaintiff and defendant. The court thereupon proceeded to take an accounting. The testimony, oral and documentary, having been introduced, the accounting continued until March 25, 1915, when the court stated the account, which was filed on July 29, 1915, the action having been dismissed as to the parties sued under fictitious names. On October 13, 1915, the court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law. Judgment was entered on October 28, 1915, decreeing that the partnership be dissolved; that plaintiff and defendant are the owners of the town site, "subject to the trust agreement and declaration of trust," and of the sum of $5,158.19, cash proceeds of said trust now in the possession of the trustee, and of certain personal property and the two promissory notes for $1,600 and $1,700, respectively, which are in the possession of the bank and are to be collected by demand, if possible, and, if not, then by suit. It is further decreed that the personal property of the partnership be sold; that the proceeds of the two promissory notes and the above sum of $5,158.19, belonging to the partnership, be divided as follows: That after the above adjustment the notes, interest, property rights, and equity heretofore standing in the name of the defendant as owner, beneficiary, or otherwise shall belong to and be the property of plaintiff and defendant in equal parts, and that the trustee render and account to plaintiff for an equal one-half of all rights heretofore vested in the defendant; that the bank hold the two notes less payments received for account of the partnership, and pay $230 to the account of plaintiff alone; and that the trustee thereafter fulfill the duties of the trust, rendering to the creditors of plaintiff and of the partnership, respectively, their respective demands, and thereafter to plaintiff one-half of the share provided therein for defendant.

On November 8, 1915, the defendant interposed a motion for a new trial, which was denied on January 17, 1916. The appeal is from the judgment and is taken by the defendant alone.

[1] 1. Appellant's principal contention is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of a partnership between the parties. The findings in the main follow the allegations of the complaint. Appellant's position is thus stated:

> "None of the indicia of a partnership are to be found in the surroundings of the parties, either at the time of the alleged formation of the partnership, or afterwards. * * * The evidence clearly shows that each of these parties did business in his own name, and not jointly, and that business was several, and not joint."

In support of his claim that he and appellant entered into an oral agreement of partnership on or about October 1, 1912, and conducted it as such until March 1, 1914, respondent offered a great variety of evidence, including correspondence, telegrams, advertisements, printed sales forms for the alleged partnership, documents, exhibits, and conversations with, the conduct of, and admissions by, the appellant,

It appears in the evidence that for some years prior to meeting appellant respondent was engaged in the grading business with a partner named Sexsmith in the Imperial Valley; that he met appellant in the early part of 1912, having been introduced to him by one Frank C. Prescott, Jr., an attorney, who suggested they ought to be able to do some business together. On June 26, 1912, an agreement in writing was entered into between appellant and respondent whereby respondent appointed appellant his agent to secure "contracts for all kinds of reclamation work" on a 15 per cent. commission basis, the parties to employ Prescott to assist in the preparation of all papers necessary in securing such contracts and filing of yearly proofs therein. For his compensation Prescott was to receive 25 per cent. of the profits. Just before October 1, 1912, appellant suggested to respondent "that we ought to make some other arrangement besides paying Frank C. Prescott part of the profits"; that the three met on October 1st and appellant advised Prescott that for the amount of work they did not think they ought to pay him so much. Prescott agreed to withdraw and retired from the arrangement the following morning. It is not claimed this written agreement has any connection with the issues herein, and we only refer to it as indicating the sequence of events after the parties first met.

Respondent testified that the business in Los Angeles was to be in charge of appellant, and in the Imperial Valley of himself; that he was to attend to the duties of the partnership in the Imperial Valley in finding lots to list for sale or improvement, and to show intending purchasers lands held for sale by the partnership; that appellant secured for the use of respondent room 440 in the Chamber of Commerce Building, Los Angeles, adjoining room 441, where appellant had conducted his real estate business during the preceding three or four years, and it was arranged respondent might dictate his correspondence to the stenographer and pay one-half of her salary and of the general office expenses, including rent and telephone service; that advertisements appeared in the newspapers in Los Angeles and in the Imperial Valley in the joint names of "Alcott and Welch"; that the cost of this advertising was one of the partnership expenses, one-half thereof being charged to respondent; that the appellant had printed and furnished respondent blank forms authorizing "Alcott and Welch" to make sales for the owners of real estate; that respondent in January, 1913, took out a real estate license in the Imperial Valley in the name of "Alcott and Welch," the amount of the license—$36—being charged to his account; that appellant took no exception to respondent's action in taking the license out in their joint names; that, when respondent saw cards in the Los Angeles office in which his name did not appear with appellant's, he spoke to the latter about it, and appellant said "he would attend to that later"; that a great many letters were written to respondent by appellant and many conversations took place between them concerning the real estate business; that, when respondent spoke to appellant about the advertisements which appeared in the Los Angeles papers in appellant's name alone, the latter explained that he advertised the partnership business in that way because he was well known in that part of the country, and it was to the advantage of the partnership.

Miss Kate Gatzman, a stenographer in the Los Angeles office, testified she was employed from November, 1912, to May, 1913; that appellant directed her to keep a book account of the expenses of the Los Angeles office and to charge respondent with one-half of the expenses entered therein; that abstracts of the account book were made in triplicate—one to be furnished respondent, another to appellant, and the third to be retained as an office copy; that in the latter part of 1912 and during 1913 certain sums of money passed between the parties aside from the commissions derived from the proceeds of sales of real estate negotiated by them. Herman Layer testified that appellant told him, "Welch and I are partners." H. E. Williams, one of the respondent's creditors, said appellant assured him "we needn't worry, that as soon as the town site was closed out he [respondent] would have plenty of money to settle his debts; that the town site was in the appellant's name, but that respondent had an interest in it." Richard H. Hobgood testified that early in 1913 appellant told him respondent claimed a partnership, and that he spoke of "Ed and I," "me and Ed," and "us". Miss Louise Barker, another stenographer, testified she started to work for respondent and appellant in October, 1912; that when she asked appellant for a raise of salary he told her he would have to submit the matter to respondent, and that after respondent had been consulted she was given the advance; that appellant said, " 'There is a gentleman in business with me who is out of town practically all the time.' He said that Mr. Welch took care of the business in the Imperial Valley and he took care of this end of the business."

Miss Cressie Mitchell, a stenographer for Frank C. Prescott, Jr., whose telephone was on the same extension as appellant's, testified that, when she told the latter there were calls for respondent, he replied, "Welch and I are partners, and when he is called, you can buzz me. * * * Mr. Welch is in the Valley, but I am his partner. Mr. Welch is in the Valley, and we are opening a town site." John Garvey and John Welch (respondent's brother), both foremen for respondent on the high-line ditch, testified that on one occasion when respondent's teams were idle appellant came along and said he did not want the teams loafing because he was standing half the expense. Clarence R. Conover testified that, when appellant became dissatisfied with respondent, he told the witness "he would have to cease his partnership business with him." Alexander M. Williams testified that in the latter part of 1912 appellant said in plaintiff's presence "they had just formed a partnership, * * * and Welch said the same. * * * Alcott then said that Welch was the best partner he ever had. He says, 'You know we are partners.' * * * As to an automobile Alcott told me they were going to buy one for the business." This refers to a Cadillac machine which respondent bought, as he claims and appellant denies, for the partnership. Mrs. Bonnybelle Welch, wife of respondent, testified at considerable length about conversations she had with appellant in which he stated he and respondent had gone in the real estate business together as partners

Calvin A. and Gertrude Terwilliger testified to conversations with appellant in which the latter spoke of respondent as his partner.

The testimony for appellant as to the character of the relationship is to the effect that he never entered into a parol or any other sort of agreement of partnership with respondent; that for a long time prior to October 1, 1912, he had been engaged in the real estate business with an office in room 441, Chamber of Commerce Building, Los Angeles; that "about October, 1912, I talked with Welch about changing his office to my place; * * *" that respondent said there were many people coming to him in connection with grading contracts "and there was a chance to do real estate, but that he had no time. He said it will be a good idea to make some arrangement with me to show the lands when I could not come down, and that the other man where he had his office was to move, and he wanted another office, and I told him room 440 was adjoining my office and I could secure the room. * * * My arrangement with Welch was nothing more than a division of commissions if I had a listing and he had a customer;" that they agreed on such an arrangement; that appellant told respondent he would pay all his own traveling expenses "when I went to Imperial Valley, and * * * I should expect him to do the same thing, which I have always done, and so has he as far as I know. We talked until 6 o'clock, coming to an agreement as to how or when the expenses should be paid. This was the winding up of the agreement. * * * He said he was a grading contractor and needed a stenographer in the office to meet customers, and I told him that it would cost $20 a month for the rent of the office, 440 and 441; that if he would pay half of the office rent he could have the privilege of using the stenographer and telephone if he would pay half of the expenses. * * * He was willing to do that;" that appellant rented room 440 and sublet it to respondent; that respondent moved into this room and maintained his office there as a grading contractor and devoted his time and attention to that business; that the grading business of respondent was independent of and separate from the real estate business of the appellant, and that the respondent had no interest in the business of the appellant except that where respondent found a customer for the property listed with appellant, or appellant found a customer where respondent had a listing of land for sale, they would make a division of the commission earned, or, where other agents were interested in the deal, the commission would be split up according to the circumstances in each particular case; that this arrangement continued between the parties, and respondent continued to occupy room 440 until October 1, 1913, when appellant terminated respondent's occupancy of room 440, rented the room to another, and withdrew from the arrangement for a division of commissions.

Appellant also testified that in some of the deals they had together an equal division of gross commissions was made, while in others they were retained by the one collecting them. The appellant denied that he promised to devote all of his time to the business or that he would keep books of account; "nothing was said by us * * * about entering into a partnership;" that he had no knowledge as to how or why half of the outside expenses were charged to respondent; that the intention was to charge only half the office expenses; that somebody struck balances in the account book without his permission; that his reason for telling respondent in a letter, which the latter testified to, "Be sure and have the old machine steamed up," was because he would prefer to patronize respondent's automobile. He explained his letter to respondent in which he said, "The trip was worth $2,000 to us," by stating the word "us" to be a mistake; it should have been "me"; that he was a party to many other trades in which plaintiff got no commission; denied respondent was consulted with reference to negotiations with the agent, contradicted the testimony already referred to of Herman Leyer, H. E. and Alexander M. Williams, Miss Cressie Mitchell, John Welch, and Mrs. Welch, and testified he did not know monthly statements were rendered respondent, nor that letters which referred to respondent as his partner were written. Appellant produced a card printed May, 1913, reading "Edward H. Alcott, sole owner." He flatly contradicted respondent's testimony as to a partnership relation ever having existed between them; denied that he introduced respondent to anyone as his partner; denied having knowledge of the advertisements signed "Alcott and Welch"; and continued: "I did not insert that in the paper. * * * I could barely see to get around at that time. * * * My eyesight had been bad for three years." He admitted, however, discussing with respondent at one time the advisability of advertising in both names, respondent being well known in the valley; and he contradicted respondent's witnesses that he admitted to them he was respondent's partner.

Miss Kate Gatzman testified the items in the account book were mere memorandums, and that the balance for September, 1913, was not carried over in the October accounts because appellant said he was going to quit respondent.

The court found that on or about the 1st day of October, 1912, respondent and appellant entered into a parol contract of copartnership to carry on a real estate business together, dividing the expenses and losses between them equally; that the expenses of the Los Angeles office and of the Brawley office and the profits were to be shared equally; that said partnership has been conducted until March 1, 1914, except for the failure of appellant to perform his duties under the agreement of partnership; and that he is guilty of serious misconduct.

[2, 3] We are of the opinion that the foregoing summary abundantly shows the evidence is sufficient to support the findings of partnership. This summary does not assume to refer to all of the evidence, for the record of the trial covers some 1,300 pages of the printed transcript on appeal. We have, however, fully examined the evidence and think we have developed it sufficiently for the purposes of this opinion. While it presents contradictions and inconsistencies on both sides as to the relationship between the parties, it will be presumed the court took all such matters into account in arriving at its decision. The respective versions of the parties as to the character of the relationship present a sharp conflict in the evidence and we are bound by the determination of the question by the trial court. The evidence of appellant's conduct and his admissions (section 1832, Code Civ. Proc.) as to the existence of the partnership, which we must assume the court believed and acted upon, would alone support the findings.

[4] Many of the assignments of insufficiency are addressed to the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, which were for the trial court to determine. Appellant cites a number of authorities to support the proposition that in the absence of a written agreement of partnership he who alleges its existence must assume the burden of establishing it with clear proof, which indisputably is the law. Certain phases of the evidence are emphasized in the argument: For instance, it is pointed out that in a number of deals each of the parties retained the commission he collected; that there is a variance between the allegations and proof—it is alleged appellant was to devote all of his time to the partnership business, and that he subscribed for telephone service after the partnership was formed, as to which matters respondent's testimony is silent. But it was not necessary to allege or prove that appellant was to give all his time to the business in order to constitute a partnership. Other illustrations are that each party had his own individual cards and stationery printed subsequently to October 1, 1912, giving the same office address; that on respondent's card the appellant's name appeared as his "sole agent," respondent claiming, however, that this referred to his grading, and not to his real estate business; that respondent's name was not put on the door of room 441 with appellant's, nor did he have it printed on room 440 after removing the name of the former occupant; that there was no partnership bank account; that the advertisements which respondent put in the Brawley News both for the grading and real estate business were in his individual name; that he had an individual rubber stamp made, the cost of which was charged to him personally, respondent testifying, however, that the stamp was used on his old stationery; that respondent presented for the first time at the trial a statement or claim purporting to show the expenses he incurred for the partnership to the extent of about $2,500 for the months of January, February, March, April, and May, 1913 (which is included in the accounting), and as to which appellant makes the point that, notwithstanding respondent now claims he is entitled to this credit, he said nothing to appellant about it when the latter was endeavoring to collect from him one-half of the office expenses; that during this time respondent was "hard up" and borrowed money of appellant. But in view of what we have already said it will not be necessary to further consider the arguments of appellant as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of partnership.

2. The court found that the Yokum-Owen and Johnson-Ringer-Owen deals were partnership transactions, and the money held by the bank partnership funds; that the contracts with the agent and the sales agent, and the trust agreement and declaration of trust, were for the benefit of the partnership. Respondent testified these were partnership transactions, and appellant denied respondent was in any manner connected with them. The findings must be upheld.

3. The appellant contends that findings III, VI, and XI relative to the town site are without support in the evidence. His position is that the town site was his own personal undertaking, that respondent had no interest in it, and that he paid no part of the consideration. In other words, appellant's claim is that respondent's connection with the town site was by virtue of a contract entered into between them whereby respondent agreed to level, grade, and lay out the property; that he did the work and was paid for it.

The testimony of the parties as to the town site is strictly at variance. Respondent testified that the partnership owned the town site; that in July, 1912, either appellant or Prescott gave him for investigation a list of United States government lands in the Imperial Valley that were to be thrown open for homestead entry on August 22d following; that he told appellant the quarter section would make an "elegant town site"; that appellant said he did not have sufficient money to "scrip" it, but to let W. I. Alcott (appellant's son) file on it, "and later on maybe we would have the money and we would buy it from him"; that W. I. Alcott came to the Imperial Valley on August 20th, and on the night of the 22d respondent let him have an equipment and he went on the land "a few seconds after midnight"; respondent testified he had witnesses present to note the making of the location. W. I. Alcott filed on the land September 23d. Respondent testified that he agreed to grade and clear the land as an offset for the moneys expended by appellant for the relinquishment and "scripping" of the location. There is a variance in the complaint, the evidence, and the findings as to the cost of the work. The complaint alleged it to be $5,500; respondent testified that he and appellant figured it would cost $4,000; while the finding is $4,200. Respondent explained that "the $5,500 stated in the complaint, I understood, included some work on the high-line canal," and that the item is apportioned between the town site and the high-line ditch in the accounting. However this may be, appellant's answer alleged that respondent agreed to do the town site work for him for $4,200.

Respondent's testimony is corroborated by several of his witnesses. As already shown, H. E. Williams, Miss Cressie Mitchell, and Miss Louise Barker testified to admissions by appellant as to the town site. Miss Catherine Gatzman testified that she wrote letters to respondent at the dictation of appellant regarding lands in the Imperial Valley. Alexander M. Williams also testified appellant told him that he and respondent "should make at least $100,000 apiece out of it. * * * You know he has an interest in the town site, but if he isn't careful he won't get anything." Mrs. Welch also gave corroborating testimony as to the ownership of the town site by the partnership. Appellant testified that in August, 1912, respondent told him about this quarter section and an adjoining quarter section at Imperial Junction; that he employed respondent to put W. I. Alcott on the 320 acres and agreed to pay him $250 for his services—$100 when W. I. Alcott went into the Valley, and the other $150 on the making of the entry; that respondent put W. I. Alcott on the quarter section involved here on August 22d, where he remained until March, 1913; that appellant paid respondent $100; that in February, 1913, he purchased the relinquishment from W. I. Alcott for which he paid him $2,400, and secured scrip for the property at a cost of $2,020; that he contracted with respondent to level and grade the town site for $4,200; that the work was done by respondent and the contract price paid; and that respondent had nothing to do with the sale of any town-site lots or with platting the town.

Appellant produced a number of witnesses. Clarence J. Park testified he platted the town site under the appellant's direction. "I had a letter from Alcott to say as to how the work should be done. I located the center line on the streets, and Mr. Alcott and Mr. Welch and myself discussed the best manner of doing the work. * * * I had no conversation with Mr. Welch as to whether he was doing the work by contract or otherwise." J. E. Arnold testified respondent told him he did the town-site grading by contract for $4,000. "Nothing was said about Welch having any interest in the town site. Welch did say, however, 'If I had anything to do with Imperial Junction I would show them how to do it and stir things up.'" W. M. Boyle testified respondent told him he had graded the town site for appellant for $4,000. Myron D. Witter testified he was connected with a Brawley newspaper; that respondent did advertising in his own name; that appellant ran an advertisement for "scripping" Imperial Junction in his own name. L. O. Crummer testified that in his conversation with respondent, the latter never made any statement about having any interest in the town site, and W. I. Alcott testified he never had any conversation with his father about relinquishing the town site until March, 1913, and that he never discussed the subject with respondent. B. E. Colvin, F. G. Havens, and Hedge A. Havens testified they would not believe either respondent or Clarence R. Conover under oath.

The court further found that, pursuant to the agreement of partnership, respondent and appellant agreed to procure the relinquishment of the quarter section at Imperial Junction for the purpose of establishing a town site thereon, that appellant procured the relinquishment and paid to the homestead entryman (W. I. Alcott) $2,400, and for the same purpose procured soldiers' additional rights, called scrip, and subsequently a patent for the quarter section, and informed respondent that he had paid $1,715 ($1,790 is the amount alleged in the complaint) therefor on account of the partnership; that respondent should promptly level and grade the land for the necessary streets and lots of a town site for the partnership account, and as an offset for the cash paid out by appellant, the difference in amounts to be adjusted in the partnership accounts; that respondent did level and grade the town site at a cost of about $4,200 for the partnership account; "that appellant was guilty of serious misconduct in that he began advertising the said property as his sole estate and advertising himself as the sole owner and held out to the public falsely at times the claim that he was the sole owner of the said town site."

Upon this and other evidence it is plain that the findings touching the town site cannot be disturbed. As on the issue of the character of the relationship between the parties, the evidence of admissions by and the conduct of appellant would alone support a finding that the town site was a partnership affair. The evidence is involved in conflict on every material phase of this issue. It was for the trial court to determine whether the testimony of respondent or appellant as to this project was true, and, as their respective versions are diametrically opposed, it would serve no purpose to state in detail the arguments of appellant. It is not questioned that respondent did the work, and according to the theory of appellant the contract price was $4,200, which the court found to be the cost. We have quoted from respondent's testimony that the difference between the amount charged ($5,500) and the amount found ($4,200) was on account of the high-line ditch. Moreover, the findings are to the effect that respondent was to improve the property an as offset to appellant's cash contribution, and there is no suggestion that the doing of the work was dependent on the cost thereof.

Appellant lays stress on what he describes as inconsistencies and contradictions in respondent's position. Our attention is directed to an affidavit which he made on July 22, 1913, wherein he averred that his "occupation is a teaming contractor and his principal work is that of doing assessment work on government land entries," and that during the four years he had known the quarter section it has been in its natural desert state except for the work done by appellant and his predecessor in interest, W. I. Alcott. This affidavit was made in connection with the application of Carmen F. Carlson for reinstatement on the land. Attorney George R. Wickham, whom appellant employed in that proceeding, testified respondent stated to him he was to do the work for appellant and never spoke about his, the attorney's, employment or paid him any part of his fee. Reference is made to the following testimony of Mrs. Sadie B. Hendricks, having regard to the Hendricks' deal:

"I * * * demanded the money back. * * * I said to him, 'You said you were working for Mr. Alcott. Why don't you get it from him?' and he said that he was overpaid already. He said that he had a contract to grade Imperial Junction and was getting over $4,000 for the work. * * *"

But, while this affidavit may appear inconsistent with respondent's claim that the town site was partnership property, it is conceivable the trial court concluded the parties were in collusion for the purposes of the contest.

[5] It may be said generally of appellant's contentions as to the town site that the evidence, considered together, is ample to support the findings. It was for the trial court to harmonize any inconsistencies or contradictions, and to consider the evidence of impeachment in arriving at its conclusion, and we must assume in favor of the judgment that this was done.

4. This is likewise true of appellant's contention in regard to a certain chattel mortgage for $3,500, dated March 14, 1913, given him by respondent, which the former asserts and the latter denies was for a consideration. This transaction was not pleaded, and no finding was made in regard to it. Appellant testified that in March or April, 1913, respondent executed the mortgage on his grading equipment (which was inventoried at $5,602.50) for $3,500; the consideration being made up of $1,500 which appellant claimed respondent had borrowed in different sums from him, and $2,000 for the R. M. Sipple tract—14—11—13—which respondent was to give to Mrs. Martin, his mother-in-law. Appellant had previously purchased the property from Sipple. This was the second mortgage respondent had executed on his grading equipment, one having been given to the First National Bank of Brawley for $900. Appellant claims he paid for the grading work by the release of the $3,500 mortgage and the payment to respondent of $700 in cash. Respondent's version is that he said to appellant:

"'I have got to get some money to keep things going and to get this thing straightened out.' He said, 'I thought we would make some money.' I said to him 'You told me you could raise money.' * * * He said, 'The bank has a first mortgage on your grading outfit; you give me a second mortgage and that will hold things together until we can sell some lots and take care of things. I will hold it until we get the town site fixed up and we can sell some lots. If we don't, we can't get the town site fixed up or get the water there either.'"

Respondent also testified that he received no consideration from appellant for the chattel mortgage; that it was given to protect respondent from his creditors while he was extending the high-line ditch to the town site; and that about a year after he completed that work appellant released the chattel mortgage, without any consideration.

Appellant argues that certain admissions and conduct of respondent preclude the idea that the mortgage was without consideration and was merely given to protect the equipment from the claims of respondent's creditors. Frank Birkhauser, attorney for the First National Bank of Brawley, testified that on or about July 31, 1913, in a conversation between himself and the parties, the respondent requested an extension of time, but that the bank wanted appellant to release certain of the mortgaged property so that it would have additional security before extending the time on the mortgage. The witness said:

"At a conversation in front of the Bungalow Hotel Welch said that Alcott's mortgage was paid by work, I think, on the town site."

Appellant also mentions the evidence that the stenographer wrote, "Bal. in full payment of chattel mortgage," on the check stub when, as he claims, the final $500 was paid, and other matters which he asserts tend to prove that there was a consideration for the mortgage. In support of respondent's position that there was no consideration he emphasizes the fact that in Plaintiff's Exhibit I appears the entry of March 4, 1913, "Relinq. R. M. Sipple $400," and on the same page of the book one-half of the total expenses for this month are charged to respondent, notwithstanding appellant's claim that he agreed to purchase this identical property a few days later for $2,000. Moreover, respondent contends appellant has not satisfactorily accounted for the remaining $1,500. Two items of $500 and $125, respectively, appear in schedule 10, and appellant makes the indefinite statement as to the payment of the remaining $875:

"The balance of the chattel mortgage consisted of several small items. * * * It was all figured up at the time."

A finding against appellant's contention must be implied from the omission of a credit in the account for the $875.

[6] Appellant makes the point that it is neither alleged nor found that respondent agreed with appellant to do the grading work, but merely that the appellant "urged and insisted" that it be done by respondent "as an offset for the cash paid out by defendant Alcott." The quoted language is from the complaint. We think this is equivalent to a formal allegation that the parties made an agreement to that effect. In any event the work was done. A partnership to engage in the real estate business having been found, the presumption is that all transactions within its scope would be for the benefit of such partnership.

5. Appellant also makes the point that respondent is entitled to no relief because by his own admissions the chattel mortgage was fraudulent. Respondent, in answer to this contention, relies on the testimony already quoted to show that appellant originally suggested the execution of the chattel mortgage. The presumption is that the court so resolved the evidence, and hence appellant is estopped to invoke the equitable doctrine.

6. Appellant contends that the evidence does not justify the implied finding that the work of bringing water to the town site through the high-line ditch was a partnership undertaking, and in debiting him with one-half of $2,033.87—the amount of the loss on high-line ditch No. 5. This project was not pleaded, but findings in favor of respondent are to be implied from the accounting wherein the debts and the above loss appear. Respondent's testimony as to the high-line ditch is that in the latter part of 1912 he suggested to appellant it would be advisable to secure water for the town site, and that the Imperial Water Company had offered him a contract to extend the high-line ditch to the property; that he told appellant the contract would entail a loss, and that the latter replied, " 'Well, anyway, we can manage to get the water up to the junction, and whatever it is when we sell the town site * * * we will balance it up.' He told me the loss whatever I would be put to, or we would be put to, on the high-line ditch, we would divide between us;" that he entered into a contract with J. W. Yokum, vice president and director of the Imperial Water Company, to extend high-line ditch No. 3 and high-line ditch No. 5, on a per diem basis for his teams; and that he made the extension and the water went through the ditch to the town site. The appellant testified he had no connection whatever with this undertaking, but that respondent did the work under a contract with J. W. Yokum. He stated further that about March 1, 1913, he learned for the first time that respondent was doing the work; that respondent "had gone in the hole on the high-line work"; came to him and wanted money "to pay his help on the high-line work." Appellant's position is that the extension of the high-line ditch was a matter between respondent and J. W. Yokum, and that he was in no way connected with it.

J. W. Yokum testified he had an oral agreement with respondent about work on high-line ditch No. 5; that he and respondent went to the Brawley Bank and signed up a contract whereby the latter was to get paid as he went along. Frank Birkhauser testified respondent and Yokum came in to arrange for some work on the high-line ditch, and that respondent was to get paid as he did the work. The evidence as to this work is such that the implied finding it was done for account of the partnership must be sustained. Respondent's testimony is flatly contradicted by appellant, but that only presents a conflict which the court resolved on the side of the former. In addition to the evidence already set forth, it appears, among other things, that in a letter to Mrs. Martin under date of August 15, 1913, appellant said:

"I am assured by the water company that they will furnish me water about November 1st, and, being one of the organizers of the water company No. 3, I am positive that the information is correct."

The court may have attached importance to this letter in view of appellant's testimony he was not aware the work was being done. We must conclude that respondent's version was accepted by the court. Moreover, the project was of great concern to the successful operation of the town site, and the trial court probably concluded the work was not done without the cognizance and co-operation of appellant.

7. Appellant next contends the evidence is insufficient to support findings III and VI, as to the Hall-Sutton, Bergon-Antes, Easton-Mitchell, and Flicker deals, and the accounting thereof, for the reason that they are contrary to the admissions of the pleadings and to the evidence. The method pursued by the court in the accounting was to credit each of the parties with the money paid out by him for the benefit of the partnership, and to debit each with the commissions received by him; the difference between the relative contributions and expenses forming the basis of the money judgment in favor of respondent. The account appears in ten schedules and is presented in recapitulatory form in the findings as follows:

Credit.

Money paid out by Alcott for benefit of the partnership:
Expenses of real estate business (Schedule 1)		$2,832 41
On account of town site of "Niland" (Schedule 2)		5,656 86
Traveling expenses account of town site (Schedule 3)		624 15
Total credit		$9,113 42

Debit.

Commissions from real estate business (Schedule 4)	$4,151 54
Sale of town lots at "Niland" (Schedule 5)	2,045 00
Total debit	$6,196 54	6,196 54
Partnership owes Alcott		$2,916 88

Credit.

Money paid out by Welch for benefit of partnership:
Expenses of real estate business (Schedule 6)		$1,781 15
On account of town site (Schedule 7)		4,200 00
Loss, high-line ditch (Schedule 8)		2,033 87
Total credit		$8,015 02

Debit.

Welch received for use and benefit of partnership:
Commissions from real estate business (Schedule 9)	$1,825 00
Cash from Alcott (Schedule 10)	1,271 78
Total debit	$3,096 78	3,096 78
Partnership owes Welch		$4,918 24
Welch credit	$4,918 24
Alcott credit	2,916 88
Welch over Alcott	$2,001 36

The account then states the debts of the partnership:
High-line ditch No. 5	$4,249 37
Debts in the real estate business	503 33
	$4,752 70

In the Hall-Sutton deal the testimony of both parties agrees with the complaint and answer that a commission of $900 was earned, received by appellant, and one-half thereof paid by him to respondent. The finding is that "the commission * * * was $900, * * * and * * * was paid to the said defendant Alcott and shown in the accounting taken herein." In the accounting the $900 is debited to appellant in schedule 4, but respondent is not debited with any part thereof in schedule 9. Appellant testified:

"That deal was all settled at the time it was made. It was settled by a division of the money; * * * there has never been any contention between us in regard to the Hall-Sutton money. * * * I turned over the money to Welch right there in my office in cash."

The following colloquy occurred:

"Mr. Alcott: The amount of the Hall-Sutton commission would be $900. That deal was all settled at the time it was made. It was settled by a division of the money; by a division of the Hall-Sutton money.

"Mr. Clark: That is the allegation of the complaint and the admission of the answer.

"The Court: If that is the admission of the answer, there is not much use in going into it.

"Mr. Prescott: Well, it ought to be included in this statement.

"The Court: I cannot make them put it in the statement. It would be included in the judgment.

"Mr. Prescott: That is all right, then.

"The Court: That left $818.03 to be divided.

"Mr. Clark: Your honor, of course, will have regard for the testimony of the plaintiff that it was divided between them.

"The Court: I know it was divided between them. Proceed, gentlemen."

Respondent testified:

"As a final result of the deal I believe Alcott drawed down the money, paid the expenses, and gave me my share of the commission."

Obviously, if the parties each received one-half of the commission each should be debited accordingly, or the transaction omitted from the accounting entirely. Respondent gives no satisfactory explanation in his brief as to why he was not debited with $450, and we do not find that appellant was anywhere given credit in the accounting for the payment of that sum to respondent.

It may be explained that Plaintiff's Exhibit 1 is the book of account referred to in the testimony of Miss Kate Gatzman as having been kept by appellant in which the expenses of the partnership paid by the Los Angeles office were entered. It was the practice of appellant at the close of each month during the first year to total the expenses, debit respondent with half thereof, together with any cash advanced to him, then credit him with half of the commissions of the particular month, and the difference, if any, between half of the commissions and half of the expenses, carried over to his credit or debit, as the case might be, in the succeeding month. Defendant's Exhibit 62A is a statement prepared by him of all commissions which he received. The Hall-Sutton deal does not appear in such monthly adjustments in Plaintiff's Exhibit 1, nor in Defendant's Exhibit 62A. The accounting is therefore erroneous in that, while appellant is charged with the entire commission, respondent was not debited with one-half thereof which the complaint alleges and he testified he received.

Respondent will be debited with $450 and the debit against appellant reduced correspondingly.

[7, 8] But, apart from the accounting, no issue was presented by the pleadings as to the disposition of the commission. "Every material allegation of the complaint, not controverted by the answer, must, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true. * * *" Section 462, Code Civ. Proc. It was said in Burnett v. Stearns, 33 Cal. 468:

"The finding should be confined to the facts in issue. The province of the court in respect to facts is to determine but not to raise the issue."

See, also, Ortega v. Cordero, 88 Cal. 221, 26 Pac. 80.

"Where a complaint in an action contains an allegation of fact which is distinctly and unqualifiedly admitted by the answer, there is no issue as to the fact. The allegation of fact being admitted it is conclusive. A finding against the admission is therefore outside the issues." White v. Douglass, 71 Cal. 115, 119, 11 Pac. 860.

It was declared in the Matter of Doyle, 73 Cal. 564, 570, 15 Pac. 125, 128:

"When a trial is had by the court without a jury, a fact admitted by the pleadings should be treated as 'found.' * * * If the court does find adversely to the admission, such finding should be disregarded in determining the question whether the proper conclusion of law was drawn from the facts found and admitted by the pleadings. * * * In such case the facts alleged must be assumed to exist. Any finding adverse to the admitted facts drops from the record, and any legal conclusion which is not upheld by the admitted facts is erroneous."

See, also, Hutchison v. Barr, 190 Pac. 799; Sutherland on Code Pleading, § 1167.

"There can be no necessity of a finding as to a fact admitted by the pleadings. The finding is required only when an allegation of a material fact in the complaint is controverted by the answer, so as to raise an issue." Swift v. Muygridge, 8 Cal. 445.

The Easton-Mitchell deal comes under the same general rule. It is alleged in the pleadings and testified to by appellant and respondent that the commission of $400 was earned and divided equally between them. The court found that appellant received the entire amount, which is accordingly debited to him in schedule 4, with no corresponding debit to respondent in schedule 9. In the absence of any issue of fact as to the division of the commissions, there was no need of findings except on the issue of partnership. Respondent must therefore be debited with $200, and the $400 debited to appellant in the accounting reduced correspondingly.

In the Bergon-Antes deal the complaint alleged that "a commission of $233.20 was made and the same divided equally" between the parties. This seems to be the full amount of the commission in this deal. The answer, however, admits the sale and alleges "that the commission was split in three parts and divided" equally between the parties and Frank C. Prescott, Jr. The court found appellant received the commission, and the amount, therefore, is debited to him in schedule 4, and no part of it is debited to respondent in schedule 9. Respondent's direct testimony is: "I was not present when it was settled. I never understood that Frank C. Prescott, Jr., had anything to do with it. I had no talk with Alcott about the commission." On cross-examination respondent stated:

"I don't know that Prescott got one third of the commission. Alcott told me that he did and I asked Prescott and he said he didn't."

It is argued in respondent's brief that the finding is in no way inconsistent, but in referring to the accounting this statement is made:

"The monthly balances were ignored and a general balance struck; $116.60 went to Welch, $116.60 to Alcott, and $116.60 to Prescott, Jr."

Appellant's testimony is in line with his answer, but Plaintiff's Exhibit 1 shows that in making up the balance for December, 1912, respondent was credited with $116.60 against his share of the expenses for that month, while Defendant's Exhibit 62A credits him with $77.73, the same sum being debited to Prescott. The only issue calling for a finding as to this commission was whether it was divided into two or three parts. As the testimony in the two said exhibits presents a conflict, it must, in the face of the findings, be presumed the court concluded the parties alone were entitled to the commission, but, as the pleadings allege and admit the commission was divided, it follows it should not be debited to appellant alone. Respondent will therefore be debited one-half thereof—with $116.60—and appellant's debit reduced correspondingly.

In the Flicker deal the complaint alleged that the partnership earned a commission of $532, and that it was divided equally between the parties. The answer admits the commission was earned, but alleges it was split into three equal parts, the parties and one G. J. Reinert each receiving one-third. The court found appellant received and retained $533.34. The only variation in the testimony of the parties (Reinert did not testify) is that, while appellant testified Reinert received one-third, respondent stated he received "a part of it," and in view of the vague and indefinite character of respondent's testimony on the point it must be assumed the court found that by the quoted phrase was meant his share of the commission. Appellant is debited in schedule 4, but respondent is not debited with any portion of the commission in schedule 9. It is evident from the record that the total commission was $800, and that the pleadings must be construed as alleging and admitting that one-third thereof was actually paid to Reinert. In other words, the only dispute between the parties concerning the commission was as to the two-thirds of the $800—$533.34 (stated, however, as $532 in the complaint and answer). There can be no question but that Reinert actually received one-third of the $800. This is borne out by Defendant's Exhibit 62A, for therein the amount of the commission is indicated as $800, $266.66 of which was paid to Reinert and $266.67 credited each to respondent and appellant. Giving this interpretation to the pleadings, no issue is presented as to the division of the commission—the complaint and answer alleging it was divided—and there was no occasion for findings. Respondent must therefore be debited with $266.67, and appellant's debit of $533.34 reduced correspondingly.

It is proper to mention that in respect to the question of fact whether respondent actually received his share of the Easton-Mitchell, Bergon-Antes, and Flicker deals, or was merely given book credit therefor by appellant, that Defendant's Exhibit 62A contains this admission:

"Credits due Edmund Welch on commissions on Easton-Mitchell, the Bergon-Antes, and Flicker deals amounting to $544.40 [$200, $77.73, and $266.67, respectively, or a total of $544.40] credited on office expenses." (Italics ours.)

However, in the presence of appellant's contentions we have, where applicable, decided according to the state of the pleadings. But, whatever may be the fact as to these deals, respondent actually received his share of the Hall-Sutton commission.

Appellant attacks the finding in the Hendricks deal which is to the effect that a sale was attempted in the business of, but no commission was made for the partnership. The complaint alleged the deal was made in the business of the partnership, and a commission of $200 was earned "and the same accounted for in the partnership." The answer denies the deal was for the partnership, and alleges it was "made by the plaintiff alone and for his own account"; that appellant had nothing to do with it, nor did he claim or receive any part of the commission received by respondent. The commission does not appear in the accounting. Respondent testified the deal was made by him and Carroll Owen, and that he (respondent) got all the commission, and "it was never accounted for in the partnership." Appellant's testimony follows the answer. The finding is that the partnership did not earn the commission. All the evidence, however, shows respondent actually received the commission and retained it. The finding is therefore contrary to the complaint and the evidence. It was developed in the direct examination of respondent that an action brought by Hendricks against him alone for the recovery of the commission on the ground of fraud was then pending. It is not made to appear, however, whether this action is responsible for the finding. A new trial of this issue is necessary.

Appellant also questions the findings in the following deals, the first three of which were made by the respondent: It was alleged in the Hanson deal that the commission was $475, and this amount was debited to respondent in schedule 9. The Wills deal was not pleaded. The respondent was debited with the entire commission as being $150. Because respondent testified the commission was "$150 or $160" appellant claims the accounting was not correct. But the evidence would sustain a finding of either $150 or $160, and therefore cannot be disturbed. As we have sustained the findings of partnership, it follows that all deals after October 1, 1912, were partnership affairs, and, as appellant was credited with his share in the accounting, we shall not further consider the contentions as to these two deals. The Judd-Lewis deal was not pleaded. There was a conflict in the evidence as to whether the commission was "between $300 and $400" as respondent testified, or " $400" as L. O. Crummer, appellant's witness, testified. The court found it to be $320, and it was divided equally in the accounting. There was ample evidence to sustain the finding.

The point made by appellant in the Williams, Yokum-Owen, Johnson-Ringer-Owen, and Surfleuth deals, the commissions in which were received and retained by and debited to appellant, is that he made the deals independently of respondent. But this point is foreclosed by the findings of partnership. In the Terwilliger and Edgar-Andrews deals it was alleged they were conducted jointly by and the commissions divided equally between respondent and appellant. The latter's objections to these transactions is answered by the findings of partnership as is the point made in the Medberry deal.

Appellant also urges that respondent was improperly allowed a credit of $230 in the judgment. The record shows that this sum is for one-half of $460 which the court found was subsequently collected by appellant on account of principal and interest on the Yokum-Owen and Johnson-Ringer-Owen notes. The accounting shows that respondent's contribution to the partnership exceeded that of appellant's by $2,001.36. The judgment directs that respondent be allowed $230, as representing "one-half of defendant Alcott's subsequent collections on said notes of $460"—making a total money judgment of $2,231.36 in favor of respondent.

The first of these notes, dated March 20,

1913, was for $1,600, to run for two years, with interest at 7 per cent. payable semi-annually. A $168 interest debit appears in Defendant's Exhibit 62A and has been debited to appellant in schedule 4. When the judgment was entered on October 28, 1915, the fifth payment of interest was due, making a total of $280 (5 times $56), and, deducting therefrom the above $168, a balance of $112 remained. Four payments of $56 each were indorsed on the note (each representing six months' interest). Another payment of $56 appeared on the second note, evidently by mistake, as will be readily apparent from the difference in the respective interest payments. Here, then, was one of the "subsequent collections" of $112.

The second note, dated March 21, 1913, was for $1,700, to run for 90 days with interest at 7 per cent., payable quarterly. A payment of $300 was made on the principal of this note on July 18, 1913, leaving $1,400 due on the principal sum. Seven per cent. on $1,400 makes a quarterly payment of interest of $24.50, so that when the judgment was entered the total interest representing ten payments amounted to $245. In Defendant's Exhibit 62A, appellant debited himself with six payments of $24.50 each, or $147, which sum is also debited in schedule 4. Six interest indorsements of $24.50 each appear in this note. The difference between $147, six payments, and $245, ten payments, makes another of the "subsequent collections" of $98. Hence these two "subsequent collections" make a total of $210. Add to this $250, a partial payment on the principal on May 14, 1914, and a total of $460 results, one-half of which is credited to respondent in the judgment. In the computations of interest on this note no account is taken of the above $300 partial payment on the principal between June 21, 1913, the close of the first interest quarter, and July 18, 1913, the date of said payment, or between May 13, 1914, the date of the payment of $250 on the principal, and September 21, 1915, the end of the quarter immediately preceding the rendition of the judgment. But if the point is raised these items can be adjusted when the notes are liquidated.

8. Appellant's next contention is that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the findings settling the account. We quote from the brief:

"The defendant's exceptions to the statement of the account by the court, which covers practically all of the items thereof."

One hundred thirty-four objections and exceptions were made and taken to the statement of account by the court, many of them relating to inconsequential items. We have considered these specifications, and do not think appellant could have been seriously prejudiced by any of the indicated rulings, even if erroneous, for there is an abundance of competent evidence to sustain the account. It will not be necessary, therefore, to describe these specifications.

9. In connection with appellant's contentions that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of partnership it is urged that the complaint is insufficient. It is asserted that—

"The allegations of the complaint as to the partnership in the real estate business are not only insufficient, but the specific allegations therein as to deals made and division of commissions earned are sufficient to show that no partnership in fact existed between the parties."

This point was raised on demurrer. We submit that the specific allegations as to the real estate deals in the complaint must control the general allegations of partnership. The demurrer is not contained in the record. It is sufficient to state that this contention overlooks other allegations of the complaint which make it clear that a partnership, and not an agreement for a division of gross earnings, is pleaded.

10. Appellant has cited a great many authorities in support of his contentions, which contain correct statements of the rules of law to which they are addressed. None of them is opposed to the conclusion we have reached. For instance, it is urged that the parties must have formed a definite intention to become partners. We have already subscribed to the doctrine that the burden of establishing a partnership is on the one alleging its existence. Appellant cites Wheeler v. Farmer, 38 Cal. 203, 213, to the proposition that "an agreement to divide the gross earnings does not constitute the parties to it partners." But neither that authority nor any of the others relied upon by appellant sustains his contention that the relationship between these parties did not constitute a partnership.

[9, 10] It may be conceded that an agreement to divide the gross earnings would not of itself constitute a partnership, but, according to the pleadings, the evidence, and the findings, the parties did more than agree to divide the gross earnings; they agreed to divide the profits of the business.

"A right to participate in profits affords cogent, often conclusive, evidence that the trade in which the profits have been made was carried on in part for or on behalf of the person setting up such a claim." Lord Cranworth in Cox v. Hickman, 8 H. L. Cas. 268; Gilmore on Partnership, p. 31.

It has also been declared that—

"Sharing profits is prima facie evidence of the existence of a partnership." Gilmore on Partnership, § 11, p. 31; Uniform Partnership Act, Rowley Modern Law of Partnership, § 84.

"Profits" is a relative term and contemplates losses. The Civil Code provides:

Section 2395:

"Partnership is the association of two or more persons, for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them." (Italics ours.)

Section 2404:

"An agreement to divide the profits of a business implies an agreement for a corresponding division of its losses, unless it is otherwise expressly stipulated."

The appellant does not contend that the incidental expenses of the deals and the expenses of the Los Angeles office were not to be divided equally between them. Plaintiff's Exhibit 1 was kept under appellant's direction and shows that the expenses were entered therein and half of them charged to respondent. The evidence, including correspondence between the parties, the admissions and conduct of appellant, is sufficient to prove that the parties formed a definite intention to enter into a partnership relation, and that the business between them was carried on pursuant to this agreement and understanding. It is not claimed there was any stipulation between the parties that they should not divide the losses (section 2404, Civ. Code), and, as already stated, the court charged to each of the parties one-half of $2,033.87, the amount of the loss on high-line ditch No. 5.

[11] 11. There is no merit in appellant's next contention that the failure of the court to make findings within the meaning of section 632, Code of Civil Procedure, prior to the taking of the account, was error. We quote from the record:

"The court announced that it would find in favor of the plaintiff as to the existence of a partnership * * * as to the real estate business and also in the town site."

It was clearly within the discretion of the court to make the findings on the issue of partnership either before or after the accounting was made.

[12] 12. Appellant complains of the action of the court in modifying the judgment after the entry thereof and while the motion for a new trial was pending. The modification was made upon the offer of respondent to waive $2,033.87, the amount of the loss on the high-line ditch for which respondent was given credit in schedule 8, and which the court in the judgment also directed be paid out of the partnership funds. In other words, the double credit to respondent for the amount resulted in appellant having to stand his share of the loss twice. But, as the modification was in favor of appellant, he will not be heard to complain.

13. In the final paragraph of appellant's opening brief it is stated the exceptions to the rulings on the admission and rejection of evidence "are all urged and not waived." This refers to some 105 rulings, many of them relating to the issue of partnership, the evidence to establish which we have found to be sufficient. The rulings are not otherwise specified, but even if, in particular instances, they were erroneous, it cannot be maintained appellant was prejudiced thereby.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial upon the issues as to the Hendricks deal only. With respect to the issues as to the partnership and all the issues relative to the accounting except those relating to the Hendricks deal, the findings as heretofore made by the court below shall stand as made, and after a new finding upon the issues as to the Hendricks deal the court below, upon a consideration of all the findings, shall enter judgment thereon dissolving the partnership and settling the entire account as before, except that as to the Hall-Sutton, Bergon-Antes, Easton-Mitchell, and the Flicker items of the account the judgment be in accord with the views expressed in this opinion, and as to the Hendricks deal in accord with the new findings thereon. Appellant shall recover costs of this appeal.

In re RELPH'S ESTATE.

BLACKWELL v. SUPERIOR COURT OF STANISLAUS COUNTY et al.

(Sac. 3257.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 2, 1921.)

Executors and administrators ⊂=29(5)—Order, granting letters of administration, adjudication of fact of residence of deceased.

The order of the superior court of San Joaquin county, granting letters of administration, was an adjudication of the fact of residence of the deceased in that county, binding upon the whole world, unless vacated or set aside on direct attack, for all the purposes of the administration of the estate of deceased, including the probate of any subsequently produced will.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by Ida Blackwell against the Superior Court of Stanislaus County and others to compel the court to proceed in the matter of the probate of the will of Glenn C. Relph, deceased. Writ denied.

J. B. Curtin, of Sonora, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The court is of the opinion that under the well-settled law of this state the order of the superior court of San Joaquin county, granting letters of administration, was an adjudication of the fact of residence of the deceased in that county, binding upon the whole world, unless vacated or set aside on direct attack, for all the purposes of the administration of the estate of the deceased, including the probate of any subsequently produced will.

The application for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court of Stanislaus county to proceed in the matter of the alleged will of the deceased is therefore denied.

All concur.

STONE v. GILL. (Civ. 3499.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 14, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸706(5)—Evidence held to warrant finding automobile driver was negligent in failing to see pedestrian.

In an action for injuries to pedestrian who was struck by automobile which came up behind him while he was walking in the street, evidence held to warrant the jury in finding the automobile driver negligent in failing to discover the presence of the pedestrian in time to avoid striking him.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸705(10) — Fact that pedestrian was walking on street and not looking behind does not show contributory negligence.

Evidence that pedestrian was walking on the street at night and that he did not keep lookout behind him for approaching vehicles does not compel the court to find him negligent.

3. Damages ⟸132(7)—$3,500 for broken leg and other injuries held not excessive.

An award of $3,700, of which $200 was for expenditures, leaving $3,500 as compensation for injuries, is not excessive, where the evidence showed plaintiff suffered a broken leg and severe injuries to his ribs, hip, and back muscles which confined him to his bed for four weeks and caused great pain and loss of sleep, and that at the trial one bone had not yet healed, is not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by George R. Stone against J. W. Gill to recover damages for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Walter J. Hartzell, of Redlands, and McNabb & Hodge, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Burton E. Hales, of Redlands, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover damages for personal injuries resulting from a collision between plaintiff and an automobile driven by the defendant. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $3,700, of which $200 covered expenditures for medical attendance and nursing, and the remainder of the award was allowed as general damages for the injuries received. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

On the evening of February 20, 1919, between 6 and 7 o'clock, plaintiff was walking west on the public highway known as West Fern avenue, in the city of Redlands. The complaint alleged that while he was thus walking, the defendant negligently drove his automobile along the street in the same direction in which the plaintiff was walking and carelessly and negligently struck the plaintiff and ran over him, thereby causing the injuries for which recovery was sought. The grounds of appeal which are presented for consideration relate solely to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings. Appellant contends: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to prove actionable negligence on his part; (2) that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence which constituted a proximate cause of the accident; (3) that the damages awarded are excessive.

[1] From the plaintiff's testimony it appears that he walked westerly near the middle of Fern avenue several hundred feet before he was struck by defendant's automobile; that it had been raining earlier in the evening, but was not raining during this walk on Fern avenue nor at the time of the accident; that at the time of the accident "it was not misting at all"; that the sidewalks were wet and slippery, and, on account of trees, were considerably darker than the street; that for this reason there was less danger of slipping on the street than while walking on the sidewalks; that while walking on Fern avenue at the time of and prior to the instant of the collision he was watching carefully for objects coming toward him from the front, but did not look behind; that he did not see appellant's machine or hear it (that there was no signal or horn blown); that there were street lights fixed to posts so that the greater part of the light was reflected onto the street. The plaintiff's wife testified that after the accident defendant told her that he ran into the plaintiff; that "his lights were very poor and he could not see him." The defendant testified that he could see an object about 75 or 100 feet ahead with the lights that were on his automobile. The accident occurred almost directly under one of the street lights. The defendant contended that by reason of the wetness of the street the reflections of light from the street interfered with his vision and that he was unable to see the plaintiff until too late to avoid a collision. On the other hand, the plaintiff testified that the reflections from the street did not cause a glare and did not interfere with vision ahead. Defendant in his testimony said:

"I was going along, leaning out beyond my windshield to get a vision of the road, and he suddenly loomed up in the way of the car and I struck him."

Our attention has not been directed to any evidence showing the condition of the windshield except such condition as might be inferred from the preceding sentence as quoted. We are satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to justify the court's finding that by reason of negligence on the part of the defendant in driving and operating his automobile the plaintiff was struck and injured thereby. From the facts shown, and upon which that finding is based, the inference was fairly warranted that the defendant's failure to see the plaintiff in time to avoid striking him must have resulted from careless failure to use his opportunities for observation.

[2] The evidence was not sufficient to compel the court to find that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, resulting either from the fact that he was walking on the street or from the fact that he did not look backward to guard against objects approaching him from the rear. "It still remains the law that foot passengers have the right to use and traverse the highway at all its points, being chargeable only for the exercise of a due amount of care, which due amount of care, in its quantum, is governed by the circumstances attending the use which the pedestrian actually makes." Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 482, 143 Pac. 743, 747. The same rule was affirmed by this court in Blackwell v. Renwick, 21 Cal. App. 131, 131 Pac. 94. In Blackwell v. Renwick it was further held that while the plaintiff was walking along in the roadway of a street it was not his duty to turn constantly and repeatedly to observe the approach of possible vehicles from the rear, "where the drivers of such vehicles could plainly observe them in time to give warning or turn out and avoid a collision." The reason thus stated points to the distinction between the situation where a person is traveling along a highway in the line of direction of the highway, and the situation which exists where a pedestrian is about to cross a street and thereby suddenly places himself in the path of danger.

[3] No sufficient reason appears which would warrant this court in holding that the amount of damages awarded is unreasonably large. There is evidence to the effect that the plaintiff's left leg was broken, one foot sprained, some of his ribs torn loose, his hip seriously injured, and the muscles of his back and shoulder injured. The trial of the action took place one year after the date of the accident. One of the broken bones had not yet healed, and, according to medical testimony, there would be a permanent disability in plaintiff's ankle, affecting his ability to walk easily. After the accident, plaintiff was confined to his bed for four weeks and suffered a great deal of pain and loss of sleep.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANDERSEN v. CHARLES et al. (Civ. 3502.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 16, 1921.)

1. Pleading ⟸8(4)—Specific performance ⟸114(2)—Complaint held insufficient for failure to allege facts showing that a consideration received by defendants was adequate.

Civ. Code, § 3391, subds. 1, 2, make necessary in a complaint for specific performance the allegation of facts showing that the agreement was as to defendants just and reasonable, and that the consideration received by them for the agreement was adequate, and the allegation in terms that the agreement is just and reasonable as to defendants, and that he received adequate consideration is insufficient as stating a mere conclusion; and, although the complaint alleges the value of the land where it does not allege the period over which the mortgage notes to be delivered to the defendants were to run or how many notes there were or how they were payable or what was their value, it is insufficient.

2. Specific performance ⟸49(2)—Adequacy of consideration relates to time of formation of contract.

In an action for specific performance of a contract to sell land, where plaintiff was to give a mortgage securing notes for the price, the fact that plaintiffs have since made valuable improvements on the land, increasing its value as security, cannot be considered, since the question of adequacy of consideration relates to the time of the formation of the contract.

3. Appeal and error ⟸1176(1)—On appeal from dismissal of complaint, court cannot direct judgment precluding another action.

Upon an appeal from a judgment dismissing the complaint in an action for specific performance of a land sale agreement, this court cannot at the defendant's request direct a judgment which will preclude the possible maintenance of another action by appellant upon a different complaint showing a meritorious cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex B. Goodcell, Judge.

Action by A. S. Andersen against M. S. Charles and others for a specific performance. Judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Turnbull, Heffron & Kelley, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank G. Falloon, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment for defendants in an action for specific performance, after demurrer sustained to plaintiff's amended complaint with leave to amend, but the right to amend not being exercised.

It is alleged in the amended complaint, exhibiting only so much of it as is necessary to a consideration of the points presented to us, that the contract sought to be enforced was one by which appellant agreed to buy and respondents agreed to sell certain described real property, consisting of 19 city lots in a group, at an agreed price of $12,000; that respondents made a deed conveying the property to appellant, and delivered it to a certain abstract company; that at the same time appellant delivered to the abstract company a mortgage on the land mentioned, together with promissory notes secured by it, in the sum of $12,000, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum; that respondents agreed to accept the notes and mortgage as the full purchase price of the lots; that respondents received adequate compensation for the agreement sought to be enforced and for the property agreed to be conveyed; that the agreement was fair, just, and reasonable; that the assent of respondents to it was not obtained by misrepresentation, concealments, circumvention, or unfair practice of appellant, or by any promise of appellant which has not been substantially fulfilled; that the assent of respondents was not given under the influence of mistake, misapprehension, or surprise; that the value of the property agreed to be conveyed, both at the date of the agreement and at the date of filing the amended complaint was without certain improvements placed thereon by appellant, $12,000; that the interest agreed to be conveyed was, at all times in the amended complaint mentioned, of the fair and reasonable aggregate value of $12,000; and that respondents have caused the abstract company to refuse to deliver the deed. The pleading also sets up a communication from respondents by which they notify appellant that the agreement is rescinded upon certain stated grounds. It is alleged that appellant has at all times been ready, able, and willing to perform, has performed, and offers to perform, all of the conditions of the agreement on his part to be performed.

[1] Respondents claim that the amended complaint is insufficient because no facts are alleged going to show that the agreement was, as to them, just and reasonable, and that the consideration received by them for the agreement was adequate. Such a statement of facts is of course necessary in every complaint for specific performance (Civ. Code, § 3391, subds. 1, 2; Joyce v. Tomasini, 168 Cal. 234, 142 Pac. 67), and the allegation, in terms, that an agreement is just and reasonable as to the defendant, and that he has received an adequate consideration for it, states merely a conclusion. Joyce v. Tomasini, supra. The pleading now before us satisfies one of the requirements of the authorities, for it alleges the value of the land agreed to be conveyed. Lynn v. Knob Hill Imp. Co., 177 Cal. 56, 169 Pac. 1009. Not only, however, does it not allege the period over which the notes were to run, nor how many notes were given, nor whether they were payable in installments, great or small, but there is no showing as to the ability of appellant to pay the notes, nor any allegation of any fact negativing the possibility that the instruments are so much waste paper. These notes, secured by a mortgage upon the very land agreed to be conveyed, were the only consideration for the transfer, and, short of a showing of some value behind the paper, respondents' agreement to convey was made solely upon their faith in the value of the land itself. Surely, under such a state of affairs, no adequate consideration was received by respondents, and the agreement was, as to them, unjust and unreasonable. Cummings v. Roeth, 10 Cal. App. 144, 101 Pac. 434; Klein v. Markarian, 175 Cal. 37, 165 Pac. 3.

[2] We have not overlooked the fact that appellant, while in possession, placed certain valuable improvements upon the land. That circumstance cannot be considered in this action (Windsor v. Miner, 124 Cal. 492, 57 Pac. 386), for the reason that "the point of time to which the question of adequacy [of consideration] must relate is the time of the formation of the contract" (Morrill v. Everson, 77 Cal. 114, 19 Pac. 190). Nothing is availed appellant by reason of the fact that equities arise in his favor because of his expenditures upon the improvements, as "inadequacy of consideration is, under the law of California, an independent and distinct ground for denying specific performance." Haddock v. Knapp, 171 Cal. 59, 151 Pac. 1140.

[3] The respondents ask us, in the event that we sustain them in their contention that the amended complaint is insufficient, to modify the judgment in such manner as to show a judgment in their favor on the merits, the judgment actually entered being for a dismissal; but we cannot direct a judgment in the cause which will preclude the possible maintenance of another action by appellant upon a different complaint, showing a meritorious cause of action. Robinson v. Howard, 5 Cal. 428; City of Los Angeles v. Mellus, 59 Cal. 444; Flood v. Templeton, 152 Cal. 148, 92 Pac. 78, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 579.

The judgment is affirmed.

SOLOMON v. REDONA et al. (Civ. 3164.)

1. Death ⟹2(2)—Presumption from absence.

The presumption recognized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 26, that one not heard from in seven years is dead, does not arise until the expiration of the seven years unless there are circumstances in evidence to quicken the time; and the party claiming that the death occurred before a particular time within the seven years has the burden of proving the precise time of death.

2. Descent and distribution ⟹71(4) — Presumption owner of interest presumed dead left heirs.

In an action for partition of real estate, wherein no conveyance was produced from the owner of an interest who had not been heard from for more than seven years, plaintiff failed to show title to such interest; the law presuming that, if such owner were dead, she left heirs.

3. Partition ⟹48—All cotenants not plaintiffs must be made parties defendant.

In a suit for partition, it is indispensable that all cotenants not united in the complaint be made parties defendant.

4. Partition ⟹50—Duty of court to require presence of co-owner not named as party.

In equity and under Code Civ. Proc. § 389, providing that, when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must order them brought in, it was the imperative duty of the court, even on its own motion, in a suit for partition, to require the presence of the owner of an interest not named as a party; the statute being mandatory.

5. Appeal and error ⟹187(3)—Judgment reversed for nonjoinder of co-owner, though not called to attention of trial court.

In a suit for partition, if a co-owner is not made a party plaintiff or defendant and a nonjoinder appears by the record, the appellate court will reverse the judgment whether the attention of the trial court was called to the defect or not.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by Bernado J. Solomon, administrator of the estate of Helen R. Solomon, deceased, against Carlos Redona and another for partition of real property. From an interlocutory decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant Carlos Redona appeals. Reversed.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry E. Carter, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Helen R. Solomon, now deceased, brought this action for a petition of real property alleged to be owned by herself and two of the defendants as tenants in common. From an interlocutory decree in favor of plaintiff the defendant Carlos Redona appeals. Helen R. Solomon having died after the appeal was perfected, the administrator of her estate was duly substituted as plaintiff in her stead. Notwithstanding the substitution, we shall, for convenience, refer to Helen R. Solomon as the plaintiff and respondent, just as though she were still alive and prosecuting the appeal in her own name.

One of the points made by appellant is that the owner of an undivided one-tenth was not made a party to the action, and that therefore the decree does not determine the interests of all the various co-owners.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff is the owner of an undivided three-fifths of a lot in the city of Los Angeles; that the defendant and appellant Carlos Redona is the owner of an undivided one-fifth, and that Jose S. Redona, another defendant, is the owner of the remaining undivided one-fifth. Carlos Redona, answering, denied that plaintiff and Jose S. Redona own three-fifths and one-fifth, respectively, or any interest whatever, and alleged that, on the contrary, he is the sole owner of the lot. The court found the facts as alleged in the complaint, and thereupon entered the interlocutory decree from which the defendant Carlos Redona appeals.

The facts essential to an understanding of the question to be discussed are substantially these: Fermina S. de Redona, the mother of plaintiff and defendants Carlos Redona and Jose S. Redona, acquired the lot on April 13, 1859, as her sole and separate property. She died July 26, 1910. It seems that she survived her husband, and that she died intestate, leaving as her sole heirs three children who survived her and certain grandchildren, the lawful issue of two deceased daughters. Besides two children who died before reaching majority and without having been married, Fermina S. de Redona was the mother of five children, two of whom, married daughters, predeceased her. Of these five, the three who survived their mother are Helen R. Solomon, the plantiff in this action, and the two defendants Carlos Redona and Jose S. Redona. The two who departed this life before their mother's death were Sarah Redona Bryant and Virginia Redona Carpenter. Sarah Redona Bryant left one surviving child, Josefa Roberts, formerly Josefa Bryant. Virginia Redona Carpenter left surviving her two children, John and Rachel. Before the date of the trial, Rachel, who had attained her majority and had married before her grandmother's death, had not been heard of by her relatives in Los Angeles for more than seven years. When last heard of, which, according to one of plaintiff's witnesses, was "close to eight years ago," she was living in Globe, Ariz. The case was tried in July, 1916. So that Rachel Carpenter was last heard of by her relatives in Los Angeles some time in the second half of 1908, or thereabouts. Her grandmother, it will be recalled, died July 26, 1910.

A deed to plaintiff from Josefa Roberts and John Carpenter was introduced in evidence. By this deed plaintiff acquired, in addition to the undivided one-fifth that she inherited from her mother, Fermina S. de Redona, the one-fifth that Josefa Roberts succeeded to as the sole surviving child of Sarah Redona Bryant, and the undivided one-tenth that John Carpenter succeeded to as one of the two children of Virginia Redona Carpenter. The remaining one-tenth was succeeded to by Rachel Carpenter if she survived her grandmother. Where that one-tenth is vested depends upon facts as to which the record is silent.

[1] There is no direct evidence of the death of Rachel Carpenter. Nor does the record disclose any fact from which her death may be inferred as an inference of fact. Except the presumption of law recognized by subdivision 26 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure—the presumption that a person not heard from in seven years is dead—there is nothing to sustain respondent's contention that Rachel Carpenter has departed this life. It is uniformly held that the presumption of death that the law deduces from the fact that a person has not been heard from in seven years does not arise until the expiration of the seven years, "unless," as was said in Burr v. Sim, 4 Whart. (Pa.) 150, 33 Am. Dec. 50, "there are circumstances in evidence to quicken the time." Here there was no evidence that Rachel Carpenter was subject to any special peril, such as plague, battle, earthquake, shipwreck, dangerous disease, or other circumstance that might "quicken the time" designated by the Code. Therefore, assuming, without deciding, that under the facts of this case there is any presumption that Rachel Carpenter is dead, still that presumption could not arise until some time in the year 1915, or about five years after the death of her grandmother, Fermina S. de Redona.

There are one or two decisions of the Supreme Court of this state that lend color to the view that the rule in this jurisdiction is that, in the absence of any evidence tending to fix the time of death during the seven years' absence, the person unheard of is presumed to be alive until the expiration of the seven years. Ashbury v. Sanders, 8 Cal. 62, 68 Am. Dec. 300; Western Grain, etc., Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 135, 138, 159 Pac. 423. In some of the other jurisdictions the rule is that, while a presumption of death arises from the unexplained absence of a person unheard of for seven years, the presumption extends only to the fact of death at the end of the period, and does not include the date of death, leaving the precise time of death, whether at the end or at any other particular time within the period, to be determined as a question of fact, the burden of showing the time of death being upon the party who claims that it occurred on or before any particular date within the seven-year period. Ann. Cas. 1917A, p. 82 et seq., note to McLaughlin v. Sovereign Camp.

"Where a party has been absent seven years, without having been heard of, the only presumption arising is that he is then dead—there is none as to the time of the death. If it become important to any one to establish the precise time of such person's death, he must do so by evidence of some sort, to be laid before the jury, besides the mere lapse of seven years since being last heard from." Spencer v. Roper, 35 N. C. 333.

Here, to maintain plaintiff's allegation that she is seized of an undivided three-fifths of the lot, the burden is on her to prove that Rachel Carpenter died before July 26, 1910, the date of her grandmother's death, assuming, for the purpose of this decision only, that if Rachel Carpenter did predecease her grandmother, her brother John Carpenter, plaintiff's grantor, became vested with the undivided one-tenth that otherwise would have descended to Rachel. But it was some time in 1908, at Globe, Ariz., or about two years before the grandmother died, that Rachel was last heard of. As there is no circumstance tending to show that she died prior to July 26, 1910, it follows that the result must be the same whether we adopt the rule that the person "unheard of" is presumed to be alive up to the end of seven years, or the rule that there is no presumption as to when the death occurred during the seven years' absence, but that the burden is upon the party claiming that it occurred on or before a particular time within the seven years to prove the precise time of death; for plaintiff, upon whom that burden rested, made no attempt to assume it by showing at what precise time, during the period of seven years' absence, Rachel Carpenter died.

If Rachel Carpenter and her brother, John, were both alive at the date of their grandmother's death, then, as the sole surviving children of Virginia Redona Carpenter, who was one of the five children of Fermina S. de Redona, each, Rachel and John, succeeded to an undivided one-tenth.

"If the decedent leaves no surviving husband or wife, but leaves issue, the whole estate goes to such issue; and if such issue consists of more than one child living, or one child living and the lawful issue of one or more deceased children, then the estate goes in equal shares to the children living, or to the child living and the issue of the deceased child or children by right of representation." Subdivision 1, § 1386, Civ. Code.

[2] Plaintiff has produced no conveyance from Rachel Carpenter. The deed to plaintiff from Rachel's brother, John, did not convey the undivided one-tenth that vested in Rachel on her grandmother's death. For even if, by reason of the disputable presumption declared by subdivision 26 of section 1963, it must be presumed that Rachel Carpenter died some time before the action was commenced, nevertheless there is no proof that her brother, John, is her sole heir. It was not shown that there was ever any administration of Rachel Carpenter's estate. In fact, no attempt has been made to show where the undivided one-tenth vested on the death of Rachel.

For these reasons we conclude that plaintiff has failed to show title to the undivided one-tenth that presumably vested in Rachel Carpenter on her grandmother's death. It can only be regarded as a title vested in some co-owner who has not been made a party to the action. Indeed, there is some evidence from which it may be inferred that Rachel Carpenter's father survived her and that he was alive at the time of the trial. A witness testified that the father telegraphed to Arizona to inquire of his daughter's whereabouts. We infer, from the few facts disclosed by the record, that Rachel Carpenter's husband—she married in 1900 a man of the name of Emmett—had obtained a divorce from her. We likewise infer from certain facts presented by the record that Rachel had no children. It is possible, therefore, that her father, who was not a party to the action, is her sole heir, and that he is vested with the undivided one-tenth. Subdivision 2, § 1386, Civ. Code. Though there may be no presumption that Rachel Carpenter, if dead, left any issue, the law does presume, if she be dead, that she left an heir or heirs capable of succeeding to her estate. Modern Woodmen v. Ghromley, 41 Okl. 532, 139 Pac. 306, L. R. A. 1915B, 728, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1063. However this may be, it is quite clear that the owner of the undivided one-tenth, whoever he or she may be, is not a party to this action.

[3] In a suit for partition it is indispensable that all cotenants who have not united in the complaint be made parties defendant. De Uprey v. De Uprey, 27 Cal. 330, 87 Am. Dec. 81; Gates v. Salmon, 35 Cal. 576, 593, 95 Am. Dec. 139; Id., 46 Cal. 361, 373, 374; Sutter v. San Francisco, 36 Cal. 112; Hill v. Den, 54 Cal. 6; Ferris v. Montgomery L. & I. Co., 94 Ala. 557, 10 South. 607, 33 Am. St. Rep. 146, and note; Burchett v. Clark, 162 Ky. 586, 172 S. W. 1048; Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 463. If one of the co-owners is not bound by the decree in partition, the purpose of the suit fails of accomplishment, for no one will then become a tenant in severalty. Appellant, whom plaintiff admits owns an undivided one-fifth, is entitled to have, in this proceeding, a title not subject to the possibility of the entire partition being opened up by parties not before the court.

[4] It is the general rule in equity, continued in force by our Code of Civil Procedure, that all who are interested in the subject-matter of a litigation should be made parties thereto, in order that complete justice may be done, and that there may be a final determination of the rights of all parties interested in the subject-matter of the controversy, It is provided by section 389 of the Code of Civil Procedure that—

"When a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must then order them to be brought in."

This provision of the statute is mandatory. When it appeared to the court, as, from the evidence, it necessarily must, that it was essential to a full and complete determination of the controversy before it that the owner of the undivided one-tenth should be made a party, it was the imperative judicial duty of the court to order that party brought in. It was not a matter of discretion, but of duty for the court, even upon its own motion, to require the presence of such co-owner. O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 442, 16 Pac. 236. See, also, Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 1, 84 Pac. 145, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275.

[5] In a suit for partition, if a co-owner is not made a party plaintiff or defendant, and the nonjoinder appears by the record so that an appellate court may take cognizance of it, it will reverse the judgment, whether the attention of the trial court was called to the defect or not. 30 Cyc. 201, 202; Russell v. Bell, 160 Ala. 480, 49 South. 314.

Because the ownership of the undivided one-tenth is not represented, the decree must be reversed.

Appellant has presented several other interesting questions—questions that necessarily must arise on a retrial of the action—but we do not think it proper to pass upon them in the absence of the owner of the undivided one-tenth that, on the record now before us, presumably vested in Rachel Carpenter upon her grandmother's death.

Judgment reversed.

CALIFORNIA PRODUCTS, INC., v. MITCHELL et al. (Civ. 3254.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 19, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 16, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⊂=278—Landlord who entered premises in possession of tenant by removing lock from door guilty of "forcible entry."

Landlords who entered premises in possession of delinquent tenant by removing a lock from the door, and who removed the tenant's property therefrom and substituted own property in place thereof, and who thereafter remained in possession and excluded tenant therefrom, held guilty of forcible entry under Code Civ. Proc. § 1159, making every person who breaks open doors and windows or other parts of a house guilty of forcible entry.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Forcible Entry.]

2. Forcible entry and detainer ⊂=8, 10—Questions of title and right to possession immaterial in action for forcible entry.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1172, questions of title, of right to possession and of the defendant's good or bad faith in holding possession, are immaterial, since under the statute all entries on the actual possession of another are unlawful.

3. Landlord and tenant ⊂=278—Lease held not to give landlord right to make forcible entry.

Lease entitling lessor, on nonpayment of rent, "without previous notice or demand to re-enter the demised premises and the same peaceably to hold and enjoy thenceforth as if this lease had not been made," did not give the lessor the right to make a forcible entry by removing lock from door and removing lessee's personal property from premises and substituting their own therefor, and thereafter retaining possession excluding the lessee therefrom.

4. Landlord and tenant ⊂=179—Entire premises properly awarded to lessee of a part in forcible entry proceeding, where he had acquired other leases.

In lessee's action against lessor for forcible entry, the court did not err in ordering restoration of the entire premises to the lessor, where other portions of the premises had been leased to other parties, and where such other leases had been assigned to plaintiff.

5. Appeal and error ⊂=1079—Points conclusively answered in respondent's brief, and not pressed in appellant's reply brief, waived.

Points conclusively answered in respondent's brief, not pressed in appellant's reply brief, will be considered as having been waived.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by the California Products, Incorporated, against Anna Mitchell and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Glen M. Ely and Charles W. Hackler, both of Los Angeles, and Allen G. Mitchell, of Pomona, for appellants.

Kemp & Clewett, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action under a complaint in two counts, one based upon a forcible entry, the other upon a forcible detainer. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal.

The evidence shows, without dispute, that at a time when the agents of respondent were away from the premises in question, the appellants removed a certain lock from the door by means of which access was had to the place and to which lock respondent had the key. Appellants then effected an entrance to the premises and substituted a heavy padlock in place of the lock. Thereupon certain personal property of respondent was removed from the place, property of one of appellants was placed therein, and thereafter that appellant remained in possession of the premises, excluding respondent therefrom. At the time when appellants effected their entrance into the property, respondent was five months in arrears in the payment of its rent. Respondent was in possession, before the entry of appellants, under a lease from some of them, the instrument containing a provision that in case the rent reserved by it were at any time unpaid it should be lawful for the lessors, "without previous notice or demand, to re-enter the demised premises and the same peaceably to hold and enjoy thenceforth as if this lease had not been made."

The appellants contend that the evidence does not support several findings of the trial court, the point made being dependent upon the settlement of two questions of law. It is insisted by appellants: First, that the acts committed by them did not amount to a forcible entry; second, that they were permitted to retake possession of the premises, even in the manner in which they did, under the provision of the lease which we have quoted.

[1] The first question is not difficult of solution. The Code provides (Code Civ. Proc. § 1159) that every person is guilty of a forcible entry who breaks open doors, windows, or other parts of a house, and it has been held (Winchester v. Becker, 4 Cal. App. 382, 88 Pac. 296) that one who enters the house of another by the use of a false key, thus unlocking the door in the absence of the occupant, is within the language of the section. The court said, in deciding the question:

"The meaning of the provision is that any opening of a closed door or window involving the use of force is to be regarded as 'breaking open' the door or window or house."

The acts of the appellants in the present action clearly amounted to a forcibly entry.

[2, 3] Coming now to the second question, did the terms of the lease confer upon appellants the right to take possession of the property by means of a forcible entry, at the same time extending to them immunity from successful suit under the forcible entry statute? In such an action it is necessary for the plaintiff to show, only, in addition to the forcible entry, that at the time of the entry he was peaceably in the actual possession of the property entered. Code Civ. Proc. § 1172. Therefore questions of title cannot arise in such actions, nor can even questions as to the right of possession. Under the older state of the law the rule was different, but since the adoption of the Code "all entries on the actual possession of another are unlawful, and the question of good or bad faith on the part of defendant no longer affects the right of recovery in this form of action." Kerr v. O'Keefe, 138 Cal. 415, 71 Pac. 447; White v. Pfieffer, 165 Cal. 740, 134 Pac. 321. We see nothing in the lease which gave appellants leave to enter the demised premises in defiance of the provisions of the salutary statutes against forcible entries. The right was certainly not conferred through any principle of waiver. Considering the nature of the provisions of the statutes on the subject and the decisions construing them, some of which have been cited above, a lease must contain most direct and positive language in order to amount to a consent by a tenant that his possession may be invaded by a forcible entry. Such a consent would place him at the mercy of his landlord. In a given case a landlord might claim rent to be unpaid and the tenant dispute the claim. Such a question might easily arise. If it did arise, a landlord armed with a lease conferring the right to forcibly enter, upon nonpayment of rent, need but await the temporary absence of the tenant, then take possession by whatever means, thus settling the disputed question for himself, or placing the burden of its settlement upon the tenant. Not only so, but under the contention of appellants he might make entry in the face of the tenant, even to the breaking down of doors, so long as he committed no breach of the peace as to others. It would require the most positive language in a lease to allow such practices, and we find no such language in the instrument before us. Nor do we decide that such powers may be placed in the hands of a landlord by the terms of a lease. There are most decided considerations of public policy upon such a question. Forcible entries, made in the best of faith, may easily lead to brawls, affrays, and breaches of the peace.

Appellants were guilty of a forcible entry, the terms of the lease are no defense, and the findings inveighed against are supported by the evidence.

[4] The next question made by appellants is that the trial court erred in ordering restitution of the entire premises to respondent. This point is made in view of the fact that, at the time the lease was made to respondent, two certain other parties had leases to parts of the property; but the contention of appellants is completely answered by the fact that these two leases were assigned to respondent, and that, at the time of the forcible entry complained of, it was in possession of the whole premises. Respondent was clearly entitled to a restitution of the place in its entirety.

[5] Two other points are presented by appellants, but we do not deem them worthy of extended notice. They are conclusively answered in respondent's brief, and they are not pressed in appellants' reply brief. Under such conditions we may well consider them as waived.

The judgment is affirmed.

FRANKLIN v. IRVINE. (Civ. 3487.)

1. Malicious prosecution ⊂=72(2)—Instruction on probable cause erroneously refused.

In an action for malicious prosecution, an instruction that if the plaintiff had done acts such as to lead a reasonable man to believe that he would be in danger in resisting, and defendant, having reason to believe he was the owner of the property taken by plaintiff, fairly presented the facts to the district attorney, and acted upon his advice, defendant had probable cause for filing his complaint of robbery and larceny, and was not liable whether or not malice was proved, correctly stated the law, and should have been given; there being evidence to prove all the conditions set forth.

2. Malicious prosecution ⊂=72(2)—Instruction held incorrect in leaving question of probable cause to jury.

In an action for malicious prosecution, it is not sufficient to give to the jury a definition of probable cause and instruct them to find whether or not the facts are within the definition, but the court should instruct them that if certain facts are established, there was or was not probable cause; the question of probable cause being for the court.

3. Malicious prosecution ⊂=72(2)—Error in refusing defendant's instruction on probable cause not cured by refusal of plaintiff's request.

Error in refusing a correct instruction on facts constituting probable cause, requested by defendant, in an action for malicious prosecution, was not cured by a refusal to give another instruction on such facts requested by plaintiff.

4. Malicious prosecution ⟸72(2)—Instruction on probable cause erroneous.

In an action for malicious prosecution, an instruction that, unless plaintiff "intended to take from defendant meat belonging to defendant," there was no probable cause for the prosecution of plaintiff, was erroneous.

5. Malicious prosecution ⟸19—Innocence of accused insufficient to sustain action.

In an action for malicious prosecution, it was error to refuse an instruction that to justify an arrest on a criminal charge it is not necessary that the crime shall have been committed, plaintiff's innocence of the offense charged not being sufficient to entitle him to recover damages, if the facts were such as to induce in the mind of a reasonable man the honest belief that a crime was committed.

6. Malicious prosecution ⟸72(2)—Erroneous instruction on probable cause not neutralized by instruction on advice of counsel.

In an action for malicious prosecution, an erroneous instruction that unless plaintiff intended to rob defendant there was no probable cause for plaintiff's arrest and prosecution was not neutralized by an instruction that in seeking the advice of the district attorney defendant was required only to disclose all the facts which he had reasonable ground to believe existed, and not to investigate possible defenses, and that if he made a full, fair, and complete disclosure of all the material facts known to him, and acted on the advice of the district attorney in filing his complaint, it was a complete defense.

7. Malicious prosecution ⟸72(2)—Instruction omitting element of want of probable cause erroneous.

In an action for malicious prosecution, an instruction that if complaints issued, plaintiff was arrested, placed under bond, and the action dismissed, there was a sufficient prosecution, if coupled with malice, to constitute malicious prosecution, was erroneous, as omitting want of probable cause.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action for malicious prosecution by Cecil Franklin against Ben D. Irvine. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. J. Ford, of Los Angeles, and Frank Birkhauser, of El Centro, for appellant.

Joseph F. Seymour, Jr., Wilbur W. Randall, and Walter B. Kibbey, all of El Centro, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover damages on account of malicious prosecution of two criminal charges against the plaintiff. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The assignments of error are directed to certain instructions given by the court to the jury and to the refusal of other instructions requested by the defendant. Without passing on all of the points presented in support of the appeal, it will be sufficient to select for discussion those hereinafter mentioned.

[1] Appellant requested that the jury be instructed as follows:

"If from the evidence in this case you believe that prior to the 28th day of October, 1918, the plaintiff, Cecil Franklin, had done acts or had so conducted himself as to lead a reasonable man to believe that he would be in danger in resisting the acts of said Cecil Franklin under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence to have existed on the 28th day of October, 1918, and if you further believe from the evidence that the defendant on such date had reason to believe, and did believe, that he was the owner of certain property in the possession of him, the said defendant, and that said property was taken away from said defendant by the said plaintiff, and that the said defendant was then and there in fear of said plaintiff, which fear prevented him from resisting the acts of said plaintiff, and if you further believe that said defendant fairly presented the foregoing facts to the district attorney of Imperial county, and acted upon the advice of such district attorney in filing the criminal complaint of robbery set forth in count 1 of this complaint, or in filing the complaint of larceny set forth in count 2 of this complaint, then I instruct you as a matter of law that the defendant had under such circumstances probable cause for the filing of such complaint or complaints, as the case may be, and your verdict must be for the defendant, whether there be proof of malice or not."

[2] Evidence had been presented tending to prove all of the conditions set forth in the proposed instruction, and since the instruction correctly states the law it should have been given. In an action of this kind it is not sufficient for the court to give to the jury a definition of probable cause and instruct them to find for or against the defendant according as they may determine that the facts are within or without that definition.

"Such an instruction is only to leave to them in another form the function of determining whether there was probable cause. The court cannot divest itself of its duty to determine this question, however complicated or numerous may be the facts. It must instruct the jury upon this subject in the concrete, and not in the abstract, and must not leave to that body the office of determining the question, but must itself determine it, and direct the jury to find its verdict in accordance with such determination. The court should group in its instructions the facts which the evidence tends to prove, and then instruct the jury that if they find such facts to be established, there was or was not probable cause, as the case may be, and that their verdict must be accordingly." Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 228, 28 Pac. 937, 938, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174; Runo v. Williams, 162 Cal. 444, 454, 122 Pac. 1082.

[3] The error of the court in refusing this requested instruction is not cured by the fact that the court refused to give another instruction on facts constituting probable cause as requested by the plaintiff. Respondent insists that the subject-matter of the instruction requested by appellant was included in other instructions given by the court. We have examined these other instructions as set out in respondent's brief. They do not supply any sufficient substitute for the rejected instruction.

[4] The court instructed the jury as follows:

"I instruct that one of the elements of both of the crimes charged against the plaintiff is intent, unless you believe from the evidence that plaintiff intended to take from defendant meat belonging to defendant, or to which he was entitled to possession, and the defendant honestly believed that plaintiff intended to deprive defendant of the use of the same, there was no probable cause for the arrest and prosecution of plaintiff."

[5, 6] The contention of appellant must be sustained, that this instruction in effect informed the jury that, in addition to defendant's honest belief that plaintiff intended to deprive defendant of his property, the plaintiff must actually "have intended to take from defendant meat belonging to defendant," and that otherwise there was no probable cause for the arrest and prosecution of the plaintiff. The fact that a plaintiff who seeks to recover damages for malicious prosecution of a criminal charge against him was not guilty of the offense charged is not alone sufficient to entitle him to recover damages. If the facts within the knowledge of the defendant were of such a character as to induce in the mind of a reasonable man the honest belief that a crime was committed, he is justified in seeking to have such crime punished, even though the facts within his knowledge did not in point of law constitute a crime. Dunlap v. New Zealand, etc., Co., 109 Cal. 365, 370, 42 Pac. 29. In the case at bar, in addition to giving the instruction above noted, the court refused to give other instructions requested by appellant, correctly stating the rule that, to justify an arrest on a criminal charge, it is not necessary that in fact the crime shall have been committed. The error complained of in the instruction given may have been mitigated, but we are not satisfied that its effect upon the minds of the jurors would necessarily be neutralized, by the following instruction:

"In seeking the advice of the district attorney, you are instructed that the defendant is required only to disclose all the facts which are within his knowledge, or which he has reasonable grounds to believe do exist. He is not required to investigate possible defenses which might thereafter be made by the proposed defendant in a criminal case. If he does make a full, fair, and complete disclosure of all the material facts known to him, and acts upon the advice of the district attorney in filing such criminal complaint, it is a complete defense, and your verdict must be for the defendant."

"In order to constitute malicious prosecution it is not essential that there should have been a trial. If you find from the evidence that complaints issued, plaintiff was arrested, placed under bond, and thereafter the action was dismissed, there was sufficient prosecution which, coupled with malice, constituted malicious prosecution."

The defect in this instruction is that it informed the jury that upon proof of the facts stated, coupled with malice, these facts alone were sufficient to constitute malicious prosecution. The necessary element of want of probable cause was omitted. It is true, however, that the court elsewhere instructed the jury that both want of probable cause and malice must exist before the plaintiff would be entitled to a verdict in his favor. From our examination of the instructions, together with the evidence, it seems reasonably probable that the errors which we have found in the instructions were seriously prejudicial to appellant. It is not at all certain that under correct instructions the same verdict would have been rendered.

The judgment is reversed.

TROPLOWITZ v. SEIGLER. (Civ. 3786.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 15, 1921.)

Assault and battery ⊂=43(6)—Circumstances of provocation not to be considered in estimating actual damages.

Where no element of punitive damages was presented to the jury in an action for damages for assault and battery, it was error to instruct the jury that they might consider circumstances of provocation in estimating the amount of actual damages to which the plaintiff would otherwise be entitled.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by E. Troplowitz against Harry Seigler. From a judgment for nominal damages, the plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

James P. Sweeney and Frank J. Fontes, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph H. Mayer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment based upon a verdict in his favor for damages in the sum of $1 in an action for damages for an alleged assault and battery.

The evidence in the case showed that the parties to the affray met in Lick alley, between Post and Sutter streets, in the city of San Francisco, and after a few words, came to blows. The evidence is in conflict as to which of the parties struck the first blow, but the evidence also shows without substantial conflict that the defendant struck the plaintiff in the face, knocking out three of his natural teeth which had theretofore supported other artificial teeth, necessitating considerable dental work and requiring him thereafter to wear a plate; and that he also suffered the consequential physical pain and mental anguish resulting from his compulsion to the wearing of a set of false teeth for the rest of his natural life.

Upon the trial of the case the plaintiff requested the following instruction:

"The court further instructs the jury that in this case if it believes from the evidence that the defendant committed the assault alleged in plaintiff's complaint, the jury cannot consider any alleged provocation in reduction of the actual damages accruing to plaintiff from his pain, physical injuries, loss of time and moneys expended, or any other element of actual damages, but only in reduction of or set-off against the exemplary damages."

This instruction the court refused to give, and also refused to give in terms any and all of the instructions asked by the plaintiff, but instead thereof gave the following brief oral instructions as its only instructions to the jury in the case:

"The Court: There is no law to give you; it is simply a question of whether or not this assault was committed. If you should find that it was committed with provocation on the part of the plaintiff, then you may consider that matter, in mitigation of damages. On the other hand, if you consider it was not justified by the circumstances and situation surrounding, and should find that this party sustained the injuries which he claims he sustained, and that it was an unprovoked assault, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover such damages as, under all the circumstances of the case, you should deem just. If you should conclude to award damages, you are entitled to consider the nature of the injury and the extent of it, and whether there was any loss of time or bodily pain resulting therefrom.

"If, upon the other hand, as I have said before, you consider that there were circumstances to mitigate the assault, then you may take such circumstances into consideration in fixing the amount of damages, if any, that you may conclude to award. I think that is all that is necessary. I think the jury fully understand the issue."

The plaintiff, upon this appeal, contends that the verdict of the jury was grossly inadequate to what the undisputed proof showed to be his actual damages from defendant's assault and battery. He also contends that the trial court erred in refusing to give his requested instruction above set forth, and also erred in giving its own instructions touching the right of the jury to consider circumstances of provocation in mitigation of any actual damages which they might find plaintiff sustained. We deem it only necessary to consider the latter point, since if the jury were rightly instructed by the court that they might consider matters of provocation in mitigation of the actual damage sustained by the plaintiff, they doubtless could obey that instruction to the extent of awarding the plaintiff a merely nominal sum in damages for injuries which were, according to the undisputed evidence, much in excess of such sum. We are of the opinion that the trial court was in error in refusing to give the plaintiff's requested instruction, and was also in error in giving its own instruction of opposite tenor and effect. The Supreme Court has recently set this subject at rest in the case of Benjamin v. Walton, 181 Cal. 115, 183 Pac. 529, wherein it said:

"It is sufficient in this regard to say that, the question of punitive damages having been expressly withdrawn from the jury, no circumstances of provocation, whether accruing before or at the time of the assault, could in any way be considered in mitigation of the actual damages suffered by plaintiff by reason of the assault."

In the case at bar, as in that case, no element of punitive damages was presented to the jury, and it follows that they were erroneously instructed that they might consider circumstances of provocation in estimating the amount of actual damages to which the plaintiff would otherwise be entitled. We think this error was prejudicial, and was the direct cause of the verdict for only nominal damages which the plaintiff was awarded by the jury.

The judgment is reversed.

PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. TAYLOR et al. (Civ. 1815.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 19, 1921.)

1. Continuance ⟸12—Held improperly denied where chief defendant ill in another state.

In condemnation proceedings, continuance because of absence and illness in another state of the only defendant familiar with the facts of the defense and the whereabouts of witnesses held improperly denied.

2. Continuance ⟸46(10)—Counsel's affidavit reciting contents of telegram as to party's illness held not objectionable as recital of hearsay.

Objection would not be sustained on appeal to affidavit for continuance by defendants' counsel on the ground that the recital thereon of the illness detaining the chief defendant in another state was hearsay testimony, in that it was merely the statement by his attorney of the contents of a telegram, where no such objection was made below, as, where such showing is made without objection to the form in which it appears, it is competent and should be accorded legitimate probative force.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Condemnation action by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company against Harry W. Taylor and others. From judgment awarding defendants less than claimed, they appeal. Reversed.

Charles F. Hanlon, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Thos. J. Straub and Wm. B. Bosley, both of San Francisco, and Jones & Jones, of Oroville, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was in condemnation, and judgment was in favor of plaintiff, condemning the property and awarding defendants the total sum of $51.50 for the various items of damage. It may be stated that in their answer the defendants claimed that the proposed improvement would result in their damage to the extent of $63,000. Notwithstanding this great disparity between what was awarded and what was claimed, there is abundant evidence to support the finding of the jury. However, the defendants were not present at the trial, and no showing was made on their behalf, and this suggests the only serious question in the case. That question is whether the trial court should not have granted the motion of defendants for a continuance of the trial. The motion was made on account of the absence of one of the defendants (the other defendant living outside of California), and was supported by the affidavit of his counsel, Charles F. Hanlon. From said affidavit it appears that said Taylor was in the city of Boston at the time of the trial; that he was detained there on account of a serious illness; that very important business required his attention at that place, and for that purpose he left California on or about May 14, 1917, before the case had been set for trial; that said Henry W. Taylor was the only person familiar with the facts constituting the defense, and the only person who knew the whereabouts of any of the witnesses that he desired to be called on his behalf; that it would be necessary to take witnesses upon the ground to enable them to give an intelligent estimate of the value of the property to be taken, and that the aid of Taylor was needed for this purpose; that affiant did not know what witnesses could be procured by said Taylor; that he had "no means whatever of getting said witnesses and has none now, and has consulted with no witness or witnesses, except plaintiff's officers." Other considerations are set forth in the affidavit that emphasize the importance of the presence of said defendant; in fact, its necessity for the proper trial of the case.

The situation is thus made similar to that characterizing Jaffe v. Lilienthal, 101 Cal. 175, 35 Pac. 636; Morehouse v. Morehouse, 136 Cal. 332, 68 Pac. 976; Betts Spring Co. v. Jardine M. Co., 23 Cal. App. 705, 139 Pac. 657.

In the first of these it appears that—

"On the 21st of December, 1891, this cause was set for trial for January 6, 1892. On that day plaintiff's attorney moved for a continuance upon affidavits of the plaintiff and his physician showing in substance that the plaintiff, who then and for about a year prior thereto resided in Seattle, Wash., was confined to his room by an attack of acute rheumatism, to which he was subject, and was wholly unable to move or leave his room, and in the opinion of his physician would not be able to leave his room in less than two months. The affidavit of plaintiff further stated that his presence at the trial was indispensably necessary; that he was the only person who knew the whereabouts of the witnesses necessary to be called on his behalf; that their names had not been communicated to his attorney, nor the matters to which they would testify. D. M. Delmas, Esq., attorney for plaintiff, also presented his own affidavit that plaintiff's presence was necessary; that he did not know the names of plaintiff's witnesses, nor the details of the case."

There were no counter affidavits, but the motion for a continuance of the trial was denied, and plaintiff's attorney left the courtroom. It was held that the due administration of justice required the reversal of said order.

In the Morehouse Case it was held that—

"A showing of the continued illness of the defendant of such a nature that he could neither attend the trial of an action brought against him to quiet title to real estate, nor have his deposition taken without serious injury and great risk of life, is sufficient to entitle the defendant to a continuance of the cause; and when there is nothing to contradict the showing, or to raise a suspicion as to the good faith of the application, it was error to refuse the continuance."

In Betts Spring Co. v. Jardine M. Co., supra, it appeared that the defendant was ill; that in search of health he had journeyed to Europe, whence he would return in two months; he was the only witness to prove the defense; there was no intimation that the motion was not made in good faith nor was there any showing that the plaintiff would be injured or prejudiced by the delay. The appellate court for the First district held that it was an abuse of discretion for the trial court to refuse the continuance. Among the cases cited therein is Storer v. Heitfeld, 17 Idaho, 113, 105 Pac. 55. Therein it appeared that one of the defendants was in another state for the purpose of attending the funeral of his brother and looking after his estate, and the Supreme Court of Idaho held that this reason was sufficient to excuse his failure to attend at the time set for the trial. It was declared that the defendant had the right, unless he absented himself without reason, to be present to advise and assist his counsel, as well as to testify on his own behalf, and accordingly, under the showing made, the Supreme Court concluded that the continuance should have been granted.

[1] The showing made by appellants herein seems to be as potential and persuasive as that appearing in any of said citations, and we may add that we find in the record no evidence of the want of diligence or of good faith on the part of the moving defendant. The trial court, no doubt, was impressed with the importance of an expeditious trial of the action and believed that the motion for postponement was for delay, but attributing full significance to the rule that clothes the trial court with a large discretion in matters of this kind, we are of the opinion that defendants should have an opportunity to present fully their defense to the action. We cannot be unmindful of the fact that, while the public interest is subserved by the rightful exercise of the power of eminent domain, yet the property is taken against the will of the owner, and he should be extended every legal consideration to enable him to show the extent of the damage that he may suffer.

Certain specific reasons are advanced by respondent why the action of the lower court should be upheld, to which we may briefly direct our attention.

[2] Objection is made to the affidavit that the recital therein as to the illness of Mr. Taylor was hearsay testimony; it being merely the statement by his attorney of the contents of a telegram. Manifestly it would be more satisfactory if there had been an affidavit from Mr. Taylor himself or from his physician in reference to the illness, but it is fair to say that appellants had no opportunity to obtain such evidence. Moreover, the rule is that, where such showing is made without any objection to the form in which it appears, it should be considered as though it were competent; and legitimate probative force should be accorded to it. In this connection we must remember that there was no controversy in the court below as to Taylor's illness, nor was any objection made to the form of the affidavit or to the failure to produce a physician's certificate.

This and other features involved in the controversy are covered by the following quotation from 9 Cyc. p. 96:

"The illness of a party is not ipso facto a cause for continuance of the cause; but where a party's presence at the trial is indispensable and the character of his illness is such as to render his presence at the time impossible a continuance should be granted, if it appears that he has been guilty of no negligence. * * * The fact of illness must be established by some satisfactory sworn statements, either in the shape of an affidavit, or the certificate of a physician that satisfies the court of the inability of the party to be present. From the very nature of the relief asked the decision of the question must necessarily rest almost entirely within the discretion of the trial court, and such discretion will not be interfered with unless the same has been abused to the extent of prejudicing the applicant's right to a fair trial of the cause."

It is quite plain from the facts recited in said affidavit that defendants could not have a fair trial in the absence of said Taylor, and therefore, legally speaking, the denial of the motion prejudiced their substantial rights.

Respondent's contention that said Taylor acted without due circumspection in leaving the state is, we think, without merit. It appears that, before leaving the state, Taylor had attended court at Oroville with his counsel on April 16, when a motion to set the case for trial was heard and denied, the court stating "that it would not set the case for trial until the pleadings were settled." When he left for Boston on May 14, the pleadings were still unsettled, and he had reason to believe that he would have ample time to return after the case was in condition to be tried. We need not recite all the facts, but we think it sufficiently appears that the said Taylor manifested due caution and diligence, and that he made an honest attempt to return to the state to protect his interest, but was prevented by an unavoidable illness.

As to the delay in setting the case for trial we cannot see that appellants should be charged with any remissness. From the record, indeed, we conclude that both parties proceeded with the usual expedition to frame the issues, and exercised ordinary diligence in preparing the cause for trial. In this connection it may be observed, moreover, that the various motions made by plaintiff to strike out parts of defendants' answer would indicate a purpose to proceed deliberately and to give due care and attention to the settlement of the pleadings before a trial was had. It may be mentioned also that plaintiff on the day of the trial filed an important amendment to the complaint, thus injecting a new issue into the case.

There are some verbal criticisms of said affidavit, but we think they demand no special notice. We are satisfied that, considered in its entirety, it is not vitally defective, and it constitutes sufficient support for the motion of appellants.

We have carefully examined the record and read the cases cited by both parties, but we deem it inadvisable to pursue the discussion further.

It appears to us that a just regard for the rights of the defendants demands a new trial, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

We concur: PREWETT Presiding Justice pro tem.; HART, J.

ROSE et al. v. CONLIN et al. (Civ. 3760.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 13, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 9, 1921.)

1. Mortgages ⟸497(2)—Mortgagor and successor in interest concluded by description in judgment in foreclosure.

Mortgagor and his successor in interest are concluded by a description in a foreclosure decree of the land covered by the mortgage where no appeal was ever taken.

2. Eminent domain ⟸154—Judgment obtained in action to recover compensation for taking and use of land stands in place of land.

A judgment for mortgagor in an action against a railroad to recover compensation for the taking and use of land by the railroad stands in the place of the land condemned, and the lien of a mortgage on the land is transferred to the judgment.

3. Eminent domain ⟸158—Mortgagee held entitled to have it determined she was equitably entitled to benefits of judgment obtained against railroad for land taken.

A mortgagee, who was not made a party to an action by mortgagor against railroad to recover compensation for the taking and use of land by railroad company pending proceedings to foreclose the mortgage, is entitled to commence and maintain an action against a successor of the mortgagor to have it determined that she was equitably entitled to the benefits obtained by such mortgagor against the railroad, there being a deficiency judgment in the foreclosure proceeding.

4. Mortgages ⟸586—Commissioner's deed held to relate back to date of mortgage.

A commissioner's deed under a decree of foreclosure of purchase-money mortgage related back to the date of the mortgage, and reinvested the mortgagee, who was the grantee under such deed, with all the right to and interest in the land for the purchase money for which the mortgage was given.

5. Estoppel ⟸68(2)—Mortgagor could not set up adverse possession of railroad in action by mortgagee to obtain benefits of judgment obtained by mortgagor against railroad.

Where mortgagor obtained a judgment against a railroad for compensation for the taking and use of land in an action wherein railroad contended it had acquired by long possession a permanent title or right of occupancy, he was in no position to assert the existence in the railroad company of a paramount right to the use of the land in an action by mortgagee to have it determined that she was equitably entitled to the benefits of the judgment obtained against the railroad.

6. Limitation of actions ⟸43—Statute held not to start to run until there was a res to which remedy could be applied.

The right of mortgagee to commence and maintain an action for the purpose of having it determined that she was equitably entitled to the benefits of a judgment obtained by mortgagor against a railroad for compensation for the taking and use of the land did not arise until there was a res to which the remedy could be applied in the form of a final judgment in the defendant's favor for compensation against the railroad company.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by Emma Rose and others against Henry Conlin and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles W. Cobb and Henry Conlin, both of San Francisco (E. C. Chapman, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Garret W. McEnerney, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff Emma Rose in an action wherein the plaintiffs sought to have it determined that the said Emma Rose was the equitable owner of a certain judgment for the sum of $15,560 which had been recovered by the defendant Henry Conlin in the case of Conlin v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co., 40 Cal. App. 743, 182 Pac. 71.

The facts out of which that case, and also the present case, arose may be summarized as follows: The San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company was incorporated under the laws of the state of California on August 18, 1860, for the term of 50 years, and for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad between San Francisco and San Jose. On June 6, 1862, Alvinza Hayward, who was then the owner in fee simple of a tract of land at or near the city of San Mateo, conveyed to said San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company an estate in a portion of said land which this court, in construing the deed of conveyance thereof, determined to be an estate for years therein, or, to be specific, 50 years, in the case of East San Mateo Land Co. v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co., 30 Cal. App. 223, 157 Pac. 634. This estate for years was transferred to several successive railroad corporations until it vested in the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the defendant in the two cases above referred to, and was adjudged in the case of Conlin v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co., supra, to have expired on August 18, 1910.

After the expiration of said term of years the said Southern Pacific Railroad Company continued in the possession of the tract of land affected by said former estate for years, and is still in possession of the same in the course of the maintenance and operation of its railroad system from San Francisco to San Jose and beyond. In the meantime Alvinza Hayward died, and his daughter, Emma Rose, one of the plaintiffs herein, succeeded to and became the owner of the estate of her deceased father in the lands out of which said estate for years had been carved, and of the reversionary rights in and to said lands after the termination of said estate for years. On September 8, 1908, said Emma Rose conveyed certain of the said lands which she had thus succeeded to as the daughter and heir of Alvinza Hayward, deceased, to East San Mateo Land Company, a corporation, and in such conveyance she included her reversionary interest in the lands (which may be designated as the railroad parcel) so determined by this court in the case of East San Mateo Co. v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, and is, therefore, no longer susceptible of dispute—and least of all by those who have succeeded to whatever interest the said East San Mateo Land Company acquired, and in that case asserted by virtue of said conveyance from Emma Rose to it.

On said September 8, 1908, and as a part of the same transaction by which it acquired said lands and interest from said Emma Rose the said East San Mateo Land Company executed a mortgage back to her for a considerable portion of the purchase price of said properties. Some question has been raised in this case as to whether said mortgage, in its description of said properties, embraced the reversionary interest in said railroad parcel, and, while it is true that there are certain differences in the wording of the conveyance to said corporation of this particular portion of said properties, and of the mortgage given back by it to Emma Rose, we are not only satisfied that these differences in verbiage did not suffice to show an intent in the parties to the entire transaction to exclude the reversionary interest in said railroad parcel from the effect of said mortgage, but we are further satisfied that this question is no longer open to consideration, for other reasons which will be presently made to appear.

On November 29, 1912, an action was commenced for the foreclosure of the mortgage last above referred to, the nominal plaintiff in said action being Andrew F. Burke, who purported to be acting in said matter as the assignee of Emma Rose, but who, it is conceded, was acting in the premises merely as her agent and trustee. The defendants in said foreclosure suit were the East San Mateo Land Company, the Southern Pacific Company, and other persons. The complaint in said foreclosure suit expressly averred that the said railroad parcel and the respective rights of the defendants therein were among the properties affected by said mortgage, the foreclosure of which was sought in said action, and the lis pendens in said action also expressly referred to said railroad as affected by said foreclosure suit. The said defendant East San Mateo Land Company was duly served with summons in said action, and entered its appearance therein, raising certain issues which were heard and determined in said suit. The said Southern Pacific Company was also served with summons in said action, and it also appeared and answered therein. One of the issues which the last-named defendant presented in its said answer consisted in its claim that the plaintiff therein, Emma Rose, had no interest in the said railroad parcel, basing its said claim upon the ground that paramount title had been acquired by the railroad company prior to August 20, 1908, growing out of its occupation and use of said premises for railroad purposes. With respect to this issue the trial court, upon the hearing of said foreclosure suit, expressly refused to determine it, and so declared in its finding, and provided in its decree that nothing therein contained should be deemed to be an adjudication upon the question of the paramount title of the railroad company to that particular parcel of land.

[1] The decree of foreclosure, in said action was made and entered on June 2, 1917, but was so made and entered nunc pro tunc as of December 5, 1916. No appeal was ever taken from said foreclosure decree, which included in its terms an express description of the said railroad parcel as being a portion of the premises embraced in said mortgage and affected by said decree in so far as the rights and interests of the mortgagor were concerned, and this fact supplies, in our opinion, the additional and conclusive reason why the defendant and appellant Henry Conlin, in the present action, as the successor in interest of said mortgagor, cannot be heard to contend that the mortgage of his predecessor in interest did not embrace in its description the said railroad parcel, including whatever interest therein had been acquired by it through the conveyance from Emma Rose.

[2] Subsequent to the making and entry of said foreclosure decree an order of sale was duly issued thereon, and on February 24, 1917, a foreclosure sale was had under said order, at which sale said railroad parcel was struck off to said Andrew F. Burke, acting as agent for said Emma Rose. The sum realized at said foreclosure sale being insufficient to satisfy the judgment in said action, a deficiency judgment was docketed on December 4, 1917, for the sum of $25,038.93. On December 2, 1918, a commissioner's deed was duly issued to Emma Rose, as the person then entitled thereto under said foreclosure sale, which deed embraced in its description of the properties covered by it the said railroad parcel of land. In the meantime, and while the foreclosure proceedings above referred to were going on, the East San Mateo Land Company, as the then owner of said railroad parcel of land, commenced an action to recover compensation from the Southern Pacific Company for its continued occupation and use for the purposes of its railroad system of the said railroad parcel of land after the expiration of the estate for years granted to its predecessor therein by Alvinza Hayward, as above set forth.

The complaint in said action alleged that said plaintiff therein was the successor by mesne conveyance of all the right, title, and interest of said Alvinza Hayward in said parcel of land; that the estate for years granted by said Alvinza Hayward to the predecessor of the defendant in that action had ceased and terminated on August 18, 1910, and that thereupon the estate in remainder and reversion had reverted to and become vested in the plaintiff in that action, and that the defendant therein had, immediately upon the termination of its said estate for years, therein appropriated and continued to use said parcel of land for its benefit as a railroad corporation, and for its right of way for the operation of its railroad system thereover, without having paid said plaintiff compensation for said appropriation and use. These allegations were followed with a prayer for the value of the land so taken, appropriated, and used in the sum of $77,800.

A more particular reference to the extended averments of said complaint would serve to show beyond reasonable dispute, in our judgment, that said action thus brought by said East San Mateo Land Company was one essentially and solely for the recovery of such compensation for the taking and use of said parcel of land by said railroad company as it would have been the right of said East San Mateo Land Company, as the then owner of said land, to have had awarded to it in a proceeding for the condemnation of said land, and of all necessary rights of way thereover under the law of eminent domain, had such a proceeding been initiated by said railroad corporation; and that, this being so, whatever sum of money the trial court should determine to be due and payable to the plaintiff in such an action must be held to stand in lieu of the land so taken and used by the railroad company for quasi public uses under the law of eminent domain. The following authorities so hold, and we are satisfied that their conclusion in that regard is sound, equitable dôctrine, and is susceptible as such to application to the facts of the case at bar; Sawyer v. Landers, 56 Iowa, 422, 9 N. W. 341; Platt v. Bright, 31 N. J. Eq. 81; Bright v. Platt, 32 N. J. Eq. 362; Kansas City. v. North American Trust Co., 110 Mo. App. 647, 85 S. W. 681.

[3, 4] Our attention has been called to the case of Anderson v. Citizens' Sav. & Trust Co., 197 Pac. 113, just decided by the Supreme Court, which is claimed by appellant as authority for its contention that the plaintiff herein should have asserted her claim in the compensation suit, and that, not having done so, the judgment in that suit is to be held to be final in determining who was entitled to such compensation. It is sufficient to say, however, in response to this contention, that the plaintiff herein was not made a party to the action commenced by the East San Mateo Land Company against the Southern Pacific Company to recover compensation for the lands, premises, and rights of way appropriated and being used by it, and which were covered by this plaintiff's mortgage then in course of foreclosure; nor was said plaintiff brought into said action at any time prior to the rendition of the judgment therein rendered in favor of Henry Conlin, successor in interest of the original plaintiff in that action, by virtue of transfers made by it of its rights of action after said suit was begun.

It may be said that the plaintiff herein could have injected herself into that action as intervener therein, and thus had the rights and claims which she here asserts determined therein. Had she done so, it cannot be questioned that the trial court in that action would have been bound to take cognizance of her equitable interest in said railroad parcel of land by virtue of her mortgage thereon, and have protected that interest in its judgment awarding compensation to the parties entitled thereto for the taking and use of said land by the railroad under its right of eminent domain; but the plaintiff was not bound to inject herself into that case; and, had she sought to do so at any time prior to the sale in the foreclosure suit, she would doubtless have been met with the proposition that the other properties covered by her mortgage would suffice to pay her debt, and that she must exhaust her remedies as to those before she could claim the right to any part of the compensation to be awarded to the plaintiff therein in the action instituted by him.

The course pursued by the plaintiff herein, while attendant with certain risks, would seem to be the logical and orderly course to be pursued by her. She had instituted her foreclosure suit before the East San Mateo Company, her immediate debtor, began its suit for compensation against the railroad company. She pursued that foreclosure suit to its termination in a foreclosure sale, with the result that, on November 24, 1917, she became, through her agent, the purchaser of all of the properties upon which her mortgage had been foreclosed, including the railroad parcel, for the taking of which by the Southern Pacific Company the defendant herein was still prosecuting his action for compensation. On December 14, 1917, a deficiency judgment in her favor was docketed in the sum of $25,083.93. On December 2, 1918, a commissioner's deed was executed to her conveying, among other properties, the said railroad parcel, which deed, under well-known rules of law, related back to the date of her mortgage, and reinvested her with all of the right to and interest in the said parcel of land for the purchase money of which said mortgage had been given. Dickey v. Gibson, 121 Cal. 276, 53 Pac. 704; Beronio v. Ventura County Lumber Co., 129 Cal. 232, 61 Pac. 958, 79 Am. St. Rep. 118; People's Sav. Bank v. Hodgdon, 64 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. 938. In the meantime the defendant's action for compensation for the taking and use of said parcel of land by the railroad under its right of eminent domain was still pending, and was not finally determined upon appeal so as to become a final judgment until the denial of a rehearing by the Supreme Court of the case of Conlin v. Southern Pacific Co., supra. The present action was commenced on May 19, 1919.

In thus proceeding to a foreclosure and sale under her mortgage, and to the issuance of a commissioner's deed thereunder, the plaintiff herein, Emma Rose, had reinvested herself with the ownership of this particular portion of the properties mortgaged to her, and had also procured a deficiency judgment for the sum still remaining due and payable upon said mortgage. In so doing she was apparently following to its logical conclusion the procedure intimated, if not expressly decided, in the case of Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 648, 665, 128 Pac. 9, 18, wherein the appellate court, quoting from the case of Matter of Morris Avenue, 118 App. Div. 121, 103 N. Y. Supp. 182, said:

"The question as to the right of an award between a mortgagee and the owner of the equity has arisen in several cases and the rule seems to be well established that, where a mortgage has been given upon property prior to the taking of a portion thereof by the city, if, upon a foreclosure and sale after the taking by the city, the amount realized is insufficient to meet the mortgage debt, the lien of the mortgage would extend to and embrace so much of the damages awarded as should be needed to make good the deficiency."

We are satisfied from the foregoing facts and cases that the plaintiff herein was entitled to commence and maintain this action for the purpose of having it determined that she was equitably entitled to the benefits of the judgment obtained by the defendant Henry Conlin herein against the railroad company.

[5] It may be proper at this point to refer briefly to certain further contentions urged by the appellant herein. Among these is the contention that the railroad company, by virtue of its occupation and use of the parcel of land in question for the permanent and quasi public uses and purposes of a railroad right of way, had thereby acquired, long prior to the date of the acquisition of any interest in said premises by Emma Rose, and therefore long prior to the conveyance by her to the predecessor to the defendant herein of said railroad parcel, and of its mortgage back to her, a permanent title or permanent right of occupancy of said parcel of land which was paramount and superior to her said conveyance and mortgage, and hence was not covered thereby; and that, this being so, the plaintiff herein could not have acquired any right to share in the benefits of the judgment obtained by the defendant herein against the railroad through the foreclosure of said mortgage and sale to her of said mortgaged premises. We perceive no merit in this contention. It was made by the railroad company in the action for compensation, and was therein opposed by the defendant herein; and it was therein decided that the rights of the railroad company with reference to occupation and use of the premises in question were referable to the term of years under which it had entered into possession of the same, and were altogether bounded by the words of the grant of said term. The appellant herein is therefore in no position to assert the existence in the railroad company of a paramount right to the use, occupation, and maintenance of its right of way over said railroad parcel, since its existence would have sufficed to have defeated his own right of recovery in the compensation suit.

[6] We also find no merit in the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations. The right of the plaintiff to commence and maintain the present action against said defendant arose when there was a res to which the remedy sought therein could be applied, in the form of a final judgment in the defendant's favor for compensation against the railroad company.

We do not deem the other points urged by the appellant of sufficient merit to require discussion in detail.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Mechanics' liens ⊂=277(5) — Variance between notice of lien and complaint held fatal.

In an action to enforce a mechanic's lien for plumbing done for a laundry company, where the notice of lien recited one contract and the complaint was based upon an entirely different contract, the variance was fatal in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1187.

2. Mechanics' liens ⊂=277(5) — No recovery for extra work where such work covered by specific contract recited in notice of lien.

In an action to enforce a mechanic's lien for plumbing done for a laundry company, where the notice of lien recited an agreement to pay plaintiff $600 for superintending the work, and the complaint alleged that the identical work which plaintiff was to superintend constituted extra plumbing work, for which 10 per cent. of the actual cost should be paid as compensation, there could be no recovery as for extra work.

3. Mechanics' liens ⊂=279—Claimant has burden of establishing right to recover for extra work.

To recover for extra work in a proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien, the burden of showing that the work was in fact extra work held to be upon plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by R. J. Finn against Diamond Laundry Company, to enforce a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ward Chapman and L. M. Chapman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant has appealed.

The notice of lien filed sets forth two separate and distinct contracts under and in accordance with which plaintiff, as therein stated, performed work and labor in superintending the installation of plumbing fixtures in a building which defendant, as owner, was constructing.

By the complaint each of these contracts is made the subject of a separate cause of action. In the first count thereof it is alleged that defendant, through its duly authorized agent, made a contract with plaintiff to superintend the installation of all "rough plumbing and plumbing proper in the building of the defendant * * * at all times during its construction and until its completion," which "said plumbing is and shall be known and referred to herein as the original contract work;" that the building is a laundry building, and, in addition to the plumbing and pipe fitting aforesaid (that is, "rough plumbing and plumbing proper"), has installed in it plumbing fixtures, supply and waste pipes; system of piping to and from laundry machinery for hot and cold water; for treated and untreated water; high and low pressure steam lines; gas, oil, and compressed air lines; a vacuum cleaning system, and a sprinkler system, all of which was to be put in and was actually put in and installed in said building of defendant, and used by it as and for a laundry; that defendant promised, undertook, and agreed to pay plaintiff for said work as superintendent of the installation of said plumbing proper as aforesaid only, being the original contract work in the aforesaid building, the sum of $600, $575 of which it has paid.

The contract, as stated in the notice of lien, and upon which the cause of action is based, is as follows: That defendant, as owner, was engaged in constructing a building for use as a laundry and, acting through one Joseph H. Smailes, as its duly authorized agent, employed plaintiff—

"as superintendent of plumbing, having complete and entire charge of all plumbing and pipe fitting in the building at the aforesaid site, at all times during its construction and until its completion; that said work consisted of the installation of plumbing fixtures, supply and waste pipes, very complicated and special systems of piping to and from laundry machinery for hot and cold water, treated and untreated water, high and low pressure steam lines, gas, oil, and compressed air lines, vacuum cleaning system, and sprinkler system, all in said building. That said contract of employment was entered into on or about August 23, 1916, and for which said work and labor as aforesaid the said * * * Joseph H. Smailes contracted and agreed to pay the undersigned at the time of the completion of said building the sum of six hundred dollars ($600) for original contract work as set forth above, on which said price the sum of five hundred and seventy-five dollars ($575) has been paid."

It thus appears that, after stating that he was to have charge of all the plumbing and pipe fitting, the nature and character of which is set out with great particularity and detail plaintiff avers that, for superintending the installation of all of the work set forth above (which is all of that specifically described in the notice of lien), he was to be paid $600. But this is not the contract declared upon in the complaint, which alleges the work was done under and pursuant to another and entirely different contract, to wit: One for superintending the installation of all "rough plumbing and plumbing proper" in the building. Certainly the plumbing described in the notice of lien could not be deemed rough plumbing. However, conceding such interpretation such fact could not avail plaintiff herein, for the reason that, whatever its character, he, as appears from the notice of lien, was to superintend the installation of all that so particularly described, and for the work and labor in so doing he was to receive as compensation the sum of $600.

[1] Conceding, as found by the court, that the evidence established the existence of the contract set forth in the complaint, and that plaintiff performed the work thereunder, then it follows that the notice of lien filed was untrue; and, since no claim of lien upon the contract set forth in the complaint was ever filed, there could be no lien upon which to base the action. In other words, there was a fatal variance between the complaint and the notice of lien upon which the action was founded. Reed v. Norton, 90 Cal. 590, 26 Pac. 767, 27 Pac. 426; Wagner v. Hansen, 103 Cal. 104, 37 Pac. 195. In discussing the requirements of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing for notice and claim of lien, the court in the last-cited case said:

"The purpose of the record and statement must be to inform the owner, in case of a contractor and laborers rendering service under such contract, as to the extent and nature of a lienor's claim, to facilitate investigation as to its merits. * * * In all essential particulars it [the statement] must be true."

The statement of lien filed by plaintiff was not calculated to inform defendant as to the nature of the claim and contract which he asserted in his complaint. The language used therein imported a contract made between plaintiff and defendant's agent under which the former was to receive $600 for superintending all of the plumbing specifically described in the notice of lien. See Santa Monica, etc., Co. v. Hege, 119 Cal. 377, 51 Pac. 555, to the effect that, where the proof shows the contract set forth in the notice of lien to be untrue, it is fatal to the asserted lien.

In the second count of the complaint it is alleged that defendant promised and agreed to pay plaintiff for the labor of superintending the installation of extra plumbing work the sum of 10 per cent. of the actual cost thereof, which extra work consisted of all plumbing work of every kind or description other than that which plaintiff designates as original contract work, which extra plumbing work is described in the complaint as follows:

"All plumbing fixtures; supply and waste pipes; all systems of piping to and from laundry machinery for hot and cold water; treated and untreated water; high and low pressure steam lines; gas, oil, and compressed air lines; a vacuum cleaning system; and a sprinkler system, and all laundry piping; * * * and which said extra plumbing work was not set forth in the original plans and specifications, which were incomplete, for the purpose of making use of said building as a laundry; * * * that the total cost of said extra plumbing and laundry piping was and is the sum of $18,828.30;" 10 per cent. of which, due to plaintiff, is the sum of $1,882.82.

The contract upon which this cause of action is based, as stated in the notice of lien, is that defendant "further contracted and agreed to and with the undersigned, R. J. Finn, to pay him * * * the sum of 10 per cent. of the actual cost of all extra plumbing work of every kind and description, laundry piping, etc., as necessary to complete said building, which said 'extra work' was not set forth in the original plans and specifications, which were incomplete," and that the total cost thereof was $20,493.66.

[2] It is apparent that the work which plaintiff in this count described as extra work is identically the same, in part at least, as that comprised in the work which, as shown by the contract set forth in the notice of lien, he, as we have hereinbefore held, agreed to perform for the $600; and, hence, to the extent that it was the same, he could not recover therefor as extra work.

[3] Moreover, if any part thereof was work not called for by the "original plans and specifications, which were incomplete," the burden of showing such fact devolved upon plaintiff. Upon this point no attempt was made to segregate the extras from what plaintiff terms the original contract work. On the contrary, counsel for respondent says that it was, as stated by plaintiff, impossible to do so. Hence the court was left to mere conjecture as to the character, extent, and cost, both as to the work done under the original contract and that constituting extras. Plaintiff's theory, in support of which some meager evidence was introduced, that he was to receive $600 for work to the extent of $5,850, and 10 per cent. of the cost of all work over that amount, is not only inconsistent with the contracts set forth in the notice of lien, but likewise inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint.

The judgment is reversed.

Ex parte BRACKLIS. (Cr. 559.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 15, 1921.)

1. Jury ⟸4—Jury in a felony case must consist of 12 men.

A jury in a felony case must consist of 12 men, and a defendant on trial cannot waive his right to such a jury; the right secured by the Constitution being the right as it was known at common law.

2. Jury ⟸127—Accused must depend upon examination of jurors to acquaint self with qualifications.

A party on trial must depend upon an examination of the jurors on voir dire to acquaint himself with their qualifications, and he cannot go ahead and take the chance of a favorable verdict and then raise the point after verdict that a juror was not qualified.

3. Jury ⟸142—Accused held not entitled to discharge by reason of decrepit juror.

While a defendant may not waive a constitutional jury of 12 persons, he can, by acquiescence or by silence, waive the qualifications of any jurors, and after a verdict an accused cannot for the first time claim that there were only 11 jurors, in that one of the 12 was not in possession of his natural faculties by reason of decrepitude.

4. Habeas corpus ⟸3—Person having ample remedy in court below not entitled to.

Habeas corpus was not proper remedy to obtain release by one claiming that judgment was void because one juror was not in possession of his natural faculties by reason of decrepitude, since accused had an ample remedy in the court below by a motion on a proper showing to set aside the judgment.

5. Habeas corpus ⟸30(1)—Alleged error must render judgment utterly void.

Unless alleged error is so great that it renders the judgment utterly void, it cannot be raised by habeas corpus, as a writ of habeas corpus cannot be converted into a writ of error.

Application by A. P. Bracklis for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the sheriff of Sacramento county to secure his release. Writ dismissed.

C. B. Harris and A. B. Reynolds, both of Sacramento, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., C. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Hugh B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., and Thomas A. Farrell, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Judge pro tem. The petitioner was charged with the commission of a felony. He was convicted thereof by a jury of 12 men. He sets out in his petition that one of these jurors was not a competent juror, in that he was not in possession of his natural faculties, and was so decrepit that he was unable to comprehend the nature or character of the charge upon which the said A. P. Bracklis was being tried, and was unable to comprehend the nature and effect of the testimony adduced during the trial. He argues from this that the jury consisted of but 11 men, and that he was therefore deprived of his constitutional right of trial by jury.

[1] 1. It may be conceded that a jury in a felony case must consist of 12 men, and that a defendant on trial cannot waive his right to such a jury. The right secured by the Constitution is the right as it was known at common law. People v. Powell, 87 Cal. 349, 25 Pac. 481, 11 L. R. A. 75; Matter of O'Connor, 29 Cal. App. 225, 155 Pac. 115. At common law as well as under the constitutional provision, a jury in a felony case must consist of 12.

[2] 2. It is a general doctrine in this state that a party on trial must depend upon his examination of the jurors on voir dire to acquaint himself with their qualifications, and that he cannot go ahead and take the chances of a favorable verdict and then raise the point after verdict. This rule is so pronounced that he cannot even raise the point for the first time on motion for a new trial or on appeal. Still less can it be raised on habeas corpus, where only jurisdictional matters may be inquired into.

"It appears by the affidavit on motion for a new trial that one Dahl, a juror who sat in the case, was not a citizen of the United States, and this fact is relied upon for a new trial. After a verdict is rendered it is too late to raise for the first time the question now presented. * * * Counsel admit the soundness of this doctrine as a general proposition, but insist that the present case is an exception to the rule. The general doctrine is based upon the proposition that the objection comes too late, inasmuch as counsel should examine the juror as to his general qualifications in the first instance." People v. Evans, 124 Cal. 206, 56 Pac. 1024.

In another case the defendant, on motion for a new trial, offered to show that one of the jurors was a nonresident. The court overruled the point by saying:

"The objection to the juror went to his competency, and had it been timely made, full opportunity for which was given defendant before the jury was sworn, should have been sustained. It was too late to raise the objection after the trial." People v. McFarlane, 138 Cal. 481, 171 Pac. 568, 72 Pac. 48, 61 L. R. A. 245.

"An objection to a juror must be taken before he is sworn to try the cause." People v. Boren, 139 Cal. 210, 72 Pac. 899.

In People v. Henderson, 28 Cal. 465, one grand juror was not a citizen and another was not a taxpayer. The court said:

"The defendant * * * examined such jurors as he saw fit as to their qualifications, and exercised his right of challenge. No objection was made to either of these two jurors, nor did defendant question them upon the points referred to. Conceding the point to be otherwise good, under these circumstances the objection came too late, when taken for the first time after indictment found. The objection should have been made by challenge at the time of the impaneling of the jury."

"The objection that one of the jurors was an alien could not be taken for the first time upon the motion for a new trial. The defendants might have examined him upon the subject, and exercised their right of challenge before he was sworn, but having failed to do this, they must suffer the consequences of their own neglect." People v. Chung Lit, 17 Cal. 320.

It would be as impracticable as it is unnecessary to attempt to quote from the large number of California cases approving the foregoing doctrine.

3. The petitioner, however, insists that the disqualification of this juror was one that went to his entire capacity to act at all; that, in effect, he was not a juror. The description of his infirmity as contained in the petition is not very full or satisfactory, but it may readily be deduced therefrom that the alleged infirmity was the decrepitude of age or illness. The petition contains no suggestion of insanity or any sudden physical or mental stroke that overwhelmed his faculties. The infirmities arising from old age are usually so apparent that a party could not be excused from observing them and questioning the juror concerning them. A case might be imagined where an adroit person cunningly insane might deceive the court and counsel, but, if so, we have no evidence of such a condition in this case.

[3] What may be the rule in a case where a juror becomes insane during the progress of the trial, or where he successfully conceals his insanity from counsel until after the trial, it would be idle to inquire. In this case, there is no complaint that the juror was insane. It is charged only that he was not in possession of his natural faculties by reason of decrepitude. While a defendant may not waive a constitutional jury of 12 persons, it seems that he can, by acquiescence or by silence, waive the qualifications of any juror. Especially is this so in a case where the infirmity arises from the decreptitude of the juror. The authorities are clear that a party cannot sit idly by and take the chances of a favorable verdict, and then after verdict raise a point which he should have raised before the juror was sworn. The very purpose of the voir dire examination as to general qualifications is to ascertain whether or not the juror is a fit person to serve in that capacity at all. Having failed when he could and should have acted, the petitioner waived such limited disqualification as may have existed.

4. Petitioner has not shown that he was not aware of his alleged infirmity during the trial. We have shown by the foregoing authorities that it is quite necessary, in order to be heard on this point at all, that he should show that he was unaware of the objection to the juror in time to make seasonable objection to him.

[4, 5] 5. But petitioner is not seeking the proper remedy. There was, at most, no such wide departure from the established forms of procedure as to render the whole judgment void. He had an ample remedy in the court below, of which remedy he should have availed himself. He should have moved the court on a proper showing to set aside the judgment. This method of procedure is sustained in the case of People v. Perez, 9 Cal. App. 265, 98 Pac. 870. This proceeding is in the nature of a writ of error coram nobis, and, while not such in form, it answers the same purpose. People v. Silver, 154 Cal. 556, 98 Pac. 543.

Unless this alleged error is so great that it renders the judgment utterly void, it cannot be reached by habeas corpus, for it is well settled that the writ of habeas corpus cannot be converted into a writ of error.

"To grant this, however, would be to wrest the writ of habeas corpus from its primary purpose and to give it an operation that is not contemplated by the law. Its function is to determine the legality of one's detention by an inquiry into the question of jurisdiction and the validity of the process upon its face, and whether anything has transpired since it was issued to render it invalid. It is not designed to retry issues of fact or to answer the purpose of an appeal." In re Leonardino, 9 Cal. App. 690, 100 Pac. 708.

The writ is dismissed, and the petitioner remanded.

We concur: BURNETT, J; HART, J.

6. Waters and water courses ⟸138—Right to waters of spring held established by adverse user.

In an action involving the right to the waters of a spring, plaintiffs held to have established adverse title as a result of user by their predecessor.

7. Frauds, statute of ⟸119(2)—To prevent manifest injustice, equity will prevent reliance on the statute.

Under principles of estoppel to prevent a manifest injustice, or, in other words, prevent acts which would work what in the eyes of equity would be a fraud on the rights of another equity will prevent reliance on the statute.

8. Frauds, statute of ⟸144—Parties held estopped from denying the validity of parol grant of waters.

Where defendants' predecessor made a parol grant of the waters of a spring, and plaintiffs' predecessor, acting thereon, established an irrigation ditch at the expense of approximately $2,000 and made a considerable annual outlay therefor, defendants are equitably estopped from denying the validity of the parol grant, though it was subject to an attack because within the statute.

9. Waters and water courses ⟸152(11)—Decree adjudging priorities sufficient.

Where the court found that the flow of a spring was 175 inches, that plaintiffs were entitled to 100 inches, defendants being entitled to 40 inches reserved by their predecessor, the decree which stated that plaintiffs were entitled to their 100 inches is not defective, because it did not state the amount to which the defendants were entitled, etc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Action by Emma S. Stepp and another against Judith E. Williams, individually, and as executor of the last will and testament of Chas. W. Williams, deceased, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, and C. E. McLaughlin and C. P. McLaughlin, both of Sacramento, for appellants.

D. B. Robnett, of Alturas, for respondents.

HART, J. The defendants own certain lands in Modoc county, Cal., upon which there is a spring, the waters of which flow over and across the lands of defendants; plaintiffs claim a four-fifths interest in the spring and in the waters flowing therefrom under an alleged oral grant from Chas. W. Williams, deceased, the predecessor in interest of defendants. Plaintiffs brought this action to quiet their alleged title to the waters of said spring, and for an injunction restraining defendants from interfering with the said waters claimed by plaintiffs. Defendants, Judith E. Williams, both in her individual and representative capacity, and Gary Williams, answered said complaint, denying the allegations of the complaint as to the grant of said waters of said spring, and by way of cross-complaint alleged the ownership of said spring and the lands on which the same is located, and a right and title to said spring by reason thereof and by reason of their riparian rights, and by prescription.

The court, in substance, found as follows:

The spring, the right to the waters of which is in controversy here, is situated on the lands of the defendants, who, as to said lands, are the successors in interest of one Charles W. Williams. Continuously from and including the year 1882 to the time of his death on the 25th day of February, 1918, said Williams was the owner and in the occupancy of the land on which the spring in question is situated.

In the year 1883, Charles W. Wells, who was at the time of the commencement of this action deceased, but in the year just named the husband of Emma S. Stepp, one of the plaintiffs herein, made homestead entry of certain land, and also a desert land entry of certain other land, and after due proceedings received a patent therefor from the United States government, all said lands, as well as the plaintiffs' land, upon which the said spring is located, being situate in Modoc county. The plaintiffs are the successors in interest of said Wells in the homestead and desert entries above mentioned. The said lands of plaintiffs "are all of a dry, barren nature, and would not produce crops in paying quantities without artificial irrigation, and the said lands would be of little or no value without such irrigation, and at the times said lands were entered by said Charles W. Wells said lands were of this character, all of which was well known to said Charles W. Wells;" that either in the year of 1882 or of 1883 said Williams "told Charles W. Wells, husband of said plaintiff, Emma S. Stepp, that he, the said Wells, could have the said spring and the waters running therefrom, except a small quantity of water required by the said Charles W. Williams, not exceeding 40 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure."

Wells and his wife, plaintiff Stepp, relying upon the offer of the waters of said spring so made to Wells by said Williams, thereupon "commenced the construction of a levee around said spring to restrain the waters thereof from flowing onto the lands of said Charles W. Williams, and commenced the construction of a ditch leading from said levee and spring to the lands of said Charles W. Wells and said Emma S. Stepp, * * * and diligently prosecuted the work of constructing said levee and ditch until the same was completed, and upon the completion of said levee and ditch said Charles Wells diverted and appropriated all the waters of said spring and the stream issuing therefrom, except 40 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, so reserved by said Charles W. Williams, and by means of said ditch conveyed the same to the aforesaid lands of said Charles W. Wells and plaintiff, Emma S. Stepp, his wife, and applied the same to a beneficial use in the irrigation of said lands and the production of valuable crops, and for stock and domestic purposes, as hereinbefore found;" that the ditch so constructed by said Wells and his said wife was of an average width of 5 feet and of an average depth of 2 feet, and was and is between 6 and 8 miles in length; that it required a period of 5 years to complete the construction of the ditch, during which time said Wells devoted "all the time and money he was able to devote to the construction of the same," and the cost of the original construction of the dam and ditch was approximately $2,000.

That, after being told by said Williams that he might have the said spring and water, said Wells proceeded to clear a portion of his lands, and planted an orchard, consisting of two or three dozens of fruit trees, and also planted about 300 acres of said lands in crops of hay, grain, and alfalfa, all of which required artificial irrigation, and for which said Wells had no supply of water except from the said spring; that said Wells expended large sums of money in improving the said property by fencing the same and constructing other improvements thereon, "all of which said improvements would be useless unless said Charles W. Wells was able to cultivate said lands and irrigate the same and produce crops thereon; that all of said facts were known to and by the said Charles W. Williams and said * * * Williams was at all times apprised of the work that said * * * Wells was doing and having done in the construction of said ditch and dam and in the clearing and cultivating of said lands, and the diversion, appropriation, and use of said waters of said spring by said * * * Wells, as aforesaid"; that the use of 100 inches of the waters of said stream and spring by the said Wells was at no time interrupted by said Williams.

That the original amount of water "appropriated and diverted" by Wells from said spring "under grant of right" from Williams was "at least 125 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure," but Wells, on the 16th day of May, 1884, granted by a deed of conveyance to one Wm. H. Nelson, the owner of certain lands over which the said ditch was constructed, "or was to be constructed," an undivided one-fifth interest in and to said ditch and the said water right, since which time Wells and his successors in interest have claimed, diverted, and used as their own, "and under their own right," 100 inches of said spring and stream, measured under a 4-inch pressure, "over and above any and all interest in and to the waters of said spring which they had theretofore deeded to the said William H. Nelson."

That the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest, for over 30 years from the time of the completion of the dam and ditch by means of which they diverted and used the waters of said spring to the time of the commencement of this action, have "continuously, uninterruptedly, openly, notoriously, under a claim of right, and adversely to the defendants and their predecessors in interest, and adversely to said Charles W. Williams, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of said * * * Williams, diverted, appropriated, claimed, and used, 100 inches of the waters of said spring and stream * * * upon the aforesaid lands for the irrigation thereof, and for the production" of the crops above mentioned, and for stock and domestic use; that during all said time said number of inches of water "have been necessary and indispensable for the proper irrigation of said lands and for the production of said crops," etc.

It is further found that ever since the completion of said dam and ditch the plaintiffs and their grantors have cleaned and maintained the ditch every year, at an annual cost of $250 and that said work of "cleaning and maintaining" has been open and notorious, and was within the knowledge of said Williams during his lifetime, and without objection, interference, or interruption by him or his agents.

It was found that the payment of all taxes of whatsoever kind and nature assessed or levied against the lands of plaintiff and against the ditch and water right in question for more than 5 years continuously immediately preceding the commencement of this action had been made by plaintiffs.

The court also found that the waters of the spring were riparian to the lands of the defendants, but the riparian rights of the latter thereto to the extent of 125 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure, ceased to exist by virtue of the grant of said waters to the plaintiffs and their grantors, etc. But it was also found:

"That, during the years 1882, 1883, and 1884, a great deal of the lands of the said Chas. W. Williams lying below and west of the said spring were saturated with water, and were swamped, and were thus rendered unfit for cultivation, and said defendants' predecessors in interest required no water for the irrigation of said lands; * * * that the lands of said defendants and the crops growing upon the same will not dry up and wither away, or not mature, nor will the said lands, nor the whole thereof, or any part thereof, become unproductive or of little value, nor will defendants be compelled to abandon the cultivation of said lands (as alleged in the complaint), if they are deprived of the said 100 inches of the waters of said spring," etc.

The judgment awards to plaintiffs the first 100 inches of the waters flowing from said spring and the stream, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and quiets their title thereto, and enjoins defendants or their agents, etc., from interfering with or in any manner obstructing the right of the plaintiffs to take and divert in the manner described by the findings said number of inches of the waters flowing from said spring.

This appeal is from said judgment, by the alternative method (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a and 953b).

The findings above recapitulated are attacked upon the ground that there is no evidence to provide them with the requisite support. The several assignments under this head constitute the principal bases for the claim that the judgment should be reversed.

A vast amount of evidence, both for the plaintiffs and the defendants, was received in the case. We have examined it with care, and upon such examination we have found no reason for doubting that the findings are sufficiently supported. To enter here upon a detailed examination of the evidence would involve a task which would require an extended statement herein of the testimony, and we will, therefore, in a general way only refer to the testimony, except in an instance or so where specific reference to the testimony of some particular witness may be deemed essential to or at least proper for the purposes of the decision. As in nearly all cases where the question as to the sufficiency of the support of the findings afforded by the evidence is an issue submitted on appeal, there is here, as to some of the essential points, a substantial conflict, and, as learned counsel concede, in such a situation as to the proofs a reviewing court is required to leave the determination of such conflict precisely where the Constitution has placed it, viz.: With the tribunal before which the proofs have been directly adduced. But there are certain of the essential facts as to the existence of which in this case there is neither any controversy here nor, consequently, a conflict, but which counsel for appellants earnestly contend do not establish a legal right in the plaintiffs to the waters or any portion thereof of the spring in question.

It should first be explained that both Charles W. Williams, the original owner of the land on which the spring the right to the waters of which is here in controversy is located, and the predecessor in interest of defendants, and Charles W. Wells, who located and owned the lands now owned by the plaintiffs, and to and for the benefit of which the plaintiffs claim the right to take the waters of said spring, were deceased at the time of the commencement of this action; that Judith E. Williams, defendant executrix, and Gary Williams, her codefendant, are respectively, widow and son of said Charles W. Williams; that plaintiff Emma S. Stepp is the widow of Chas. W. Wells, deceased, she, however, having intermarried with one Stepp after the death of said Wells, and that the plaintiff Mary V. Graham is the daughter of said Emma Stepp by her former husband, Wells.

In considering the evidence it will be convenient, and perhaps less apt to be confusing, to designate the lands of plaintiffs and the ditch constructed for the purpose of carrying the waters of said spring to said lands as the "Wells lands" and the "Wells ditch," respectively.

As the findings show, the spring in controversy is located in a corner of the Williams lands, which are, of course, riparian thereto. There are two springs in near proximity to each other, one being referred to in the testimony as the North, or Warm, spring and the other the South spring, the latter spring being also on the Williams lands. It is from the North or Warm spring that the plaintiffs claim the right to take and divert and convey the waters to their lands.

It should further be explained that there is testimony tending to show that a considerable portion of the Williams land situated near these springs was of a swampy or marshy character and that, therefore, as to that portion of said land there was no necessity for artificial irrigation. There was, however, a small acreage of the Williams lands near the springs, variously estimated by the witnesses as embracing from 30 to 40 acres, which, to make it productive, did require irrigation at the time of the alleged gift of the waters of the North spring by Williams to Wells.

The Williams and the Wells lands, as well as lands owned by other parties, were situated not far distant from Pitt river. Much of the Williams lands was irrigated by means of a large ditch through and by which the waters of said river were diverted and used for agricultural purposes. There were several thousands of acres of land irrigated by means of this ditch (generally referred to by the witnesses as the "Big Ditch"), the lands so irrigated being owned by different parties, including, as stated, the Williams lands. These lands were situated east and northeast of the Wells ditch, and the evidence shows that in irrigating said lands from the "Big Ditch" a large quantity of the waters diverted through said ditch would get away, and become "waste waters," which flowed sporadically—that is, whenever particular lands entitled to the use of said waters were being irrigated—towards the Wells ditch, and would ultimately seep thereinto, very often in sufficient quantities to overflow the last-named ditch.

There is no dispute as to the fact that the climate in the locality in which the lands of the plaintiffs are situated is of extreme aridity, and that, consequently, said lands are dry and barren, and would be wholly useless and worthless for the production thereon of the usual agricultural crops and garden truck without artificial irrigation.

It is also undisputed that in the year 1883, when Wells made the homestead and desert land entries mentioned in the findings, the lands which were thus taken up by him were covered with sagebrush, the removal of which, to render said lands available for practical agricultural purposes, was absolutely necessary. The evidence discloses that, having in mind the location of these lands, Wells first set about to find a water supply for the irrigation of the same, and, according to the testimony of the witness Cable, had a conversation with Charles W. Williams, the predecessor of the defendants, in which said Williams said to Wells that if he (Wells) could raise the dam then surrounding the spring in question to such a height as would facilitate the flow of the waters therefrom into a reservoir or ditch he could have all the water of said spring, except a quantity sufficient to irrigate the 30 or 40 acres near the spring, referred to in the findings, for the purpose of irrigating his lands, and for domestic purposes. This conversation occurred before Wells had taken decisive steps looking to the due location of the lands. It is further made to appear by the evidence that, acting upon and accepting this offer by Williams, Wells immediately proceeded to construct a ditch connecting the spring with his lands. The distance between the spring and the said lands is approximately seven miles. It appears that he was a man of limited means, and, as a result, was required to prosecute the work of construction with a degree of diligence only which was commensurate with his financial ability. The consequence was that the work of constructing the ditch covered a number of years. In fact, the undisputed evidence is that Wells began the work of building the ditch in the year 1883, and finished it in the year 1888, the total cost thereof, not including the labor he himself bestowed upon the work, being approximately $2,000.

After the completion of the ditch, Wells, on the 20th day of October, 1888, filed, and on the same day caused to be recorded in the office of the county recorder of Modoc county, a written notice whereby he gave notice that he had "appropriated all the water from the springs commonly known as the Williams Springs situated in the [describing the Williams lands] to the extent of 400 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure." Said notice was also at that time posted at the spring in question, the point of diversion of the waters thereof.

The ditch, as constructed, passed over and through a portion of the land of Williams, and in close proximity to the latter's residence. The ditch also passed through and over a portion of the land of one W. H. Nelson, which adjoined the lands of Williams, and, as the findings show, Wells, as a consideration for the right to run the ditch over and through the land of Nelson, conveyed by deed to the latter a one-fifth interest in said ditch and the water right connected therewith. This deed was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Modoc county, at the request of said Nelson, on the 2d day of June, 1884. It may also be stated here that Williams having later become the owner by purchase of the Nelson land over which said ditch passes, likewise became the owner of Nelson's one-fifth interest in the ditch and the water right.

The undisputed evidence also shows that, while the work of constructing the ditch was in progress, Wells made material and extensive improvements on his lands, erecting thereon a house in which to live, erecting fences around the lands, removing the sagebush thereon, and otherwise putting the lands in a condition suitable to use for agricultural and other like purposes. He planted a small orchard on the land, and raised a limited amount of garden products and produced alfalfa, and cultivated the wild hay growing thereon. The water for these purposes, prior to the completion of the ditch, was hauled to the lands by Wells, by what particular means the record does not disclose.

As stated, the work of building the ditch was completed in the year 1888, from which time until after the death of C. W. Williams, which occurred on the 25th day of February, 1918, Wells and his successors in interest have continuously diverted to and used upon their lands the waters of said spring for irrigating, stock, and domestic purposes.

There is testimony by a large number of witnesses—persons who had either been employed on the Wells ranch or at times had been in possession of it under leases—that the water from the spring was diverted by means of the ditch in question to and used upon said ranch in the irrigation of from 200 to 250 acres thereof for upwards of 30 years or more without molestation or protest from or by Charles W. Williams. The same witnesses, as well as Mrs. Stepp and her son, testified that every year, during the period above mentioned, Wells, and, subsequently to his death, Mrs. Stepp, caused the ditch to be cleared of moss growing and débris accumulating therein from one end of the ditch to the other—that is, from the Wells ranch to the spring—and that the expense each of said years of performing that work averaged in money the sum, approximately, of $250. Some of the work of clearing the ditch of the obstructions which impeded the free passage of the waters of the spring through the ditch to said ranch necessarily was done on the portion of the Williams land over which the ditch passes and, as seen, near the residence of Williams, and the witnesses just referred to testified that at no time did C. W. Williams, or any member of his family, or any one acting for him, ever interfere with or protest against such work being so done either on his premises or at the springs. In fact, it appears that, on one occasion, when Wells was building the ditch, and before its completion, Williams, at the request of Wells, performed some work on the ditch near the spring, for which Wells compensated him to the extent of $27 or thereabouts.

On another occasion, Mrs. Stepp testified said Williams was present while she had some Indians cleaning the ditch, and at that time Williams not only did not protest against the cleaning of the ditch, but had an Indian employee of his, who was with him at the time, to show the other Indians how to do the work properly. In brief, as to C. W. Williams' attitude relative to the maintenance of the ditch, there is evidence showing, or at least plainly tending to show, and sufficient to support a finding to that effect, if the trial court believed it, that Williams, down to the day of his death, all along regarded his gift or grant of the waters of the spring to Wells, except the small quantity reserved for the irrigation of some 35 or 40 acres of his own land, as perfectly valid, and that the right to said waters or the use thereof had and was vested in Wells. For instance, on one occasion, many years after he had given said waters to Wells, and while the latter was using the same through and by means of the ditch constructed by him, Williams, in a conversation with the witness Layton, in a way expressed regret that he had given the waters of the spring to Wells, explaining that when he parted with his right to the waters flowing from the spring he had no use for all said waters, but that since then conditions had changed, so that the said waters would "now come in very handy" to him. In this same conversation he further explained to the witness that many years prior to the date of said conversation Wells had said to him (Williams) that he contemplated constructing a ditch whereby he could convey water for irrigation to the lands he proposed to locate from Pitt river; that he (Williams) then said to Wells: "There's no use of your going to that expense; if you can raise the dam at this spring so as to get the water therefrom into a ditch, you may have the water, except a small amount for irrigating the 30 or 40 acres of my own land lying near the spring," or words to that effect.

It further appears that in the years of 1916 and 1917 a controversy arose between the plaintiff and the Williamses over the waste waters flowing from the "Big Ditch," some of which, as seen, would, on occasions, drift into a swale near the Wells ditch, and thence by seepage into said ditch, often filling the same to the point of overflowing. The Williams people claimed that the plaintiffs were entitled to no part of said waste water, and insisted upon their right to impound the same for their own exclusive use and purposes. Williams, it appears, had constructed a flume across the Wells ditch for the purpose of conserving said waste waters, and thus had prevented the flow of the same into said ditch. A conversation occurred early in the year 1917 between the plaintiff, Emma S. Stepp, and Gary Williams, one of the defendants, and in the presence of the witness Graham, a Mr. Hughes, son-in-law of C. W. Williams, and the attorney for the plaintiffs. In that conversation, so Mrs. Stepp and Graham testified, Gary Williams stated that the right of Mrs. Stepp to the waters of the spring was not disputed by him or any of his family; that they knew that the plaintiffs owned the waters of the spring, but, as to the waste waters from the "Big Ditch," they did not know whether plaintiffs owned them or not, but that they (the Williamses) were of the belief that they owned the waste waters.

There is testimony that the spring in question was the only available source affording a definite supply of water of a sufficient flow for the necessary irrigation of the Wells lands; that the Wells ditch, if kept clean, and free from sediment and other obstructions, has a carrying capacity of at least 200 inches of water; that for many years—in fact, continuously from the time that the ditch was completed down to the time of the obstruction thereof by the damming up of the ditch by the defendants in August, 1918 (after the death of C. W. Williams)—at least 125 inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure, over and beyond the 35 or 40 inches of water, likewise measured, which the court found that Chas. W. Williams had reserved for use on the 35 or 40 acres referred to above, flowed into the ditch from said spring and thence to the lands of the plaintiffs; that, as seen, one-fifth of said amount of said waters (25 inches thereof) was conveyed by Wells to William H. Nelson; that the amount of the waters so conveyed and reaching the lands of plaintiffs was necessary for the proper irrigation of fruit trees, crops of hay, and garden truck produced thereon, and for stock and domestic purposes. It is true that there was no testimony introduced showing that an exact measurement had ever been made of the waters flowing through the ditch from the spring, but a civil engineer did testify that the ditch, at a certain point therein, was capable of carrying 500 or 600 inches, while there was other testimony, based upon the observations and judgment of those thoroughly acquainted with the ditch for many years, to the effect that 100 inches were required for the necessary uses of the plaintiffs, and that the latter, until their ditch was interfered with in the year 1918 by the defendants, as above explained, always secured all the water necessary or requisite for sufficiently irrigating from 200 to 300 acres of their ranch.

[1, 2] The above rather general résumé of the evidence is taken mainly from the testimony of witnesses introduced by the plaintiff, and is clearly confirmatory of the declaration made in outset hereof that the findings are well supported. Indeed, as above suggested, there is, upon some of the points, little, if any, substantial variance between the testimony received upon behalf of the plaintiffs and that of the defendants. The latter themselves in effect admitted that some water from the spring in question had continuously, for many years, been diverted from the spring into the Wells ditch, and thence to the Wells ranch. They claimed, however, that the said ditch, because of not being of the proper grade, was incapable of carrying more than 30 or 40 inches of water from the spring to the Wells ranch, and that thus no greater number of inches of water from the spring had ever been diverted into the ditch. This testimony, however, was based upon observations made just before this action was commenced, and at a time when the defendants had refused to permit the plaintiffs to go upon their land, as the latter had always theretofore done without being interfered with, for the purpose of clearing the part of the ditch thereon of such obstructions as had accumulated therein during the months the ditch was not in actual use. And, in this connection, this pertinent suggestion may well be ventured: That it is not probable that Wells and his successors, who own approximately 300 acres of land wholly worthless for agricultural purposes without artificial irrigation, would have constructed at an expense of $2,000 and maintained at a yearly cost of approximately $300 a ditch the carrying capacity of which would not exceed 30 inches of water, which according to the testimony, would irrigate not to exceed 30 or 40 acres of land. But, be that as it may, upon the question of the carrying capacity of the ditch there is, as we have shown, positive testimony for plaintiffs in direct conflict with the testmony for the defendants last referred to.

There is the further claim, though (and this was the main theory upon which the defendants resisted at the trial the right of plaintiffs to more than 30 or 40 inches of water from the spring, if any at all), that by far the greater portion of the water carried to the Wells ranch through the latter's ditch was from the waste waters escaping from the "Big Ditch." But, as in rebuttal of that proposition of fact, the plaintiff showed, even by one of the defendants and some of their other witnesses, that the said waste waters were subject to such control by the owners of the "Big Ditch" as that they could be, and often were, diverted from the Wells ditch, and therefore could not get into that artificial waterway.

As we have seen, there were several times when the certain lands entitled to irrigation from the "Big Ditch" were being irrigated the waste waters therefrom would flow in a different direction from the Wells ditch and would never reach said ditch. Gary Williams, one of the defendants, testified that he could so manipulate the "Big Ditch" that, when irrigating from it, he could either overflow the Wells ditch or make it dry. In a word, from the testimony for the plaintiffs, as well as from some of that for the defendants, it is a reasonable inference to say that the Wells ditch was supplied with the waste waters from the "Big Ditch" only periodically, or whenever it might happen that certain lands entitled to be irrigated from the latter ditch, and which sloped towards the Wells ditch, were being irrigated. These waste waters were of a vagrant or fugitive character, and, while so long as they remained so or were not controlled by the owner of the ditch from which they escaped they were subject to appropriation and use by others, a usufruct could not be acquired therein (Dannenbrink v. Burger, 23 Cal. App. 587–596, 138 Pac. 751); hence, the plaintiffs could not rely upon them as providing a source for a definite or continuous supply of a sufficient quantity of water for their necessary purposes, and it is not reasonable to suppose from the evidence that they intended to do so when they built their ditch. Indeed, as is plainly evident, the construction of the ditch to the spring and the building of a dam around the spring in a manner to permit the flow of the waters of the spring into the ditch are themselves convincing evidence of the fact that plaintiffs expected and intended to rely for their water supply wholly upon the spring. But, at all events, it is clear that upon this point, as well as upon all the other vital facts, there at least exists a substantial conflict in the evidence.

As before stated, the fixing of quantities as to the waters flowing from the spring and those customarily carried therefrom by the ditch to the lands of plaintiffs is based upon testimony involving the opinions or the best judgment of those familiar with the spring and the ditch, and generally with the requirements as to water for irrigation purposes under the conditions shown to exist in the locality in which the lands of plaintiffs and those of the defendants are situated. There were no exact measurements shown. In such a case more or less difficulty in defining the precise rights of the parties is always to be expected, and the court can do no more than to exercise and apply its best judgment under the circumstances as shown in arriving at a conclusion as to what is just and right as to both the contending parties. To this end it may draw such inferences from all the testimony and the general situation as the same may reasonably afford. Here (and we are now speaking of the quantity of water awarded to plaintiffs) we have testimony showing the capacity of the ditch, the amount of water in bulk it has usually conveyed to the lands of plaintiffs in the irrigating seasons, the number of inches required to irrigate a certain area, the number of acres irrigated by plaintiffs, and an approximation of the quantity of water which ordinarily flows from the spring into the ditch. From all these facts the court could form a fair and reasonable judgment and conclusion as to the quantity of the waters of the spring to which the plaintiffs are entitled, and at the same time allow to the defendants enough of said waters to measure up to the reservation made by C. W. Williams, and this, we conclude, after a careful reading of the testimony, it has done. Indeed, it has done more, for it has given to the defendants 35 inches of water in excess of the amount which was reserved by their predecessor from the alleged grant of the waters of the spring to Wells.

And thus we are brought to a consideration of other legal points arising and involved in this controversy.

The plaintiffs contend that the evidence and findings show that C. W. Williams conveyed to their predecessor in interest by an executed parol grant the waters of the spring in question, and that also they acquired a title to said waters by adverse user or prescription. On the other hand, the defendants, in addition to the contention that the findings derive no support from the evidence, of which proposition we have already disposed adversely to their position, maintain that, inasmuch as the plaintiffs' predecessor did not take actual possession of the waters of the spring until some 5 years after the alleged grant of the waters of the spring, there was not, and could not have been, an executed parol grant of said waters; that the alleged grant is, therefore, void, since water, being a part and parcel of the land to which it is appurtenant, is real property, which cannot be transferred or granted except by an instrument in writing. Code Civ. Proc. § 1971. Or, it is further contended, if the transaction amounted only to an executory oral agreement to convey the water, the transaction or agreement is still void, since it is also the law that an agreement to convey real estate or any interest therein, to be valid or of legal force, must be reduced to writing. Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 5.

[3] There is no legal proposition better settled in this state than that the interest here claimed by the plaintiffs is an estate in real property, and that a conveyance or an agreement to convey such an interest is within the statute of frauds, and must therefore be in writing. Hayes v. Fine, 91 Cal. 391, 398, 27 Pac. 772, and cases therein named;

Churchill v. Russell, 148 Cal. 1, 4, 82 Pac. 440.

[4] It is believed, however, that the gift of the waters to the predecessor in title of the plaintiffs involved an executed parol grant of said waters. It is true that Wells did not, upon being given the right to the waters of the spring, proceed immediately to use the same. In the very nature of the case this was impossible. But he did proceed at once with the preliminary preparations essential to the putting of the waters to use, and prosecuted those preparations as expeditiously as the circumstances and conditions and the nature of the grant would permit, and this, we think, was sufficient in such a case as this to constitute an executed parol grant. However, if that position were logically assailable, it would seem to us that there can be no doubt that the evidence establishes in the plaintiff title to the waters by prescription or adverse user.

[5, 6] In the first place, it is to be noted that in the year 1888 Wells posted a notice of the appropriation of 400 inches of the waters of the spring at the spring, the point of diversion of said waters, and caused said notice to be recorded in the office of the recorder of Modoc county. From that time on and until interrupted in the diversion of said waters by defendants in the year 1918, he and his successors, under a claim of right, continuously, openly, notoriously, and, indeed, with the actual knowledge of Charles W. Williams and the defendants here, diverted and conveyed to his ranch by means of the ditch the waters of said spring, or so much thereof as was necessary for their purposes. Here, then, is clearly shown a prescriptive right, since such use under such circumstances would carry with it a presumptive grant—that is, such use involves all the elements of a prescriptive right to said waters by adverse user. Roseberry v. Clark, 23 Cal. App. 549, 557, 138 Pac. 923; Faulkner v. Rondini, 104 Cal. 140, 146, 37 Pac. 883. In stating this conclusion, we are not unmindful of the general proposition that a riparian right cannot be acquired by mere use or lost by disuse, by which it is meant, as we understand that doctrine, that, unless there is such an invasion of the riparian rights of the party against whom title by prescription is claimed that he would have had a ground of action against the intruder, no prescriptive title to such waters can arise or be established. Faulkner v. Rondini, supra. We have here, however, not only the invasion by a nonriparian owner of the riparian rights of the defendants, but an invasion of which the riparian owners had actual knowledge, and such an invasion as would have constituted a ground of action in his favor against the invader. Upon what theory may it be held that thus a prescriptive title to the waters in question is not established, such invasion having more than covered the statutory period of five years prescribed for the acquisition of such a title or title by adverse user or possession? Indeed, we think we are justified in holding, upon this record, that the plaintiffs have established a parol grant, followed by adverse user. Roseberry v. Clark, supra.

[7, 8] But this case may, in strict harmony with the evidence and the findings, be considered upon the theory that the use of the waters of the spring by Wells and his successors, the plaintiffs herein, was under a license from the predecessors in interest of the defendants, and that the better doctrine of the case, and one upon which it may justly be decided in favor of the plaintiffs, involves an equitable concept whose animating principle is natural or abstract right and justice—a principle which justly discountenances or frowns upon transactions the consummation of which would work a gross injustice upon the rights of a person. The doctrine referred to is that of estoppel, which, while never operating to destroy the very salutary rules involved in the statute of frauds, will, upon the highest considerations of right and justice, deny to individuals the privilege of invoking the protection of that statute where their acts and conduct in a transaction with others would render the statute a shield to rather than a prevention of manifest injustice, or, in other words, the prevention of acts which would work what in the eyes of equity would be a fraud upon the rights of another person.

The cases applying the doctrine referred to, where the proved facts and circumstances are such as we have in the instant case, are numerous, both in this and other jurisdictions, and among them are, notably, Churchill v. Russell, 148 Cal. 1, 82 Pac. 440; Stoner v. Zucker, 148 Cal. 516, 83 Pac. 808, 113 Am. St. Rep. 301, 7 Ann. Cas. 704; Roseberry v. Clark, 23 Cal. App. 549, 138 Pac. 923; Smith v. Green, 109 Cal. 228, 234, 41 Pac. 1022; Blankenship v. Whaley, 124 Cal. 300, 304, 57 Pac. 79; Flickinger v. Shaw, 87 Cal. 126, 131, 25 Pac. 268, 11 L. R. A. 134, 22 Am. St. Rep. 234; Raritan Waterpower Co. v. Veghte, 21 N. J. Eq. 475; Rerick v. Kern, 14 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 271, 16 Am. Dec. 497. See, also, comment of Prof. Freeman on the last-named case in 16 Am. Dec. 501 et seq.

It is sufficient to refer specifically herein to a few only of the above cases to illustrate the application to a case of this kind of the equitable doctrine or principle mentioned.

Churchill v. Russell, as in the case at bar, involved the question of the validity of an executed parol license given by the plaintiff to the defendants to take the waters of a certain stream known as Butte creek, in Siskiyou county. The plaintiff's predecessor in interest had, many years prior to the giving of said license, duly appropriated all of the waters of said stream. Before permission to divert the waters of the stream to their land was given by one Boyes, plaintiff's predecessor in title, the defendants had an interview with Boyes, in which they said to the latter that they had an opportunity to purchase the homestead right of a man named Snell to certain land situated near the plaintiff's lands, and also stated that if he (Boyes) would grant to them the right forever to 20 inches of the waters of said creek they would purchase said homestead right and prove up on it. Boyes assented to that proposition and explicitly assured the defendants that, as he disliked Snell, and would like to see him leave the community, they could have for all time the 20 inches of water asked for. The defendants purchased the Snell homestead right and proceeded with the work necessary for effecting the diversion to the land that they had thus acquired of the said water, and to make improvements upon said land. Several years thereafter the plaintiff, the successor in interest of Boyes, brought an action to restrain the defendants from diverting the waters of said creek. The Supreme Court, in deciding the case, declared that the plaintiff, if having knowledge or notice of the license by Boyes to defendants, would, under the facts above stated, be estopped from denying the latter's right to divert 20 inches of water from said creek to their land.

In Stoner v. Zucker, 148 Cal. supra, at page 520, 83 Pac. 810, 113 Am. St. Rep. 301, 7 Ann. Cas. 704, Mr. Justice Henshaw, after reviewing some of the cases exemplifying the application of the principle, with characteristic clearness, thus summarizes the rule as applicable to cases similar in their facts to the one before us:

"The recognized principle, therefore, is that where a licensee has entered [upon the premises of another] under a parol license and has expended money, or its equivalent in labor, in the execution of the license, the license becomes irrevocable, the licensee will have a right of entry upon the lands of the licensor for the purpose of maintaining his structures, or, in general, his rights under his license, and the license will continue for so long a time as the nature of it calls for."

The rule as it is stated in Raritan Water Power Co. v. Veghte, 21 N. J. Eq. 475, supra, as follows, is noticeably applicable to the facts of this case as proved and found:

"To the extent that the license is executed, equity will not disturb it or permit its revocation. Where improvements of a permanent nature have been made by a person on his own land, the enjoyment of which depends upon a right recognizable by the law, affecting the land of another, and to which his consent is necessary, and where such consent is expressly proved, or necessarily implied from the circumstances, and the improvements have been made in good faith upon it, equity will not permit advantage to be taken of the form of consent, although not according to the strict mode of the common law, or within the statute of frauds; and to defeat such a purpose will, upon a proper bill filed, enjoin the licensor from accomplishing his fraud, or when he asks relief it will be refused, or if granted, will be allowed merely in the shape of compensation, but protecting the right of the licensee."

Without further quotation from the above-cited cases, all of which are illuminating upon the proposition in hand, it is to be said that the rule, to the extent that it is announced in those cases, is sustained by the courts of a majority of the American state jurisdictions. The case of Kinsell v. Thomas, 18 Cal. App. 683, 124 Pac. 220, while not as to the facts precisely this case, applies the doctrine to an executed parol grant of real property.

The findings, supported as we think by sufficient evidence, bring this case (as has already been stated) clearly within the rule as it is declared in the California cases and the New Jersey case above quoted. Here, as we have seen, the predecessor in title of the plaintiffs, relying upon the grant of the waters of the spring to him by the predecessor of the defendants, not only made valuable and expensive improvements upon his own land, but went to great expense in digging a ditch for the purpose of securing the use of the waters so granted to him. Not only that, but he maintained the ditch and the dam around the spring for many years at a large annual outlay of money and labor, and with the actual knowledge not alone of the predecessor of the defendants but of the defendants themselves. It seems to us that, if there ever was a case where equitable estoppel should intervene to prevent injustice, this is the case, for it would be manifestly inequitable and unjust to permit the defendants, upon the facts as they were proved and found, to deny the validity of the parol grant or license (if, under the facts, the latter, technically, be the appropriate characterization of the transaction) upon which the plaintiffs rely for their title to the waters in dispute.

Another point made by the defendants is that they acquired the right to all the waters of the spring as against the plaintiffs by adverse user. What has been said above regarding the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings constitutes a sufficient reply to this point. We may, in addition, say that even the defendants and their witnesses themselves admitted that during the irrigation season there was always more or less water from the spring flowing in the ditch. Moreover, the testimony is, as we have shown, that the plaintiffs always used the waters flowing in the ditch when they needed them. Of course, there are times when waters for irrigation are not needed or used by the owner thereof, but an adverse right cannot be acquired against the owner by a person using the waters at times when the owner does not require them for his own purposes. If the claimant has used the water at such times as he needed it, it is regarded by the law as a continuous use. Hesperia Land, etc., v. Rogers, 83 Cal. 10, 23 Pac. 196, 17 Am. St. Rep. 209, Silva v. Hawn, 10 Cal. App. 544, 551, 102 Pac. 952.

It is further objected that the findings and the judgment are fatally uncertain in that they fail to find and adjudicate the paramount right and define the right of the defendants. We are of the opinion that the decree is, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, sufficiently certain and definite in the adjudication of the respective rights of the parties.

[9] The court found that the natural flow of water from the spring was 175 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure. It also found, as seen, that the plaintiffs were entitled to the first 100 inches of the water of said spring likewise measured, and upon evidence by the defendants themselves that an inch of water to the acre would be sufficient to fulfill the terms of the reservation by their predecessor, that the defendants were entitled to 40 inches, measured under like pressure, which were reserved by their predecessor when he granted the said waters to the predecessor of plaintiffs. These findings, as we have shown, are sufficiently supported evidentially. While the decree does not specifically state the amount of water that the defendants are entitled to take from the spring, it is obvious that if, as the findings and the decree declare, the plaintiffs are entitled to 100 inches of said water, the defendants have available to them for their own use all the waters of the spring over and above the amount to which the plaintiffs are entitled, which amount, according to the findings, would be 35 inches in excess of the quantity to which the defendants are entitled under the reservation by their predecessor. While the court could just as well have specifically fixed the rights of the defendants in the decree, as it did those of the plaintiffs, still it is very clear that by the decree, viewed by the light of the findings, the defendants are made to know precisely what their rights in the spring are. The decree here is wholly dissimilar to those in the cases cited by appellant, of which Watson v. Lawson, 166 Cal. 235, 135 Pac. 961, may be given as an example. In that case the judgment merely declared that the defendants were entitled to "sufficient water for the proper irrigation of so much of their several lands as they have heretofore irrigated with such water." Obviously, such a decision cannot be upheld, since it is plain that by it to the defendants themselves was practically committed the determination of the quantity of water that they were entitled to.

We have found no reason for disturbing the judgment and it is therefore affirmed.

MILLER v. LERDO LAND CO. (L. A. 5926.)

Trusts ⊂=31—Brokerage contract held not to create express trust.

A contract giving plaintiff the right to sell defendant's land, plaintiff to receive one-third of the proceeds, but having no interest in the land, held not to create an express trust in plaintiff's favor, and a judgment directing defendant to sell the land and pay plaintiff one-third of the proceeds within a given time in default of which the land was to be sold by a receiver was unwarranted.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Milton T. Farmer, Judge.

Action by C. E. Miller against the Lerdo Land Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Anderson & Borton, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Nathan Newby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in an action to quiet title to and declare a trust in certain lands situated in Kern county, Cal. We quote and adopt the following statement of facts from the opinion rendered in this case by the District Court of Appeal and written by Mr. Justice Knight:

"This is an appeal by the defendant, Lerdo Land Company, a corporation, from a judgment in which it was decreed that said Lerdo Land Company holds legal title to 1,390.08 acres of land situate in Kern county in trust for the purpose of selling the same and accounting to plaintiff for one-third of the gross selling price of any and all of said lands until finally disposed of. Said judgment further decreed that said land be sold by said Lerdo Land Company within six months from the date of the entry of judgment, at the rate of $150 per acre, unless plaintiff consents in writing to a sale for a less sum, and in the event of a failure on the part of said Lerdo Land Company to sell such land within that period that it be sold by a receiver (who was named in the decree) at public or private sale, for the highest price obtainable, for cash or on time, subject to the confirmation of the court, and that from the proceeds of said sale the costs shall first be deducted, and the balance divided, one-third to the plaintiff and two-thirds to the defendant.

"The controversy arises over two written agreements between the parties, the first of which is dated October 2, 1912, and the second, which is supplemental to the first, is dated May 29, 1913. The first agreement is quite elaborate and comprehensive, and it will therefore necessitate paraphrasing or merely stating the substance of many of its provisions.

"By its terms respondent was given the exclusive right to sell, within three years, 6,481.03 acres of land situate in Kern county belonging to appellant, providing 1,500 acres or more were sold by the end of the first year, and 4,000 acres by the end of the second year. The land was to be sold in tracts of 10 acres or more, except lots in town sites. The sale price was to be $150 or more per acre. If the land sold for $150 per acre, respondent was to receive one-third and appellants two-thirds of the selling price, and if it sold for more than $150 per acre the surplus was to be equally divided. The town-site lots were to be sold under a special arrangement, which it is not necessary to mention here in detail. Provision was also made for selling on deferred payments, in which event a special arrangement was made for the time when respondent should receive his pro rata. It was also provided that respondent should enter immediately upon a selling campaign, and that during the life of the contract he should not engage in the business of selling any other land subdivision without appellant's written consent.

"Appellant agreed to commence and to continue with the development of water wells on the property sold, and as the property was developed to equip said wells with casings, pumps, motors, etc., in order to supply the land sold with water for irrigation. It was provided that a certain quantity of water should be supplied for each 160 acres of land. Said agreement also contained the following provision: 'Provided always, however, that if it shall be ascertained and determined by the first party (Lerdo Land Company) in the drilling of wells upon any portion of the lands that water cannot be discovered, produced, and developed for the irrigation of the same in adequate quantities, and at reasonable cost, then and in that event the first party shall in writing notify the party of the second part to that effect, and shall describe the lands upon which it has been ascertained and determined that it is not practicable to develop and deliver water in adequate quantities and at such reasonable cost, and such lands so described in such notice shall thereupon be removed from the terms of this agreement, and shall cease to be affected hereby or included herein.' Provision was also made for an extension of the time to sell the land if the sales were retarded by the failure to develop water.

"On May 29, 1913, a supplemental agreement was entered into, by the terms of which it was provided: 'Whereas, the parties hereto did on the 2d day of October, 1912, enter into a certain indenture of agreement whereby the party of the second part was constituted the agent of the party of the first part for the purpose of selling its lands known as the "Lerdo lands," consisting of about seven thousand (7,000) acres in the county of Kern, state of California, for the consideration and upon the conditions therein expressed, a copy of which said agreement is hereby referred to and made a part hereof; and

" 'Whereas said agreement provided among other things that the parties thereto might mutually agree to except and release from said agreement any of said lands included therein, should it be determined that it would not be profitable to develop water upon said lands or sell the same:

" 'Now, therefore, this agreement is to witness that the parties hereby mutually agree that the following described lands shall be withdrawn from the operation of said agreement: [Here follows the description of the land.]

" 'It is further understood and agreed that in consideration of the withdrawal of said lands, and of the waiver by the party of the second part of his commissions as provided in said indenture of agreement, that the party of the second part shall be entitled to the equal one-third of the selling price of any and all of said lands hereinabove described, to be paid at the times and in the manner and according to the terms of sale of the remaining two-thirds interest in said lands or any thereof at whatever date said lands or any thereof shall or may be sold, without deduction on account of any mortgage or other lien or incumbrance made, done, or suffered by the party of the first part, its successors, agents, or assigns; provided, however, that said lands shall not be sold at less than $150 per acre except with the consent of the party of the second part in writing first had and obtained.'

"The supplemental agreement was dated and signed in duplicate by respondent on May 29, 1913, and transmitted by him to the president of the appellant company. On September 26, 1913, one of the duplicates was returned to respondent, duly signed by appellant, and the other duplicate was retained by appellant.

"It was the finding of the court that the supplemental agreement of May 29, 1913, was obtained from the respondent through the representations of the president and secretary, respectively, of the appellant company, to the effect that 'in order to relieve the defendant from the obligation to develop water for the irrigation of certain portions of the Lerdo tract, the said defendant desired to withdraw, by mutual consent of the plaintiff and defendant, portions of said Lerdo tract described in the sales contract dated October 2, 1912, from the operation of said contract,' and that it was further represented to respondent 'that so much of the purchase money that might be received from the sale of said land to be withdrawn as would be necessary would be used for the development of the remainder of said Lerdo Tract, by the installation of an efficient irrigation system, and that, unless sold as oil land, said development would have to be postponed indefinitely.' The court further found 'that on and after the 29th day of May, 1913, plaintiff and defendant treated the lands described in said contract as having been withdrawn from the operation of the sales contract dated October 2, 1912, and no attempts were made to sell any of said land for agricultural purposes after May 29, 1913; * * * that defendant never at any time drilled any wells or attempted to drill any wells upon said land or to install any irrigation system thereon for the purpose of irrigating said land solely for the reason that said land had been withdrawn from sale for agricultural purposes by said contract dated May 29, 1913.' And the court further found that the installation of an irrigation system on said withdrawn land would have cost the defendant a sum in excess of $30,000, of which expense the defendant was relieved by said contract dated May 29, 1913.

"No sales of the land under the supplemental agreement of May 29, 1913, were made, and on March 24, 1914, appellant caused to be served upon respondent a notice to the effect that said supplemental agreement was not the corporate act of said Lerdo Land Company, nor was it ever authorized or approved by it, and therefore was not binding upon it. This action was filed by respondent on April 6, 1915."

We are of the opinion that the decree of the trial court cannot be sustained for the reason that neither the pleadings nor proof justify that portion of the findings and decree determining that a trust exists in the lands. Respondent's rights under the contract of May 29, 1913, are that he shall receive one-third of the selling price of any and all of the said lands; that this one-third of the selling price shall be paid to respondent at the times and in the manner and according to the same terms as the remaining two-thirds are paid to appellant; that there shall be no deduction on account of any mortgage or other lien or incumbrance made, done, or suffered by appellant, its successors or assigns. It is apparent from a recital of the substance of the provisions that the contract conferred upon respondent nothing more than a right to one-third of the proceeds when the lands are sold. There is a distinction between an interest in the land itself and an interest in the money obtained from the sale of the land. Green v. Brooks, 81 Cal. 328, 332, 22 Pac. 849. In the cases of Green v. Brooks, supra, and Hannah v. Canty, 175 Cal. 763, 167 Pac. 373, cited by respondent in support of the theory that a trust exists, the person claiming to be the beneficiary of the trust was, in effect, one of the purchasers of the land in question and had a direct interest therein. The contract relied upon by respondent, however, does not, by any possible construction, purport to pass a present interest in the lands to respondent nor to provide for the holding of the lands or any interest therein for the benefit of respondent, nor is there anything from which any such intention can fairly be inferred. There is, therefore, no express trust, and respondent does not contend that any other kind of trust exists. It is clear from the uncontradicted evidence that the appellant corporation refused to part with any interest in the lands, and it follows that the decree imposes upon the parties terms not within the purview of their agreement in that it compels appellant to sell the lands, although appellant is still the sole owner thereof. The decree creates further rights in favor of respondent by depriving appellant of the right to control the terms of the sale and placing the same in the hands of a receiver despite the fact that the parties contemplated and stipulated that appellant should determine all the conditions of sale, with the single proviso that the price should not fall below $150 per acre.

It is unnecessary to discuss the several other points raised upon the appeal, for the sole object of the action is to declare a trust in the lands. It having been determined that no trust exists, respondent's action necessarily fails.

The judgment is reversed.

WILLIAMS v. BULLOCK TRACTOR CO. (L. A. 5583.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1921.)

1. Pleading ⟸403(3)—Deficiency in complaint cured by answer.

In an action to recover purchase money paid for a farm tractor, the failure of the complaint to refer to the fact that a written agreement of sale was entered into, accompanied by a written warranty, was immaterial, where the deficiency was supplied by the averments of the answer.

2. Sales ⟸267—Complaint in action for purchase price held to contain irrelevant matter.

Where a written agreement of sale and warranty expressly excluded all implied warranties, so that the written contract became the measure of liability, averments of the complaint, in an action to recover purchase price, as to oral statements and general advertising representations by defendant's agents, upon which plaintiff relied, were irrelevant and immaterial matters.

3. Pleading ⟸403(3)—Complaint to recover purchase price held sufficient when supplemented by averments of answer.

A complaint, in an action to recover purchase price paid for a farm tractor, supplemented by averments of the answer, held sufficient after rejecting surplusage, although there was no direct allegation that the tractor failed for lack of suitable material; durability averments as to defects and weaknesses sufficiently implying such failure.

4. Appeal and error ⟸268(1), 719(6)—Sufficiency of evidence not reviewable, where no specifications of insufficiency assignment of errors or exceptions.

Appellant cannot object to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain findings, where the bill of exceptions contains no specifications of insufficiency, nor any assignments of error or exceptions reserved.

5. Appeal and error ⟸241—Motion as to evidence insufficient to warrant review of sufficiency of evidence.

Although motions to strike out portions of testimony and to dismiss complaint and give defendant judgment and the insufficiency of certain parts of evidence to sustain certain findings are alleged, there is insufficient assignment of errors of law occurring on the trial to warrant review of the evidence, where no objection of general insufficiency of evidence to sustain any findings material to a judgment under the term of contract of sale involved was contained in such motions.

6. Sales ⟸285(4)—Timely notice of defects waived by seller's conduct.

Literal compliance with requirements of warranty in a contract of sale, requiring immediate written notice if the tractor sold failed to work well after three days' trial and immediate return of the tractor, in which event the price was to be refunded, held waived by seller's acts, where delivery was never actually made or accepted by the buyer, and seller's agents were unable to put the tractor in proper condition, and the buyer was entitled to recover the purchase price.

7. Sales ⟸440(3)—Evidence that warranted machine was in good condition long after rejection held inadmissible.

In an action to recover the purchase price of a farm tractor, testimony of witnesses who inspected the tractor long after the attempt to operate it, and after the buyer's attempted rescission for breach of warranty, to the effect that they discovered nothing wrong with it, etc., was inadmissible, where there was no showing that the tractor remained in same condition as when it was previously tried out, and, as it was the seller's duty to make the tractor work satisfactorily upon demand within a reasonable time, such evidence was immaterial to the buyer's right to recover.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Annie P. Williams against the Bullock Tractor Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This appeal is taken from a judgment for plaintiff to recover from defendant $1,280, with interest and costs, on account of money paid by plaintiff to defendant on a contract of purchase of a gasoline farm tractor, which contract was rescinded by plaintiff for failure of certain conditions and warranties of the contract.

The action was tried on an amended complaint and answer thereto. The amended complaint sets forth in general terms the agreement of the plaintiff to buy, and of the defendant to sell, a certain tractor, known as a "16–10 H. P. creeping grip gasoline tractor, complete, at and for the sum of $1,156.25," and that the plaintiff then and there, on or about January 26, 1916, paid to said defendant said sum of $1,156.25 for said tractor. It is further alleged that the defendant thereafter, on or about the 4th day of February, 1916, delivered the tractor at plaintiff's ranch, near Victorville, in the county of San Bernardino, Cal., and then and there, for a period of about three days, attempted to operate said tractor on plaintiff's said ranch; that the attempt to make the tractor work failed because of structural defects, breakage of parts, excessive heating of engine, faulty adjustment of the machinery, etc.; that during all the times while said defendant, through its agents and servants, was operating and in charge and control of said tractor, it represented to plaintiff and assured plaintiff that said tractor would operate satisfactorily when the same was properly adjusted and when certain new parts were added thereto; that the defendant then left the tractor with plaintiff with the representation that it would work satisfactorily on the replacement of certain minor parts, which were to be supplied by defendant and sent to the ranch; that the tractor was left by defendant in the field at plaintiff's ranch in charge of plaintiff's mechanics; that thereafter plaintiff attempted to operate said tractor but was unable to make it work, and on February 10 again notified defendant of such fact, and defendant thereupon sent to plaintiff at her ranch certain parts for the engine and a new carburetor representing that with such new parts the tractor would work satisfactorily; that plaintiff thereupon made further attempts to operate the tractor, with the result that the engine became overheated, the parts broken and out of adjustment, although carefully and competently managed and controlled by plaintiff's mechanic; that complaint was again made to defendant, who, on or about March 13, 1916, sent a mechanic to the ranch to adjust, repair, and overhaul the tractor, and that said mechanic worked about eight hours on March 13, and again on March 14, in an attempt to put the tractor in working order but was unable to do so, and said mechanic left said tractor at plaintiff's ranch and the same has not been moved and could not be moved or operated since; "that at the time defendant's said mechanic worked on said tractor said mechanic found that the engine was worn and could not be made to operate without being entirely overhauled and partially rebuilt; that other bearings on said tractor were entirely worn out; that the oil feeders were broken; that the piston rings were entirely worn out and the cylinders were worn; that the gear wheels were not true; that the brake was broken; that certain oil cups were omitted; that the piston bearings on the crank shaft were worn; that the cam on the exhaust arms was out of adjustment and numerous other defects existed on said tractor; that said mechanic was unable to repair said tractor or make it operate"; and at all times and up to the commencement of this action said defendant has failed and refused to attempt to repair, overhaul, or adjust said tractor, and plaintiff alleges that said tractor cannot be repaired, overhauled, or adjusted or made to operate or run for any considerable period of time or at all, and cannot be made to do the work represented by defendant to the plaintiff as aforesaid, or to do the work for which it was manufactured by the defendant; that the consideration for the said sum of $1,156.25, paid by the plaintiff to the defendant, has wholly failed; that on or about the 8th day of April, 1916, the plaintiff served notice of rescission, notified defendant that the tractor was at plaintiff's ranch where left by defendant's mechanic, subject to the order and control of defendant, and demanded the return and payment to plaintiff of said sum of $1,156.25, and that no part of said sum has been repaid.

There was a second count in the complaint to recover the sum of $1,156.25 as money had and received by the defendant to and for the use of the plaintiff. The court on the trial found the facts for the plaintiff, as above stated, substantially as alleged in the complaint, and gave judgment for plaintiff for the amount named, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

In stating the issues presented by the complaint there has thus far been no reference to terms of contract or conditions of sale upon the breach of which plaintiff's right of rescission may rest.

The facts pleaded in the complaint in this regard were certain representations by defendant's agents, made orally and by printed advertising matter, relating to the qualities of the tractor. It is alleged that as an inducement to the contract the agents of defendant guaranteed that the tractor was of the latest model, would run and operate continuously, pulling a load and maintaining a speed of 2½ miles per hour; that it would operate in a field, pulling not less than three plows, turning a 14-inch furrow, 8 or 10 inches deep; that it would plow 6 or 8 acres a day; that it was free from defects in construction and was entirely suitable and fit for farm work; together with many other enumerated qualities of excellence. It is further alleged that plaintiff had no knowledge of or experience with tractors, and relied on the representations of defendant's agents, and that defendant was aware of that fact.

[1] No reference is made in the complaint to the fact that a written agreement of sale was entered into between the parties, accompanied by a written warranty signed by the defendant, and which, it is contended, contains the conditions of the sale and limits the liability of the defendant. However, this contract and warranty was set out in full by defendant's answer, and entered into the issues presented to the court on the trial as completely as though pleaded by the plaintiff. The deficiency in this respect of plaintiff's pleading was therefore supplied by the averments of the answer. Shively v. Semi-Tropic, etc., Co., 99 Cal. 259, 33 Pac. 848; Daggett v. Gray, 110 Cal. 169, 42 Pac. 568; Sav. Bank v. Barrett, 126 Cal. 413, 58 Pac. 914; Flinn v. Ferry, 127 Cal. 654, 60 Pac. 434.

The contract and warranty alleged by the answer and proven on the trial are in words and figures as follows:

"Order for 'Creeping Grip' Gasoline Tractor.

"To Bullock Tractor Company, Chicago, Ill., U. S. A.

"The undersigned, of Victorville post office, county of San Bernardino, state of California, rural route No. ———, hereby purchase of you, subject to all the conditions of agreement and warranty printed on back of this order, and made a part hereof: To be shipped to A. P. Williams, R. R. station, Victorville, Cal., via Santa Fé. Quantity 1. Size 16–10 H. P. 'creeping grip' gasoline tractor complete, and agrees to pay freight on same from Los Angeles, Cal., U. S. A., and to settle for said tractor by payment of (1,156.25) eleven hundred fifty-six and twenty-five hundredths dollars as follows: Cash.

"It is expressly agreed that this order shall not be countermanded, and that said tractor shall remain and be held by the undersigned as your exclusive property until the purchase money shall have been paid in full; and that said tractor or any part of same shall be and remain personal property in whatsoever manner it may be annexed to realty. This order is given subject to acceptance by the Bullock Tractor Company.

"Signed and dated the 26th day of January, 1916.

"[Signed] Annie P. Williams, Purchaser.

"Dated at Chicago, Ill., ———, 191—.

"Accepted, Bullock Tractor Company,

"By ————.

"Recommended for acceptance by A. C. Michael.

"Warranty.

"Bullock Tractor Company (a corporation) warrants its 'creeping grip' tractor herein described to be well made of good materials, and durable if used with proper care.

"Said company agrees to furnish, free of charge, any part that may prove defective within one year; said company may at its option require the return of such defective part, freight or express prepaid, to the factory for inspection and examination, and assumes no responsibility when the machine, or part returned, indicates misuse or neglect of alterations or repairs made outside its factory. If upon three days' trial, with proper care, the tractor fails to work well, the purchaser shall immediately give written notice to the Bullock Tractor Company, at Chicago, Ill., and to the agent from whom it was purchased, stating wherein the tractor fails, and when the purchaser desires us to send a competent man to put it in good working order, shall allow reasonable time therefor, and render necessary and friendly assistance to operate it.

"If the trouble is due to defective material or workmanship, the total cost of sending the expert shall be borne by the company; otherwise the purchaser shall pay said expense. If the tractor cannot then be made to work well, the purchaser shall immediately return it to said agent, and the price paid shall be refunded, which shall constitute a settlement in full of the transaction.

"Use of the tractor after three days, or failure to give written notice to said company and its agent, or failure to return the tractor as above specified, shall operate as an acceptance of it, and a fulfillment of this warranty.

"This warranty cannot be changed or abridged, and excludes all implied warranties.

"Bullock Tractor Company."

[2] It may be conceded, under this agreement and warranty and the express stipulation therein that the agreement "excludes all implied warranties," that this written contract is the measure of defendant's liability as to the quality and utility of the tractor, and that the averments of the complaint as to oral statements and general advertising representations on the part of the defendant's agents, upon which plaintiff relied, are irrelevant and immaterial matter. Remsberg v. Hackney Mfg. Co., 174 Cal. 799, 164 Pac. 792. However, it is expressly guaranteed by the contract that the tractor is well made and of good materials, and durable, if properly cared for "and durable if used with proper care," and it is provided that "if upon three days' trial, with proper care, the tractor fails to work well, the purchaser shall immediately" notify the tractor company, which shall "send a competent man to put the machine in good working order," and "if the tractor cannot be made to work well the purchaser shall immediately return it to said agent, and the price paid shall be refunded, which shall constitute a settlement in full of the transaction."

[3] We think the pleadings thus supplemented by the averments of the answer present sufficient facts to maintain a cause of action upon the conditions for recovery of the purchase money as set out in the written contract and warranty after rejecting all other representations pleaded as surplusage.

Although there is no direct allegation in the complaint that the tractor failed for lack of suitable material and durability, the averments as to its numerous defects and weaknesses sufficiently imply such failure.

The findings of the trial court, while covering the irrelevant matter pleaded as to oral representations of the qualities of their tractor, are ample as to the lack of quality and durability of the tractor and failure of the defendant to put it in working condition, to support plaintiff's rescission and demand for repayment of the purchase money.

The court finds:

That "said tractor was neither well made of good materials nor was it durable if or when used with proper care"; that it could not be operated "because it was improperly constructed and built, and was not made of good materials and was not durable"; that at times "said tractor would not develop sufficient power to move its own weight, and the plaintiff after ten days was unable to plow with said tractor to exceed two acres; that said tractor in said time wore out the piston rings; that the main bearings of the drive shaft became worn; that certain oil pipes and feed pipes became broken and disconnected; that the clutch collars were entirely worn out; the engine when run became excessively hot and it was necessary to stop said engine and allow it to cool off so that the same would run at all; parts and portions thereof became loosened and broken, and said tractor would not pull the load that would be pulled by an ordinary two-horse team; that during all of said time said tractor was properly lubricated with oil, was furnished proper fuel and proper oil, and had and was given by plaintiff proper care in all respects."

[4] The appellant is not in a position here to object to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, in that the bill of exceptions contains no specifications of insufficiency, or any assignment of errors or exceptions reserved. Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 167 Pac. 394, L. R. A. 1918B, 415, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 184; City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604; Smith v. Meade, 36 Cal. App. 173, 171 Pac. 815.

[5] Neither do we think there is sufficient assignment of errors of law occurring on the trial to entitle appellant to a review of the evidence. Motions were made and overruled at the close of the trial, which it is claimed were substantially a motion for nonsuit. These included a motion to strike out portions of the testimony and to dismiss the complaint and give judgment for defendant, and insufficiency of certain specified parts of the evidence to sustain certain findings is alleged, but no objection of general insufficiency of the evidence to sustain any of the findings material to a judgment under the terms of the contract and warranty was contained in the motions.

The greater portion of appellant's voluminous briefs, however, is devoted to discussion of the conflicting evidence, and we have considered the same, with the result that we find ample testimony to support the findings. Nearly all the probative facts relating to the condition and operation of the tractor given with considerable detail in the findings, are, in substance, a synopsis of the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses.

There can be no question, under the findings and evidence, that the trial court was justified in its conclusion that the tractor was not well made of good materials or durable in use, or that the plaintiff, if she acted in due time and on proper notice to the defendant, was justified in rescinding the contract and demanding a return of the purchase money.

[6] Appellant, however, claims that notice of the unsatisfactory condition of the tractor was not given in compliance with the contract, that the rescission was not made within the time stipulated, and that no return of the tractor was made to defendant's agents.

It was stipulated under the agreement of warranty that—

"If upon three days' trial, with proper care, the tractor fails to work well the purchaser shall immediately give written notice to the Bullock Tractor Company, at Chicago, Ill., and to the agent from whom it was purchased, stating wherein the tractor fails, and when the purchaser desires us to send a competent man to put it in good working order, shall allow reasonable time therefor, and render necessary and friendly assistance to operate it."

And further:

"If the tractor cannot then be made to work well, the purchaser shall immediately return it to said agent, and the price paid shall be refunded."

And also that—

"Use of the tractor after three days, or failure to give written notice to said company and its agent, or failure to return the tractor as above specified, shall operate as an acceptance of it, and a fulfillment of this warranty."

There was no literal compliance with these requirements. But so far as time may have been of the essence of the agreement, this was waived by the acts of defendant. Delivery of the tractor was at no time actually made, or accepted, by the plaintiff. Defendant's agents undertook personally to deliver the tractor at plaintiff's ranch and put it in operation. It arrived in their charge in a crippled condition on the 3d of February. On the 4th it was repaired and adjusted, and during the 4th, 5th, and 6th defendant's agents were in charge attempting to make it work. They were not successful, and on the last date named plaintiff stated to said agents and servants that said tractor was not satisfactory and refused to accept it. It was however, left at the ranch, and plaintiff's sons, one of whom was experienced in mechanics and with motors and machinery, attempted to put it in operation. The findings are that they handled it skillfully and with due care. They were unable to get any better results for the reason of the defects as found by the court, and on February 9th, within three days after defendant's agents had left it, after their own futile experiments, plaintiff "notified the defendant in writing that said tractor was not satisfactory," and called attention to its defective and broken condition, and requested that a mechanic be sent immediately to put it into commission. Thereafter plaintiff sent certain new parts, including a carburetor that did not fit. The machine still not operating, defendant sent a mechanic on March 13th, who worked on the tractor unavailingly for about two days and then abandoned it because he did not have parts and material sufficient to make the necessary repairs. No further attempt was made by defendant to put the tractor in a condition to operate, and after waiting until the 8th of April, 1916, the plaintiff in writing again notified defendant that the tractor would not work and gave notice of rescission of the contract, and that the tractor was at the ranch where defendant's agents had left it and was subject to defendant's orders, and demanded repayment of the purchase money.

There were further negotiations, but no substantial repair of the tractor. A further notice of rescission and demand for return of the purchase money was made on May 12th. Plaintiff had never accepted delivery of the tractor, and notice to defendant and its agents that they would find it where they had left it and that it was subject to their orders was a sufficient return of any possession plaintiff had.

Under the pleadings, evidence, and findings the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

[7] The more serious question of error arises upon the exception of defendant to the ruling of the trial court excluding from the evidence the depositions of certain of defendant's witnesses. The testimony thus offered was of witnesses who inspected the tractor long after the attempt to operate it and after the rescission by plaintiff, and was to the effect that on such inspection they discovered nothing wrong with the tractor, and after some slight adjustments were able to operate it satisfactorily. Such testimony could only be admitted after a showing that the tractor remained in the same condition as when it was previously tried out. Although there was evidence that it had been left standing where it was when plaintiff rejected it and had not been used since, we have looked in vain for any affirmative showing that it had not been overhauled or changed.

In any event, it was the duty of the defendant under the contract to make the tractor work satisfactorily upon demand and within a reasonable time, and evidence that some months later defendant's witnesses were able to operate it with slight repairs is immaterial to plaintiff's right to recovery. Moreover, the evidence was cumulative; the defendant having had the advantage of the testimony of its agents who sold the machine and who tested and repaired it on the attempted delivery as to its condition at that time.

Many of the points involved in this appeal are covered by the opinion of Mr. Justice Hart in Ventura Mfg. Co. v. Warfield, 37 Cal. App. 147, 174 Pac. 382, an action strikingly similar to this in its facts and in the issue presented on appeal. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed and a petition for hearing in this court was denied.

The judgment herein is affirmed.

CITY OF SAN BERNARDINO v. CITY OF RIVERSIDE et al. (L. A. 5925.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1921. Rehearing Denied June 30, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses ⊂⊃34—Original rights to waters in streams based on common law.

The original rights to the waters in the streams in California are those which by the common law were vested in the owners of the land abutting upon the stream under the doctrine of riparian rights, and such rights are attached to the land as parcel thereof, and are private property.

2. Waters and water courses ⊂⊃127—Doctrine of "appropriation" stated.

Appropriation under the Civil Code is but another form of prescription, and the original rights of the abutting landowners are not divested thereby until the period of prescription has run in favor of the appropriator; and appropriation does not confer title immediately, as if by grant from the state, except when it affects lands belonging to the state or the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Appropriate—Appropriation.]

3. Waters and water courses ⊂=79—Rights in stream are protected against diversion of underground waters.

Where a stream runs over porous material saturated with water, and the underground waters support the stream, either by upward or lateral pressure, or feed it directly, persons having rights in the stream will be protected against a depletion thereof by adverse diversions of such underground waters, although there may be a point of distance from the stream at which a diversion of such underground water will have so little effect on the stream that it will not be actionable, it being ordinarily a question for the trial court whether this is true in the case before it.

4. Waters and water courses ⊂=101, 107(2)—Rule as to reciprocal rights in "percolating waters" stated; unreasonable taking of underground waters enjoined.

The rule in regard to "percolating waters" is that each owner of land overlying the same general underground supply of water may take such water on his own land for any beneficial use thereon so long as such taking works no unreasonable injury to other land overlying such waters; that, if the natural supply is not sufficient for all such owners, each is entitled only to his reasonable proportion of the whole; and that each may apply to the courts to restrain an injurious and unreasonable taking by another, and to have the respective rights adjudicated, and the use regulated, so as to prevent unnecessary injury and restrict each to his reasonable share.

5. Waters and water courses ⊂=101, 107(1)—Rule as to right to take "percolating waters" outside of watershed of underground basin stated; owner of overlying land may have right to subterranean waters adjudicated though he does not use the waters.

No one, not even the owner of overlying land, has the right to take water for any purpose out of a watershed over an underground basin or general underground water supply, if such taking will deprive of water any lands within the basin; and while the owner of overlying land who does not use such water thereon, and whose land is not injured by an exportation of the water to outside lands, has no right to enjoin such exportation, he may nevertheless apply to the court for a judgment declaring his own right to be paramount, and that such exportation is subordinate to his own right, and enjoining the taker from making an adverse claim to the water, or from taking it in such quantities or in such a manner as to destroy or endanger the source of supply.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Percolating Waters.]

6. Waters and water courses ⊂=190—City located in watershed over underground basin has water rights only as appropriator, and not as administrator of water rights of its inhabitants.

Under Civ. Code, § 1410, as amended, a city situated in a watershed over an underground basin or reservoir has no rights in the waters thereof as being subject to public use for the common benefit of its inhabitants or owners of the overlying lands, on the theory that the city is the administrator of such public use and has become substituted to the individual rights of owners for the benefit of all, but such water is private property, and the city's rights are only those of an appropriator.

7. Waters and water courses ⊂=140—Prior appropriator entitled to have his rights declared superior.

When a conflict arises between two appropriators of water, and their rights are otherwise equal, the prior appropriator, under Civ. Code, § 1414, will prevail so far as the conflict extends; and in an action to quiet title the prior appropriator is entitled to have his prior right declared to be superior to that of subsequent appropriators.

8. Waters and water courses ⊂=145—Appropriator may change place or character of use or place where water is taken.

With regard to water rights by appropriation, the appropriator may change the place or character of the use or the place from whence the water is taken out of the source, provided others are not injured by the change, and this rule applies to the taking of underground as well as surface waters.

9. Waters and water courses ⊂=152(11)—Judgment in action between cities as to water rights should not undertake to provide for future use.

In action between city lying in watershed over underground basin or water supply and a city and water company situated outside of the watershed, as to rights in the water in the watershed, held that, as the parties had the rights of appropriators only, the judgment should not undertake to provide for future apportionment of the waters of the artesian basin, but should definitely determine the existing rights of the parties.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by the City of San Bernardino against the City of Riverside and another. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Byron Waters, C. C. Haskell, Ralph E. Swing, and William Guthrie, all of San Bernardino, for plaintiff.

Henry Goodcell, of San Bernardino, and W. G. Irving and Miguel Estudillo, of Riverside (Samuel C. Wiel, of San Francisco, of counsel), for defendants.

SHAW, J. Both parties have appealed from the judgment.

The city of San Bernardino is situated in what is known as the San Bernardino artesian basin, and the lands comprising it overlie a part of the subterranean water of said basin. The dispute in the case arises from the fact that both parties are taking such subterranean waters, the plaintiff taking them for the use of its inhabitants for domestic and other purposes, and the defendants taking them to be transported to the city of Riverside and the vicinity thereof for irrigation and domestic use, said region being entirely outside of the said basin and of the watershed which supplies water thereto. The complaint asks that the claims and rights of each of the parties be determined and adjudicated, and that the defendants be enjoined from diverting water from said basin for use upon lands not situated therein or in the watershed tributary thereto.

The answer sets up the several claims of the defendants to the water aforesaid, and denies that plaintiff has any paramount rights thereto. The defendants also filed a cross-complaint, asking that their rights to take water from said basin should be determined and adjusted.

The court made elaborate findings in the case, covering 300 pages in the printed transcript. Judgment was thereupon rendered, declaring the respective rights of the several parties in the water of the said basin. It was stipulated between the parties that—

"Whatever judgment may legally be entered as based on the findings of fact may be entered regardless of whether the findings, or any of them, are or are not embraced in the pleadings as filed."

The appeal is presented upon the judgment roll alone, and, in view of the aforesaid stipulation, our consideration of the case may be limited to a review of the findings, conclusions of law, and judgment. The facts hereinafter stated are set forth in the findings.

The San Bernardino artesian basin is a plain, sloping generally toward the southwest. It is about 25 miles long from northwest to southeast, and 10 miles wide. It is bounded on the northwest, north, and east by high mountains, and on the west, south, and southeast by hills or higher lands. At the southwest, near the town of Colton, there is a gap in the hills and higher lands, through which the water falling on the watershed, of which the basin is the lower part, escapes, partly by streams on the surface and partly by seepage through the sands, gravels, and soil beneath. The gradient of the surface of the basin from the foot of the mountains toward this outlet varies from 25 to 50 feet per mile. Near the center there are level spaces which, prior to any artificial drainage, were swamps or marshes. It is probable that the basin was originally a lake, and that its present condition is the result of the gradual filling of the bed in the course of ages by detritus washed down from the adjacent mountains. The material of the basin is composed of boulders, gravel, sand, and soils of varying textures.

As the lake bed gradually filled, the torrents from the mountain canyons changed their courses from time to time, forming underground strata or waterways of coarser material, in which water percolates more freely than elsewhere. The material also lies in strata of varying permeability. In the adjacent mountains there are several canyons, in each of which a small stream generally flows in the dry season, and from each of which a large stream flows when there is a heavy rain upon its watershed. Of these the largest are Santa Ana river, at the easterly end, and Lytle creek, at the northwest. At the mouth of each canyon, where it emerges from the mountains, there is the usual debris cone of the coarser materials, such as boulders and gravel. In these cones a large portion of the water of the respective streams sinks and disappears.

The Santa Ana river and Lytle creek are the only streams that continue flowing on the surface as far as the outlet, and not infrequently in the dry season they also disappear before reaching it. The porous material filling the bed of the ancient lake is at least 1,000 feet in depth in some places. The outlet, it is believed, was originally a narrow gorge, which has become filled to the surface with material sufficiently impervious to water to serve as a dam and prevent the escape of water below the surface to any great extent. The whole mass of underlying strata composing this basin is saturated with water. The upper stratum is soil of a closer texture than the strata beneath. This overlying cap confines the water to the porous strata below, and the gradient of these formations causes a hydrostatic pressure therein. This pressure forces to the surface a large part of the water, beginning near Harlem springs, six miles from the outlet, and forms a stream known as Warm creek. This stream gradually increases in volume in its course toward the outlet, at which point, before any artificial depletion of the waters of the basin, there was ordinarily a flow amounting to 3,500 inches of water. A smaller creek of similar origin, called Town creek, is tributary to Warm creek. Both pass through the city of San Bernardino. As early as 1869 a well was sunk in the basin, in which the water rose to the surface and flowed out as a stream. From that time until the present it has been a common custom for persons owning land over this basin and desiring water to obtain the same by means of such artesian wells. There are now between 2,000 and 3,000 of them, and by means thereof large quantities of water are taken from the underground supply. Owing to the large number of these wells the pressure in the strata has decreased, so that many of them do not flow over the surface, and pumps are used to raise the water.

Before proceeding to the specific questions presented, we deem it advisable to state some general principles of law on the subject of the waters of streams and artesian basins, which must be kept in mind in the consideration of the case.

[1] 1. The original rights to the waters of the streams in this state are those which by the common law were vested in the owners of the land abutting upon the stream, under the doctrine of riparian rights, as it is commonly termed. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674; Hudson v. Dailey, 156 Cal. 628, 105 Pac. 748; Palmer v. R. R. Comm., 167 Cal. 165, 138 Pac. 997. Such rights are attached to the land as parcel thereof, and, of course, are private property. It is not necessary here to state the doctrine more fully, since there are no serious differences between the parties concerning it. We do not speak in this case of the public rights of navigation and fishery in navigable waters.

[2] It follows in consequence of this fact that all other present existing rights in the waters of streams have been acquired in some manner from the owners of such abutting lands, either by prescription, by contract, or by condemnation. Appropriation under the Civil Code is but another form of prescription, and the original rights of the abutting landowners are not divested thereby until the period of prescription has run in favor of the appropriator. This is a matter of some importance, for the effect of the Code provisions has been greatly misunderstood, especially by the general public and in public discussion. It is often erroneously assumed that such "appropriation" confers title immediately, as if by grant from the state. This is not true, except when it affects lands belonging to the state or the United States. Palmer v. R. R. Com., 167 Cal. 172, 138 Pac. 997.

[3] When a stream runs over porous material saturated with water, and the underground waters support the stream, either by upward or lateral pressure, or feed it directly, persons having rights in the stream will be protected against a depletion thereof by adverse diversions of such underground waters if they are injured thereby. There may be a point of distance from the stream at which a diversion of such underground water will have so little effect on the stream that it will not be actionable. It is ordinarily a question for the trial court to determine whether or not this is true in the particular case before it. These matters are considered as applied to differing conditions in Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 617, 57 Pac. 585, Miller v. Bay Cities W. Co., 157 Cal. 256, 107 Pac. 115, Hudson v. Dailey, 156 Cal. 626, 105 Pac. 748, McClintock v. Hudson, 141 Cal. 279, 74 Pac. 849, and other cases, and will be adverted to herein in connection with the rights of Riverside Water Company.

The law of so-called "percolating" waters presents the principal questions in issue in this case. These waters are almost invariably found in permeable material of more or less density, in such as sand, gravel, and boulders intermixed, in which the water will move readily by the force of gravity. The original title to such water was in the owner of the land in which it is found, under the elementary rule that the title and ownership of land extends to the center of the earth, and includes everything within the cone having the superficial boundaries of the land for the base and the center of the earth for its vertex. The transfer of the land by the government to the individual passed this title, and gave the landowner the right to all the water therein. Originally in this state it was assumed that this title was absolute, and that each landowner could take out as much of such underground water as he pleased, regardless of the effect thereof on other lands, provided he took it on his own land, and without a malicious intent to injure others. But the immediate effect of such taking of water out of such land usually is to draw out the water from the surrounding land into the void or depression caused in the water plane in the land from which it is taken, and this, if continued, lowers the subsurface water plane in the vicinity thereof, and eventually, to a greater or less extent, throughout the basin in which the lands are situated. If there is artesian pressure therein, this will reduce the pressure. In this manner the owner of one tract of land in such basin could take such water from another tract without an actual trespass thereon, and thus an injury could be done which the owner of the other tract could not prevent by any lawful physical means, and a resort to the courts was necessary. In cases presenting these facts the original assumption of absolute ownership in such water was held untenable under the conditions existing in this state, and the doctrine that the respective rights of owners of land in the waters percolating or lying beneath the surface are reciprocal and correlative as to each other was adopted. Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35; Newport v. Temescal W. Co., 149 Cal. 535, 87 Pac. 372, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1098; Burr v. Maclay, etc., Co., 154 Cal. 428, 98 Pac. 260; and other cases.

[4] With regard to such landowners, these cases hold that each owner of land overlying the same general underground supply of water may take such water on his own land for any beneficial use thereon, so long as such taking works no unreasonable injury to other land overlying such waters; that, if the natural supply is not sufficient for all such owners, each is entitled only to his reasonable proportion of the whole, and that each may apply to the courts to restrain an injurious and unreasonable taking by another, and to have the respective rights adjudicated and the use regulated so as to prevent unnecessary injury and restrict each to his reasonable share.

[5] With respect to other parties who take for use on lands outside the watershed of the basin, it is now established by said decisions that no one, not even the owner of overlying land, has the right to take water out of the watershed for any purpose, if such taking will deprive of water any lands within the basin; that, while the owner of overlying land who does not use such water thereon, and whose land is not injured by an exportation of the water to outside lands, has no right to enjoin such exportation, he may nevertheless apply to the court for a judgment declaring his own right to be paramount, and that such exportation is subordinate to his own right, and enjoining the taker from making an adverse claim to the water, or from taking it in such quantities or in such a manner as to destroy or endanger the source of supply. Burr v. Maclay, etc., Co., 154 Cal. 436, 98 Pac. 260. With respect to such cases—

"The court unquestionably has power to make reasonable regulations for the use of such water by the respective parties, fixing the times when each may take it and the quantity to be taken, provided they be adequate to protect the person having the paramount right in the substantial enjoyment of that right and to prevent its ultimate destruction."

2. The court finds, and the judgment declares (clause 7) that the city of San Bernardino has the right to take and use in its public water service 100 inches of water from the natural surface flow of Lytle creek; that it also has the right (clause 6) to take from the subterranean waters such quantity of water as may be necessary for useful purposes beneficial to the several parcels of land which it owns overlying the basin, including Lugo park and Meadowbrook park, subject to future regulation as to the quantity to be taken; that Meadowbrook park is riparian to Warm creek, and that the city of San Bernardino, as owner thereof, is entitled to use thereon so much of the water of said creek as may be reasonably required, subject to future regulation as to quantity (clause 14).

Also (clause 10) that the defendant Riverside Water Company, subject to prior rights of others to take water from Warm creek above its own intake, is entitled to take perpetually the entire natural flow of the creek at its point of intake, except as such flow may be diminished by water rightfully taken from the basin by the wells of the other parties to the action; that when said natural flow into its canal, at the intake thereof, during the months from April to October, inclusive, falls below an average aggregate of 2,710 inches, said company, while taking the whole flow of the creek, may also take from said basin into said canal, by means of wells, enough additional water to maintain an average aggregate flow of 2,710 inches therein, but, in effect, that all of the water so taken by wells must be used, so far as necessary, for irrigation and domestic use on certain 10,387.35 acres of land outside the basin, but not exceeding for use in irrigation, at any time, the quantity required to irrigate the crops and trees growing on said lands, according to a certain schedule of quantities allowed per acre for various kinds of crops and trees stated in the findings and judgment. It is entitled to take for these purposes all the natural flow of the creek when it exceeds 2,710 inches. It is also entitled (clause 15) to the reasonable use of the waters of Warm creek on certain lands riparian thereto which it owns, subject to future regulation by the court.

The court finds and adjudges (clause 11) that the city of Riverside is entitled to take from the basin for municipal uses and for its inhabitants an annual average flow of 282 inches. It is declared that the word "inch," when referring to water, is used in the findings and judgment to designate a continuous flow equal to "one-fiftieth of a cubic foot of water per second of time." For the sake of brevity, we use the word with the same meaning in this opinion.

3. In so far as the above-stated provisions of the judgment purport to declare the present rights of the three parties to the action to take and use the water in question away from the lands in which they lie, they do not appear to be injurious to any of them under the conditions found and adjudged to be now existing. Each party, as will be hereinafter more fully shown, is claiming such water solely as an appropriator of water necessary to supply a public use of which it is the administrator. The court finds and the judgment declares that, up to the time of the trial, there was at all times more water coming into the artesian basin, and included in the surface streams and underground waters thereof, than was required to supply all the needs of all the parties, and all the rightful diversions of all other parties therefrom. While this condition continues there can be no unreasonable injury to any one from the continued taking in quantities no greater than has been taken heretofore. In dry years they might be compelled by necessity to bore more wells, or to put in more pumps, or substitute more powerful ones, in order to obtain the supply now in use, but this must be considered no more than a reasonable requirement, at least under the conditions existing in that part of the state, so long as this process does not result in using quantities of water exceeding the quantity that would be restored to the basin, in excess of the use, during succeeding wet years.

For these reasons we do not deem it necessary to discuss extensively the objections of any of the parties to the judgment so far as it operates only on the aforesaid existing rights and relates to existing conditions. In other parts of the judgment the court below undertook to provide for future conditions and contingencies, to authorize further and additional takings of water from the basin in the future as the needs of future conditions might require, and to establish a mode for the regulation and administration of the waters of the basin by the court by proceedings in this action after judgment. In our opinion, these parts of the judgment are so far erroneous that the entire judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. As will hereinafter be shown, the requirement that the Riverside Water Company must deliver the water it takes from the basin by wells exclusively to the 10,387.35 acres of land to which it has been heretofore delivered, is also erroneous. We proceed to the considerations of the provisions last mentioned.

4. The defendants earnestly object to the provisions of the judgment regarding the existence of a "surplus" or "deficiency" as therein defined. Clause 16 thereof defines the words thus:

"The word 'surplus' used in this judgment means, and for all purposes of this judgment shall be deemed to mean, that condition of the San Bernardino artesian basin which exists when the average annual feed to the basin or water crop, that is, all water which rightfully and properly reaches and replenishes the basin, exceeds, for any year or period of years, the aggregate of all the artificial rightful drafts, together with all the natural drafts, made on said basin during the same period; and a 'deficiency,' as that word is used in this judgment, exists during such times as there is not a surplus, as herein defined."

It is further adjudged (clause 13) that there now exists in said basin a "surplus" of water, as thus defined; and (clause 12) that, while any such surplus exists, and so long as it continues, each of the parties may take for any beneficial purpose from said basin by wells "such quantities of water, even though in excess of the quantities hereinbefore specified, as such parties may deem reasonably necessary or proper, but not for waste," except that the Riverside Water Company must not take water therefrom by wells when it is not taking all of the natural flow of Warm creek. This provision is declared to be effective, "anything hereinbefore to the contrary notwithstanding."

It seems clear that, if the surplus exists, as both findings and judgment declare, and while it exists, the taking of additional water by either party can cause no substantial injury to either of the other parties, so far as their respective rights as owners of overlying lands, or as owners of the adjudged rights to take by means of wells the stated quantities aforesaid, are concerned, provided such additional taking is not allowed by continued use to ripen into a right superior or equal to the rights so adjudged, or to their rights as owners of overlying lands. The judgment contains other provisions which we think must be so construed as to prevent either party from claiming that a continued taking of such additional water shall give any right superior or equal to the rights as owners of overlying land, or to the present rights to take by means of wells. The judgment reserves in the court jurisdiction to determine, at any time, and from time to time, of its own motion, or on motion of either party, whether there is or is not a surplus, and thereupon to make such order or judgment as may be appropriate as to the quantity of water to be taken from the basin, or as to the use to which it may be applied, by any party or parties to the action, during such times as there shall not be a surplus in the basin. Neither party could, by such aditional taking or use, obtain any right that would avail against this reserved power of the court, or that could be set up in opposition to any order the court should make in the proper exercise of that power. It should, however, have made an express declaration to that effect, instead of providing it by implication arising from the reservation of power. The case, in this respect, falls within the doctrine stated in Burr v. Maclay R. W. Co., as aforesaid.

The rights of the Riverside Water Company to the natural flow of Warm creek are not fully protected by these provisions. The findings show that it has rights relating to the waters of said creek of two sorts, both of which are perhaps prior and paramount to the rights of the other parties hereto to take water from said basin for public use. The first is the right to take the entire natural flow of the creek. The second arises from the depletion of the natural flow by the taking of water from the basin by the other parties hereto and others, subsequent to the inception of its own right in the stream, and is the right to take, by means of wells bored in the basin, enough water to augment the depleted natural flow, so as to produce in its canal a total flow of 2,710 inches during specified months. These rights should be declared to be paramount to the rights of the other parties hereto if the findings justify that conclusion. The judgment erroneously assumes, apparently, as matter of law, that the respective rights of the parties to take water for public use are coequal. See on this point, post, subd. 7. While the surplus continues, the condition of the respective parties as to their right to take water from the basin or public use is substantially the same as that of several appropriators from a surface stream having more than enough water for all. No injunction should issue against the taking of water while the supply is ample for all. But the respective priorities of each water right should be adjudged, so that, if in the future the supply falls below the quantity necessary for all, he who has the prior right may have his preferred right protected.

We are of the opinion that the aforesaid definition of the word "surplus" prescribes an impractical and unworkable plan for the determination of the question, whether there is or is not a surplus. The court must first ascertain "the average annual feed" to the basin from water "rightfully and properly" reaching it and "replenishing" it, for any year or period of years. This obviously refers to the "average annual" rainfall on the watershed, and to the part thereof which reaches and replenishes the basin. The findings show the difficulties attending this inquiry. The annual rainfall has varied from 37.51 inches in 1883–84 to 7.49 inches in 1898–99. The average annual rainfall at San Bernardino from July 1, 1871, to July 1, 1916, was 16.2 inches per year. From 1893–94 to 1899–1900, the yearly average was only 11.09 inches. The water which sinks into the débris cones and percolates underground toward the outlet moves at the rate of only 2 miles in a year, and it is several years before it reaches the points where Warm creek rises, and where the wells of the parties are located. Hence neither the rain of a wet year nor the decrease in a dry year becomes manifest in the water level at Warm creek and at the wells in question for several years afterward.

There are no practical means of ascertaining the total annual rainfall on the watershed. No records are kept, except in San Bernardino and a few other places. We may judicially take knowledge that the amount varies greatly in different parts of the watershed; that in the high mountains it will usually greatly exceed the fall in the basin; that cloudbursts may occur in one of the canyons when there is a mere sprinkle in other parts of the range, and that, even in a general storm, the rain may be heavy at one place and light in others without any cause except the course of the winds, the conformation of the mountains, and the like, and that a slight change in the direction of the wind will materially affect the rainfall in the different places affected. During the period from 1881 to 1916, the rainfall at San Bernardino was 16.41 inches, and that at Riverside 11.02 inches. The two cities are about 20 miles apart, on the same general plateau, and with about one hundred feet difference in elevation. To ascertain with even approximate accuracy the rainfall on the entire watershed for any year a large number of additional daily records must be kept, and great expense must be incurred therefor.

The actual increase to the waters of the basin in any one year cannot be measured by the rainfall for that year. During a heavy general rain a large proportion of the precipitation flows down from the canyons in the channels of the surface streams and through the outlet of the basin without ever sinking below the surface. It is impossible to measure these flood waters. Such a flood may constitute the major portion of the seasonal rainfall. In another season the rains may come more regularly and evenly, but in the same quantity, so that a very large portion of it sinks into the basin, and none runs off. In the drier seasons the rain may practically all evaporate, and none of the waters thereof reach the basin. The amount of such evaporation cannot be measured. It will vary from time to time, according to the humidity or aridity of the atmosphere, and the amount of sunshine.

From these facts, all of which appear in the findings, it is apparent that the first factor in the computation of the surplus, the amount of water rightfully and properly reaching the basin, cannot be ascertained.

The other factor, the "artificial rightful drafts" upon the basin, could not in any event be computed or ascertained without extraordinary expense. The average amounts taken by the three parties to this action are ascertained and stated in the findings. But these comprise much less than half of the drafts that may be "rightful." Other companies and persons take and carry away to outside lands about 6,000 inches. In addition to this exportation, between 2,000 and 3,000 wells are operated by owners of land in the basin to obtain water for use upon their respective tracts of land. None of these exporters and users is a party to this action. The amount thus taken for overlying lands would naturally vary greatly from day to day and from time to time. There is no means of compelling the persons concerned to keep accounts of the quantities taken. The parties to this action have no right to enter the premises of such users to measure the water taken. The ascertainment of the amounts taken in any one year, or at all, is, therefore, practically impossible for either party.

If such deficiency were actually ascertained, and an order were made apportioning to each party its proper reduction on account thereof, it would not prevent the exhaustion of the water in the basin. The order would bind no one except the three parties to this action. Other persons are taking from the basin, presumably by right, a much larger quantity of water than is taken by the parties. The order would have no effect upon any of them. If their needs were greater, as would be probable in a dry year, they would naturally take more than before, and it is certain they would take no less. Thus the exploitation of the water of the basin would proceed, and its exhaustion would ensue, from the excessive use by other persons, while the respective parties would be restrained by this order. If such exploitation continued for 5 years uninterruptedly under claim of right, with the knowledge of the parties hereto and to their injury, such adverse use would ripen into a right to do so perpetually as against these parties. Civ. Code, § 1007; Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 135, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35; Burr v. Maclay, etc., Co., 254 Cal. 436, 98 Pac. 260; Barton v. Riverside W. Co., 155 Cal. 518, 101 Pac. 790, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331. Thus it appears not only that such an order would be practically ineffective, but also that it would endanger the rights of all the parties.

5. In addition to the above-stated rights adjudged in favor of San Bernardino, the judgment declares (clause 8) that said city is entitled to take perpetually from the basin by means of wells, for municipal uses and for the use of its inhabitants, quantities of water which, together with the quantity it obtains from Lytle creek, will be sufficient to supply to each inhabitant an average of 200 gallons daily, and also to irrigate crops and trees grown on privately owned lands within the city at the rate of 1 inch to every 4.5 acres in citrus fruits; 1 inch to every 2.66 acres in alfalfa and garden crops; 1 inch to every 10 acres in grain; and 1 inch to every 6 acres in deciduous fruits, all to be measured at the point of delivery on the land.

This provision is objectionable, on the ground that it is uncertain in regard to the quantity of water to which the right is given thereby; that it "fails to attain the certainty necessary to an estoppel" upon a part of "the subject of the litigation." Riverside W. Co. v. Sargent, 112 Cal. 233, 44 Pac. 560. In that case the judgment of the lower court was that the defendant had the right to take water by a certain dam and ditch "to the extent of the full capacity of said ditch." This, it was said, was too uncertain, because of the fact that the carrying capacity of the ditch, its size, and grade, was not shown by the record. In the present case the findings show the present population of San Bernardino, but there are no data from which to ascertain the number of acres of land therein grown in the specified crops from time to time. The population is expected to increase, and the area of such land will fluctuate materially from year to year. The object of the provision evidently was to provide for more water in the future, as the need increased. It is impossible, for these reasons, to ascertain from anything in the findings or judgment the extent of such increase, and hence the amount of water the plaintiff may be entitled to under this clause cannot be determined.

There is no finding expressly to the effect that said city has ever acquired the right, as against the defendants, to take additional quantities of water from the artesian basin by means of wells, except such as it may have by reason of its being the owner of lands overlying the basin for use on such land, which, of course, does not include the right to take it for public use. The findings and judgment suggest that the theory of the court below was that the fact that the city iself was situated within the basin gave it the right to take water therefrom for any public use which, as a municipality, it has the power to administer. As this proposition is also involved in the consideration of the further right given by clause 9 of the judgment treated in the next following subdivision of this opinion, we will not further discuss it here.

[6] 6. The next objection of the defendants is to clause 9 of the judgment, declaring that the city of San Bernardino is entitled to take perpetually from the basin, if required for any reasonable beneficial use, as much water as said city, as an owner of land in the city overlying the basin, and all private owners of such land within the city, as such owners of overlying land, shall be entitled, in the aggregate, to take from the basin; such taking by the city, however, to be subject to the supervision of the court both as to the quantity taken and as to the uses to which it is to be applied.

In support of this clause, and also of clause 13 aforesaid, allowing water to be taken when a surplus exists without limit as to quantity, the plaintiff advances the theory that the underlying waters of this basin are by law subject to public use for the common benefit of the overlying lands and of the inhabitants of the basin, or have become so by the acts of the parties interested therein, that the part of the waters pertaining to the lands within the city is set apart by law for the common public use of the owners of the land and other persons in the city, that the city has in some manner become the administrator of this public or common use in place of the landowners, and has become substituted to their individual rights for the benefit of all, and that, in that character, it may at any time take from any part of the basin, whether the place of taking be inside or outside of the city, so much of the waters thereof as may then be necessary for such public use, not exceeding the aggregate quantity originally pertaining to the lands within the city. The court below, it is claimed, held to some theory of this nature, and framed these provisions in accordance therewith.

This theory is refuted by what we have already said. The ownership of the land, at common law, included all that lay within and under it. A grant of land by public authority to an individual without reservation carried with it title to all water lying therein, and vested in the grantee the absolute title to the water therein, as much so as to the earth and rocks and the trees growing thereon, subject only to the correlative rights of other landowners in such waters, under the maxim of the Civil Code that "one must so use his own rights as not to infringe upon the rights of another." Sec. 3514. The water was part of the land, and it was no more public property, or subject to public or common use, than was the land. This was true even under the Mexican law. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 331, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674. We mention this because the land within the city of San Bernardino is a part of a Mexican grant.

The water in all these lands, therefore, is private property, and will remain private property until it is taken from the owners of the land and devoted to public use. It does not appear that this has ever been done, except in so far as the taking of waters of the basin by the plaintiff and defendants, respectively, by means of wells bored in land outside of the city, has drawn from the waters underlying lands within the city. This may have happened, but none of the owners of the land, so far as appears, have ever conveyed or transferred to any of the parties the right to take such water in that or any other manner. So far as such right has been acquired from them by prescription, it extends only to the quantity heretofore taken, and does not include the taking of an additional quantity in the future, and the dedication to public use of that which has been taken has not been made by such landowners, but by the party who has taken the water from them.

Neither the city of San Bernardino, or either of the defendants, aside from their respective rights acquired by prescription and by the estoppel against interference with an established public use under tihe doctrine stated in Barton v. Riverside W. Co., 155 Cal. 515, 101 Pac. 790, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331, and Miller & Lux v. Enterprise, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 425, 147 Pac. 567, has ever taken any steps to acquire rights to take water from the basin except by acquiring tracts of land therein and boring wells in such land. The purchase of the land conferred no water right upon the buyer except the right to take water for use on the land itself. The lands acquired by San Bernardino for this purpose, and the only land in which it has bored wells for such water, all lie outside the city. Consequently the acquisition of the land conferred no title to the rights of the owners of overlying lands within the city to take water for use on their respective tracts of land therein. It is suggested that the fact that the city issued bonds to raise money with which to buy these outside lands, and install its works to take water therefrom for public use in the city, and that the electors of the city approved the bond issue by a two-thirds vote at an election held for that purpose, operated as a transfer to the city by each owner of land within the city of the right to take the water for public use which he was entitled, as such landowner, to take from the basin, and as an agreement that it might be taken from the basin by means of wells on any land outside the city. We can see no connection whatever between the act of voting and the result claimed for it. No landowner could vote away another's right. There is nothing to show how many, if any, or who, of the landowners voted. The proceedings for the election presented no such question to the voters for decision. It is evident that the proceedings and vote are utterly without significance.

Our conclusion is that the several water rights in the basin pertaining to the lands in the city as overlying lands are not by law, and have not become, in fact, subject to public use by the city, or a part of the water rights which it owns.

7. Plaintiff contends that the rights of each of the parties to take water from the basin by wells are equal. This contention is based on the fact found by the court that there always has been, and still is, sufficient water in the basin to supply the parties and all others who take said waters with all the water they have heretofore taken. From this it is argued that neither party has injured any of the others by the diversion and use of such waters, that there has been no invasion by either of any right to the use of the waters by the others, and hence, that the respective uses have not been adverse as to each other, and the statute of limitations did not begin to run so as to start the period of prescription. As authority for this proposition they quote from Anaheim, etc., Co. v. Semi-Tropic, etc., Co., 64 Cal. 192, 30 Pac. 626, the following passage:

"It is very clear that, while there was sufficient water flowing in the river to supply the wants and demands of all the parties, its use by one could not be an invasion of any right of any other; and as the court below found, as a fact, that, until within a year or two prior to the commencement of the action, there was sufficient water flowing in the river to supply the wants and demands of all the parties, it is plain that the plaintiffs as against the owners of the Santiago Rancho have acquired no right by prescription."

They also cite to the same point Alta, etc., Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. 645, 20 Am. St. Rep. 217, and Faulkner v. Rondoni, 104 Cal. 140, 37 Pac. 883. In the Anaheim Case both parties were exercising their rights to use the water of the river on riparian land. In such case the use by one is not adverse to the other unless he is using more than his share, to the detriment of the other. In the Alta Company Case the remarks on the subject are obiter. The point decided was that one who trespasses on land of another, and, while so doing, cultivates the land and irrigates it from a stream on which it abuts, does not thereby acquire any right to the water apart from the land, so that, when he is compelled to yield possession to the true owner, the prior use of the water by such trespasser does not give him a right thereto which he can convey to a third person.

In Faulkner v. Rondoni, the plaintiff had acquired his water right prior to any diversion of use of the water of the stream by the defendant. The defendant had, however, diverted and used the water continuously for a period of 5 years before the beginning of the action of plaintiff to quiet his title. There was enough water in the stream for both all the time, and the use by the defendant had not in any way interfered with the use by the plaintiff. The plaintiff's use was prior in time and, of course, it could not have been divested by a subsequent use which in no way affected his enjoyment thereof. The priority of the rights of either party in such cases could not become an important question until there was an interference by one of them with the use of the other. When that occurs the principle stated in section 1414 of the Civil Code, that "as between appropriators, the one first in time is the first in right," becomes applicable. It is a principle which applies as well to ordinary prescriptive rights as to rights of appropriation under the Code. Hill v. King, 8 Cal. 338; Butte Co. v. Vaughn, 11 Cal. 153, 154, 70 Am. Dec. 769; Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 33, 91 Am. Dec. 554.

[7] We understand the true rule to be that, when a conflict arises between two appropriators of water, and their rights are otherwise equal, the prior appropriator will prevail so far as the conflict extends. It necessarily follows that in an action to quiet his title the prior appropriator is entitled to have his prior right declared to be superior to that of subsequent appropriators.

We do not hold that the findings show that the diversions of water by the respective parties have not interfered with the diversion and use of water by the other parties. On the contrary, the facts found indicate that the several diversions have interfered with each other. We do not take up this question, but leave the extent and effect of the interferences from the facts found, as well as the question of priorities, for the consideration of the trial court when the case is remanded for further proceedings.

[8] 8. As above indicated, the judgment appears to declare that the water to be taken by the Riverside Water Company from its wells bored in the basin cannot be used except for the irrigation of the particular lands to which it has been heretofore supplied, and must not exceed the quantity necessary to irrigate the same according to the abovementioned schedule of quantities per acre for specified crops or trees thereon. It is at least susceptible of that construction. If so intended, it is to that extent contrary to law. It has long been settled in this state with regard to water rights by appropriation that the appropriator may change the place of use thereof, or the character of the use, without affecting his right to take it, and that other persons interested in the source from which it comes have no right to object to such changes. Maeris v. Bicknell, 7 Cal. 263, 68 Am. Dec. 257; Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 33, 91 Am. Dec. 554; Ramelli v. Irish, 96 Cal. 217, 31 Pac. 41. It is also settled that such appropriator may change the place from whence the water is taken out of the source, provided others are not injured by such change. Ramelli v. Irish, supra; Barton v. Riverside W. Co., 155 Cal. 517, 101 Pac. 790, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331.

In Barton v. Riverside, this doctrine was applied to the waters of this artesian basin. The reasons for the right to make the above changes are that, by his taking and devoting water to a beneficial use, the appropriator has acquired the right to take the quantity which he beneficially uses, as against others having no superior rights in the source, and that neither the particular place of use, the character of the use, nor the place of taking is a necessary factor in such acquisition. The change of place of taking becomes wrongful only in the event that others are injured thereby. These reasons are as well applicable to the taking of underground waters of any kind as to diversions from a surface stream, and we perceive no reason why the same rule should not apply equally to both.

9. We think it sufficiently appears from what we have already said that, with respect to the taking of water from the basin for the public uses which they respectively serve, the status of each of the parties hereto is that of an appropriator only. For that purpose neither party obtains any right to additional water by reason of its ownership of land within the basin, for the water rights arising from such ownership pertain exclusively to the land, and are not devoted to public use by reason of such ownership. Whenever either party takes such water from the land and delivers it into its reservoirs, canals, or mains as a part of its water held for the public use, at that moment it becomes a mere appropriator of that water, and its rights thereto are no greater, as against the other parties, than would be the case if the water was taken out of land which it did not own.

As heretofore suggested, the court below was apparently of the opinion that the waters of this basin were by law subject to public use. Possibly in this connection it may have considered the legislative declaration on the subject in 1911, amending section 1410 of the Civil Code. The section, as amended, opens with this declaration:

"All water or the use of water within the state of California is the property of the people of the state of California."

Taken literally, this would include all water in the state privately owned, and that pertaining to lands of the United States, as well as that owned by the state. It should not require discussion or authority to demonstrate that the state cannot in this manner take private property for public use. See Palmer v. R. R. Com., 167 Cal. 175, 138 Pac. 997. The Constitution expressly forbids it. Article 1, § 14. The water that pertained to or was contained in the lands of the state was already the property of the people when this amendment was adopted. The statute was without effect on any other property.

10. We do not attempt to declare from the findings what the respective rights of the several parties are to the waters in the basin, nor what judgment should be given with regard thereto. The findings state the facts at great length, and give many details which are evidentiary in effect and which might reasonably warrant the drawing of varying inferences therefrom. They are more comparable to a bill of exceptions summarizing the evidence, as such bills should, than to findings of ultimate facts. The determination of the material and controlling facts from such a mass of evidentiary facts is more properly the work of a trial court than of an appellate court. Furthermore, our conclusions upon the points we have treated are in so many particulars opposed to the apparent views of the learned judge who made the findings and rendered the judgment that we are by no means certain that additional evidence may not be necessary for the intelligent decision of some of the questions involved in the case and presented by the facts found.

The briefs contain 1700 printed pages, and they discuss many minor points which we have not noticed. We do not consider them essential to any of the points we have decided, nor necessary for the guidance of the trial court in future proceedings. Our conclusions upon the more important questions may be summarized as follows:

[9] (a) With respect to the waters taken from the artesian basin for public use, each party stands in the character of an appropriator, and its rights therein are to be determined by the law relating to appropriators, and are not to be measured either by the law regarding riparian rights or by the law concerning the rights of the landowner in water underlying his land.

(b) In this action the court should not undertake to provide for the future apportionment of the waters of the artesian basin or for the ascertainment of a surplus or deficiency, but should confine itself to the adjudication of the existing rights and priorities of the parties to the action in the waters involved. The judgment should state the quantity of water to which each party is entitled, and should not leave such quantity indefinite or dependent on future needs, events, or conditions.

(c) The judgment should not make any declaration of the right of any party to take in the future any water to which it has no present right.

(d) The plaintiff is not substituted to nor entitled to use the water or water rights of the owners of land within its limits unless it has acquired such right directly or indirectly from such landowners, and then only for use on the particular land of such owner.

(e) The measure of a water right acquired by taking and using the water extends only to the quantity actually theretofore applied to beneficial uses, and includes no right to take additional water in the future.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to make new conclusions of law and render a new judgment on the findings, in accordance with this opinion, and, if necessary to do so, to take additional evidence relating to, and make an additional finding upon, any point involved in the case, or, if the parties agree thereto, to try the entire case anew. Neither party shall recover its costs of appeal herein.

In re THOMPSON'S ESTATE. (L. A. 6354.)

1. Wills ⟸293(6)—Person to whom copy of will was sent by testatrix cannot testify to contents.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1339, requiring the provisions of a lost or destroyed will to be proved by two credible witnesses where a testatrix sent a copy of her will to her sister stating that it was her last will, the sister could not testify to the contents of the will, but only to the hearsay declaration of the testatrix. (Per Wilbur and Lennon, JJ., and Angellotti, C. J.)

2. Wills ⟸297(3) — Declarations of decedent cannot take place of witness in proving lost or destroyed will.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1339, providing that no will shall be proved as a lost or destroyed will unless its provisions are clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, declarations of the decedent cannot take the place of one of the two witnesses. (Per Wilbur and Lennon, JJ., and Angellotti, C. J.)

3. Wills ⟸293(4) — Evidence of contents of revoked will admissible to show effect on earlier will though proved by only one witness.

Under Civ. Code, § 1297, providing that the revocation of a revoked will does not revive the earlier will unless such was the intention where a lost or destroyed will containing a revoking clause was revoked by cancellation or otherwise, evidence of its contents may be considered to determine its effect on an earlier will, though its contents are established by only one witness. (Per Wilbur and Lennon, JJ., and Angellotti, C. J.)

4. Wills ⟸306 — Evidence held to support finding that revoking will was in existence when testatrix died.

Evidence held sufficient to warrant a finding that a lost or destroyed will relied on as revoking an earlier will was still in existence at the time of the decedent's death. (Per Wilbur and Lennon, JJ., and Angellotti, C. J.)

5. Wills ⟸306—Contents of lost or destroyed will cannot be proved to establish revocation of earlier will except by two witnesses.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1339, relative to the proof of lost or destroyed wills, and notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 1297, providing that the revocation of a revoking will does not revive the first will, two witnesses are required to establish the contents of a lost or destroyed will which was unrevoked at the date of the testator's death for the purpose of showing revocation of an earlier will. (Per Wilbur and Lennon, JJ., and Angellotti, C. J.)

6. Wills ⟸470—To be construed as a whole.

A will should be construed as a whole, and the intention of the testator derived from the whole instrument, and not from a single clause thereof. (Per Wilbur and Lennon, JJ., and Angellotti, C. J.)

7. Wills ⟸290—That revoking clause was in lost will and effective must be proved.

For a revoking clause in a lost and unrevoked will to be effective as such, it must be established that such clause was in the will and thus an effective part of the will. (Per Wilbur and Lennon, JJ., and Angellotti, C. J.)

8. Wills ⟸181—Revoking clause is part of will.

The revoking clause of a will is a part of the will and is to be treated as such, and not as a separate instrument revoking the will executed under Civ. Code, § 1292. (Per Wilbur and Lennon, JJ., and Angellotti, C. J.)

9. Wills ⟸296, 312 — Proper to try validity of two alleged wills at the same time; evidence as to revoking clause in lost will admissible.

In probate proceedings it was a proper course to try the validity of two alleged wills, the latest of which had been lost or destroyed at the same time, and evidence as to the revoking clause in the lost will was admissible, but its effect on the earlier will must be determined in view of the admissibility of the latter will to probate as a will. (Per Wilbur and Lennon, JJ., and Angellotti, C. J.)

10. Wills ⟸180—Revoking clause in lost will held not effective unless will effective.

Conceding that the contents of a will containing a revoking clause, though lost or destroyed and not susceptible of proof as a will by a single witness, can be established so far as it revokes former wills by one competent witness, the whole contents and purpose of the instrument must be considered in determining its effect, and where the lost will was practically identical with the first and amounted to little more than a republication, the revoking clause must be regarded as intended to be effective only on condition that the will becomes effective. (Per Sloane, J.)

Olney, Shaw, and Lawler, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Proceeding to probate the will of Augusta Thompson. From a judgment admitting the last of two alleged wills to probate, the contestant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Rehearing denied; Shaw, Lawlor, and Olney, JJ., dissenting.

Jas. W. Bell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

L. G. Susemihl, of Santa Monica, and Samuel J. Crawford, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. Respondent, the sister of the deceased, filed a will dated May 13, 1908, for probate. The surviving husband, the appellant, filed a contest of this will on the ground that the will had been revoked by a later will executed November 25, 1916, which will he alleged had been destroyed without the intention of reviving the former will. Thereupon the sister filed a petition for the admission to probate of the will of 1916 as a lost or destroyed will. She also answered the contest of the will of 1908 by denying that the will of 1916 had been destroyed with the intention to revoke the same. Appellant filed no formal contest to the will of November 25, 1916, but he appeared at the time of the hearing, presented evidence, and claimed that the existence of the lost will was not established by two witnesses, and opposed its probate on that ground.

The will of 1916 appointed the respondent executrix without bonds and left all the property of the testatrix to the respondent except a bequest of $5 to the appellant, another $5 to a brother of testatrix, and one of $5 to a half-brother. The will also made certain provisions applicable only in the event that respondent predeceased her, which, because the sister survived the deceased, are immaterial. By the will of 1908 the respondent was made executrix thereof without bonds, and everything was given to the respondent except $1 bequeathed to the appellant.

At the time of the trial the respondent contended that the will of 1916 could not be proved because there were not two witnesses to prove its contents as required by section 1339, Code of Civil Procedure. Respondent offered proof of the due execution of the will of 1908, and thereupon rested. The court took the position that the second petition of respondent for the probate of the will of 1916 was in effect an amendment of the original petition for the probate of the will of 1908, and therefore announced that the will of 1908 could not be admitted to probate.

Respondent thereupon stated her position thus:

"We are claiming under the first will absolutely, if your honor please. It cannot prejudice the contestant's right for me to say that when we submitted the copy, so-called copy, of what we thought we might be able to establish in accordance with the law of a lost or destroyed will, that we believed that both witnesses to the second will were still alive, and that we could prove it under the statute that requires a lost or destroyed will to be proved by two credible witnesses. We filed that and made that similar statement to his honor Judge Rives on the hearing of this first will."

[1, 2] The court took the position that, if there was a later will, whether its terms could be proven or not, the first will was thereby revoked, and directed respondent to proceed with proof of the lost will. Respondent's counsel protested that they desired to rest with proof of the first will, and proceeded under protest to call B. G. Hurlburt, stating:

"There is only one witness we know of that could prove this will, and we will call that gentleman. That is the only witness we have any knowledge of."

This witness testified to the contents and the due execution of the will of 1916. The only other witness testifying to the contents of the will of 1916 was the respondent, who was examined on that subject by the court. To this testimony respondent's attorney objected as follows:

"I would like to object to her positive testimony that she received a copy on the ground that it is hearsay and not the best evidence."

The objection being overruled, the court elicited the testimony of the witness to the effect that respondent had received a letter at Portland, Or., in 1916, from the testatrix inclosing a copy of the will of 1916, and stating that it was her last will. The letter itself had been destroyed. The statement that the inclosed copy of a will was her last will was merely a declaration of the testatrix so that the question presented here resolves itself into this: Can a lost or destroyed will be proved by the testimony of one witness who saw the original will and by evidence of the declarations of the deceased as to its contents? The fact that the decedent accompanied her declaration by a carbon copy of the will did not place the recipient thereof in a position to testify of her own knowledge as to the contents of the lost or destroyed will, which she had never seen. Her testimony would merely establish the hearsay declaration of the deceased. In this state the statute (section 1339, Code Civ. Proc.) requires two credible witnesses, and the testimony of the declarations of the decedent cannot supply the place of one of these witnesses. This was held by the Supreme Court of the state of Washington, under a similar statute, in Estate of Needham, 70 Wash. 229, 126 Pac. 429, and, as we agree with that decision the order admitting the will of 1916 to probate must be reversed. The will of 1916 should have been denied probate.

[3] The next question to be considered is whether or not the evidence of one witness to the due execution of the will of 1916, and to its contents is sufficient to show a revocation of the will of 1908, and thus to show that the will of 1908 was not the last will of the decedent, and hence, as the will of 1916 cannot be effectively established by probate, that the decedent died intestate. If the will of 1916 had been revoked by cancellation or otherwise the evidence of one witness to the contents of the will of 1916 would be sufficient to establish that it contained a revoking clause; for section 1297, Civil Code, declares that the revocation of a revoking will does not revive the first will "unless it appears by the terms of such revocation that it was the intention to revive and give effect to the first will." No doubt can be entertained that, where the second testamentary act is revoked, evidence of the contents of the revoked will may be considered to determine the effect of such revocation upon an earlier will still in existence.

This is not a case where a will containing a revoking clause has been destroyed animo revocandi.

[4] The trial court found that the will of 1916 was in existence at the time of the death of the testatrix and was her last will. The finding is attacked by the appellant as not supported by the evidence. This finding is sustained solely by the declaration of the deceased and by the circumstances in the case. But the evidence is sufficient. This evidence is as follows: During her last illness the testatrix frequently stated to her nurse that she had left a will and that her papers were with her attorney, B. G. Hurlburt, and confirmed this statement only a few hours before her death on December 8, 1918. She further stated she desired her sister to have everything and did not desire her husband to have anything. The respondent testified that repeatedly between the date of the execution of the will up to July, 1918, the testatrix wrote to her stating that she wanted respondent to have everything and repeatedly referred to the will as still in existence.

As we have held in the Estate of Sweetman, 195 Pac. 918, decided February, 1921, the declarations of the deceased in connection with the other testimony were sufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court that the will was in existence at the time of decedent's death.

[5] The appellant, while contending that the evidence is insufficient to probate the will of 1916 as the last will and testament of the deceased, a contention which we have sustained, also contends that the proof of one witness that it contained a revoking clause is sufficient to establish the revocation of the will of 1908 by the will of 1916, although the latter cannot be probated as her will, and thus, by the failure to prove the will of 1916 as a will, and by its proof as an effective revocation of the will of 1908, to establish her intestacy. This position requires us to construe the law as to the proof of lost and destroyed wills and to determine what is meant by this phrase in section 1339, Code of Civil Procedure:

"No will shall be proved as a lost or destroyed will * * * unless its provisions are clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses." (Italics ours.)

To state the proposition in somewhat different terms: Can a part of a lost or destroyed will be proved by one witness, i. e., the revoking clause, when the statute expressly forbids proving a lost or destroyed will by less than two credible witnesses? Or, to state the matter in terms more directly applicable to this case: Can the revoking clause of an unrevoked, lost, or destroyed will be proved by one witness and given effect, when the statute (section 1339, Code Civ. Proc.) requires two witnesses to prove such a will? This question would seem to carry its own answer because of the axiom that the whole is the sum of its parts, unless the revoking clause in a will is in legal effect a thing apart from the will, as distinct as, and equivalent in legal effect to, a revocation by destruction, by cancellation or by an instrument executed with the formalities of a will (Civ. Code, § 1292), which, no doubt, operates eo instanti.

[6] Passing for the moment the construction of section 1297, Civil Code, as to the effect of the revocation of a will containing a revoking clause, a point to which we will recur, it is a violation of the most fundamental principle for the construction of a will to separate one clause from its context and give effect thereto regardless of the balance of the will. It is elementary that a will should be construed as a whole, and that the intention of the testator is to be derived from the whole instrument, and not from a single clause thereof.

In dealing with a revoking clause of a revoked will, we are dealing with a clause which has itself been revoked except as saved by the express statute on that particular subject (section 1297, Civ. Code), but in dealing with the revoking clause of an unrevoked will it has force because it is unrevoked, and a part of the last will of the deceased.

We will examine some of the authorities dealing with the subject of the revoking clause in a will with special reference to its provability, but before doing so it is well to remember that frequently the revoking clause of a will is the only clause capable of proof because it is the only portion clearly recollected by witnesses, and that some of the cases deal with such a situation. It is well to remember also that at common law and in most states there is no arbitrary rule with reference to the measure of proof required to establish a lost will, and hence the measure of proof for a revoking clause of such a will would be the same whether offered for probate or to defeat a prior will, while the contention here is that the will of 1916 is sufficiently proved for the latter, but not for the former, purpose. It is evident that general statements in opinions dealing with the subject, or even rules laid down with reference to the effect of a revoking clause, ought not to be considered determinative of the matter under our peculiar statute where an arbitrary rule exists with reference to lost and destroyed wills.

[7] In order that the revoking clause in this lost and unrevoked will should be effective as such, it was necessary to establish that such clause was in her last will, and thus an effective part of her last will. A will is usually "proved" by being offered for probate.

Can its terms be "proved" otherwise? As was said in the Estate of Patterson, 155 Cal. 626, 636, 102 Pac. 941, 944, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 654, 132 Am. St. Rep. 116, 18 Ann. Cas. 625:

"It has been held by this court that a will cannot be given in evidence as the foundation of a right or title, unless it has been duly probated. McDaniel v. Pattison, 98 Cal. 86, 27 Pac. 651, 32 Pac. 805; Castro v. Richardson, 18 Cal. 480."

In that case the court was discussing the result of the destruction of a last will and testament without the intention of revoking the same, and was considering the effect of the amendment of 1907 to section 1339, Code of Civil Procedure (Stats. 1907, p. 122), passed after the death of the testatrix. It was held that the will could be probated. In that connection it is said:

"Because of its destruction in her lifetime the probate court, under the law as it existed at her death, could not allow it to be probated, because there could be no legal proof of it. * * * If a will had been duly executed and had not been destroyed, but was filed for probate, and could not be probated because of lack of proof of its execution, the heirs would take the estate, and it would be deemed to vest in them at the death of the testatrix, although the right thereto could not be positively known until it was demonstrated by the failure of proof upon the trial of the petition for probate. The statute provides what evidence may be taken in proof of a will upon such a proceeding."

Where a will has been refused probate because of undue influence, the revoking clause cannot be subsequently proved to show revocation of a prior will. Schouler on Wills (5th Ed.) §§ 418, 419; Laughton v. Atkins, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 535; Rudy v. Ulrich, 69 Pa. 177, 8 Am. Rep. 238; Lyon v. Dada, 127 Mich. 395, 86 N. W. 946. This is true even if it is shown in the latter case that the revoking clause was not obtained by undue influence, as the decision rejecting it for probate is conclusive between the parties. The effect of these decisions is that, where a will has been denied probate and the same parties are subsequently litigating the validity of a prior will, the validity of the revoking clause cannot again be relitigated. Applied to the facts of this case, these decisions would lead to the conclusion that, where a will had been offered for probate as a lost or destroyed will and had been denied probate, because of failure of proof, the adjudication between the parties as to the provability of the will and the validity of the revoking clause cannot subsequently be reopened in a case in which the revoking clause alone is put forward for the purpose of showing that a previous will has been revoked. If it is true that the denial of probate of the second will because of the lack of proof by two credible witnesses forecloses the question as to the provability of the revoking clause for the purpose of opposition to the probate of the first will, then it would seem to follow that the will of 1908 in this case, having been duly proven, should be probated notwithstanding the fact that it has been shown by one witness that there was a revoking clause in the will of 1916, where, as here, the appropriate order is one denying the probate of the will of 1916 for lack of proof. We do not cite these decisions as decisive of the question here involved, but they point to the conclusion indicated.

[8] These cases at least make it clear that the revoking clause of a will is a part of the will, and is to be treated as such, and not as a separate instrument having the equivalent effect of an instrument executed with all the formalities required in the case of a will. Section 1292, Civ. Code. This will be made clearer by excerpts from the above opinions. In the case of Laughton v. Atkins, supra, it is said:

"When the question was first proposed, it struck us all as novel and singular that an instrument once offered to be proved as a will, and disallowed as such by the court of final jurisdiction upon the subject, should be imagined to be capable of being used afterwards for any purpose whatever, the effect of such a decree seeming to be to render the instrument entirely null and void; but the arguments we have heard and the authorities cited have satisfied us that the case was not so clear as we at first believed it, though upon a thorough examination of the arguments and authorities we are convinced our first impression was well founded. * * *"

After quoting the statutory law of Massachusetts, the court proceeded as follows:

"An instrument, then, to have the effect of a revocation of a will which devises real estate before made, must be in itself either a will or codicil, or some other writing of the devisor, signed in the presence of three or more witnesses. If the instrument propounded as a revocation be in form a will, it must be perfect as such, and be subscribed and attested as is required by the statute. An instrument intended to be a will, but failing of its effect as such on account of some imperfection in its structure or for want of due execution, cannot be set up for the purpose of revoking a former will, for this substantial reason, that it cannot be known that the testator intended to revoke his will except for the purpose of substituting the other, and that it would be making the testator die without a will, though it was clearly his design not to do so. This principle has been settled by many decisions in the English courts of law and equity; their statute of frauds in relation to this subject being similar to ours. * * *

"It is true the instrument is perfect in all its parts, and is accompanied with all the formalities prescribed by the statute; but it comes before us connected with a decree declaring that it is null and void in itself, so that it never had any legal force or being as a will. How, then, can it be treated as such for the important purpose of revoking a former will? If the principle deduced from the cases cited is true, that all we can see of a design to revoke is indicative of a purpose to substitute this for the one revoked, then to give effect to the revocation, and to deny any effect to the dispositions of the will, would be to thwart the intentions of the testatrix. How can we know from the will itself that she would not have preferred that the first will should stand, rather than that the heirs at law should enjoy the estate? It is obvious she meant no good to them in either of the wills."

The Pennsylvania case above cited (Rudy v. Ulrich, supra) also emphasizes the injustice of giving effect to the revoking clause of a will when the balance of the will has been denied probate, and distinguishes, in that respect, a will containing an express revocation from an instrument of revocation, executed with the formalities of a will. The statute of Pennsylvania on the subject of revocation is similar to our own. Section 1292, Civ. Code. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in that case states its reasons for its conclusion that the revoking clause cannot be given effect separate from the will containing it, in part as follows:

"Act Assembly April 8, 1833, §§ 13, 14 (Pamph. L. 250), provides in effect that no will in writing shall be repealed otherwise than by some other will or codicil in writing, or by other writing declaring such repeal, executed and proved in the same manner as is provided in the case of an original will. There are two modes of revocation here pointed out, besides cancellation, obliteration, etc.: First, another subsequent will or codicil duly executed and proved; and, second, some other writing declaring the revocation. It is implied that this other writing is not a will; that is, an act of disposition or declaration of what a man intends as to his property after his death. There may be a separate written revocation, not intended to take effect as a will or codicil, which need not therefore be propounded to the register for probate. This is a very reasonable provision. A man may be absent from home at a distance from the place where his will is deposited, or it may be lost or mislaid, so that he cannot have access to it to cancel or destroy it. He may wish, however, simply to abrogate it without making another will, and so die intestate. In such case he may execute a paper declaring his intention, which, provided it is signed by him and proved by two witnesses, will be effectual. No probate of it in the register's office is necessary. No letters testamentary or of administration cum testamento annexo are required to be issued upon it. But the case is different when the revocation is contained in what purports to be a will disposing of property. The words of the act point to this: 'other writing,' that is, writing other than a will. A subsequent will without a revoking clause as effectually repeals a prior will as with one. No doubt, as stated by the learned judge below, a will may be void in part and otherwise valid, or it may be wholly invalid. One bequest or devise may be good, whilst other parts may be avoided. But then it stands as a will for those parts which are good. [Italics ours.] * * * If good as a will at all by the act of 1833, it revoked the former will. This is the technical difficulty. The substantial one is still more serious. It cannot be known with any degree of assurance, sufficient to justify a legal judgment, that where there is a clause of revocation in a will making a certain disposition of property, that the testator really intended to revoke a prior will making a different disposition, except for the purpose of substituting in place thereof that contained in the second will. It would be making the testator die without any will at all, when it was clearly his intention, as drawn from his executing a paper purporting to be a will, not to do so. * * * We know, however, that express clauses of revocation are inserted in most wills as a mere matter of form, the mere expression of which is inherently implied, as are many other parts, such as the direction that all just debts and funeral expenses shall be first paid and discharged. As evincing an intention on the part of John Yerkes to die intestate unless the will of 1869 went into effect, that paper, executed as it has been found under undue influence, the very act of execution not the free exercise of his own volition, was no ground upon which any legal judgment could be rested. The parol evidence of what took place at the time of the execution of the paper of 1869 did not help the case of the defendants. It had no tendency to show that unless that paper stood he wished only his lawful issue to have his property, according to the intestate laws, leaving his unfortunate illegitimate child wholly unprovided for. All that he said was that he wanted to make another will. If the execution of that paper was induced by the undue influence of Catherine Rudy, there is some difficulty in comprehending why this declaration made in her presence, and with the same view, is not within the same objection. There was no evidence to submit to the jury, either in the paper itself or any declaration made by him at the time, that John Yerkes had any other object in revoking the will of 1865 than to substitute the disposition made by the will of 1869 for it. He had no intention to die intestate, but the contrary. The case of Barksdale v. Hopkins, 23 Georgia, 332, relied on by the counsel for the defendants, is not to the point, and does not sustain his contention. It holds merely that, if a will is before a probate court for probate, and a second will is pleaded as a revocation of the first, the probate court may take notice of the second, although it may be that the second is one which has not been admitted to probate, and one which is not offering itself for probate; consequently the probate court may hear proof touching the execution of the second. That is a proposition, it seems, too clear to be doubted, but it has no application to the present case."

In Stickney v. Hammond, 138 Mass. 116, a testator had left two instruments of different dates, each purporting to be his last will and each containing a clause expressly revoking all wills theretofore made. The two instruments were alike, except that the later one contained a clause exempting the executor from giving sureties on his probate bond. The first will was dated June 14, 1877, and the second September 8, 1877. The first will was offered for probate, and the second will was offered in evidence for the purpose of showing its revocation. The September will had been finally refused probate because of the neglect of the parties interested therein to defend an appeal taken from the order probating the will. It was conceded that the September will could not be proved as a will because of such neglect and consequent denial of probate. The main distinction between the Massachusetts case and the case at bar is that in the Massachusetts case the parties interested in the second will failed to prove its contents, and in the case at bar the statute expressly prohibits the effective establishment of the contents of the second will. In dealing with this question the court made the following statement:

"It has heretofore been held that an instrument purporting to be a will, with a clause of revocation of former wills, cannot be offered in evidence as a revocation only, without a probate thereof. [Italics ours.] Reid v. Borland, 14 Mass. 208; Laughton v. Atkins, 1 Pick. 535; Wallis v. Wallis, 114 Mass. 510. And for this substantial reason, that it must be inferred that the testator intended to revoke former wills for the purpose of giving effect to the new disposition of his property which he had substituted for that in his former wills, and if, for want of proper execution of the subsequent will, its defective construction, or other sufficient cause, proper effect cannot be given to it, we are not to suppose that he designed to die intestate.

"We can find nothing to distinguish the case at bar from those heretofore decided, and the ground upon which they rest appears to us satisfactory. Indeed, the facts as they here appear illustrate the soundness of the rule. The testator had purported only to add a codicil to his will made in June, 1877, and then in existence, exempting the executrix therein named from giving sureties on her bond. The scrivener to whom he applied for this purpose preferred to write out a new will, making the change suggested, and no other. He accordingly did so, and it was executed by the testator on September 17, 1877. The testator manifestly had no intention to revoke the will of June, 1877, except as he at the same time substituted therefor the instrument of later date, which differed from it only in a purely secondary matter. [Italics ours.]

The distinction between an instrument of revocation and an express revocation in a will pointed out in the case last cited is thus stated in Redfield on the Law of Wills, p. 328:

"It is not important that a revoking will should make any disposition of the property bequeathed in the former will. It has been held in some of the American courts that a subsequent will containing a clause of revocation, executed with due solemnity for the purpose of revoking an existing will, operates proprio vigore and instantaneously as a revocation, and consequently that the destruction of the second will did not revive the former one. This doctrine has an air of plausibility from the fact that an instrument of revocation alone would unquestionably have this effect, so long as it was allowed to remain operative. But that would show a present purpose of becoming intestate, carried into effect as far as practicable before death. But the making of a will with a revocatory clause is very different. It is but substituting one will for another. And the revocatory clause is made dependent, in some sense, upon the subsequent will going into operation. And there is, ordinarily, no purpose of having the revocatory clause operate, except upon that condition. The whole instrument is therefore ambulatory, and, when destroyed, it all ceases to have any operation. And the same is true of the destruction of a will merely revocatory of former wills. By such destruction the former wills, if in existence, become revived."

It is true that the author is contending for the rule enforced in the common-law courts of England, rather than that enforced in its ecclesiastical courts, a matter still undecided in many common-law states at the time Redfield wrote his treatise, but the contention of the author is worthy of consideration in determining the proper construction of our statute, requiring two witnesses to prove a lost will, notwithstanding section 1297, Civil Code, more nearly conforms to the rule of the ecclesiastical courts, a matter that will be discussed later.

To recur to the question under discussion: The question is, as to the measure of proof of a lost document: What did the Legislature mean when it enacted that a lost or destroyed will could not be proved except where two witnesses testified to its contents? The question is: Did the Legislature by that enactment intend that a part of the will could be enforced without being proved, and therefore without having two witnesses to establish its contents? It seems clear that the Legislature had no intention of authorizing a part of a will to be established by one witness when it declared that two were essential to "prove" the will, where the whole will is provable by one witness as definitely as the part is proved. When the second will is considered in this case, it is considered for the purpose of defeating the probate of another will, and thus to establish a right, namely, the right of an heir to succeed to the property, and for this purpose probate is usually required.

[9] The proper course under our practice was to try the matter of the validity of the two wills at the same time. We do not consider that the evidence as to the revoking clause was inadmissible on such hearing. The reasons given in Rudy v. Ulrich, supra, would seem conclusive as to its admissibility upon such a cross contest, but the effect of the evidence when admitted upon the will must be determined in view of its admissibility to probate, as a will. That it has no validity separate and apart from the will of which it is a part seems clear from the foregoing decisions; consequently we think the trend of our decisions as well as of those above cited is that the effect of the will is entirely dependent upon its provability in probate, and that the usual and proper course is to first probate a will before it can be considered as effective, and, if not so first probated, that the same measure of proof should be required as upon probate.

If the revoking clause of a will stands upon the same basis as the balance of the will, there could scarcely be room for doubt as to the foregoing proposition, but it is insisted that section 1297, Civil Code, declaring the result of the revocation of a revoking will, in effect provides that the revoking clause operates instantly upon execution of the will containing it, and that for that reason its existence can be proved by any competent evidence, thereby establishing the fact that the prior will was revoked as of the date of the revoking will. This view finds support in the department opinion in Re Lones, 108 Cal. 688, 690, 41 Pac. 771, 772, where it is said:

"The mere execution of a subsequent revocatory will ends the first will, and such will is not revived by the revocation of the last will unless it is revived by the terms of such revocation. What sort of a revocation it must be which can by its terms revive a prior will is shown by the first subdivision of section 1292 of the Civil Code."

As the view expressed in Re Lones, supra, is entertained by three of my Associates, it is evident that the matter is worthy of serious consideration, and to that point we will now direct our attention.

The point decided in Re Lones was that the prior will was not revived under the circumstances of that case where the parties relied upon circumstances to show an intent to revive the previous will. The point is decided in these words:

"By no act or manifestation of intent, in writing or otherwise, not executed with the formalities with which a will should be executed, would the will of 1856 have been revived upon the cancellation of the will of 1885."

The reference to subdivision 1 of section 1292 in the quotation above also shows the same conclusion. That subdivision is as follows (section 1292):

"Except in the cases in this chapter mentioned, no written will, nor any part thereof, can be revoked or altered otherwise than:

The statement of the court that the will operates instantly to revoke the prior will is obiter dicta, although true in legal effect in every case except in the case of a lost or destroyed will. In other words, if the will remains effective and is probated, the former will is revoked thereby. On the other hand, if the will is revoked, the revoking clause is still effective. Hence it is not altogether inaccurate to say that the revoking clause operates eo instanti under section 1297, Civil Code.

A consideration of section 1297, Civil Code, requires some attention to the history of that legislation, and this involves the development of the English law. In the ecclesiastical courts it was held that the destruction of the revoking will animo revocandi did not re-establish the first will unless such was the intention of the testator, while the courts of common law held that the revocation of the latter will of itself revived the prior will. See discussion in Schouler on Wills (5th Ed.) § 413; also full discussion in Pickens v. Davis, 134 Mass. 252, 45 Am. Rep. 322; Randall v. Beatty, 31 N. J. Eq. 643; Blackett v. Ziegler, 153 Iowa, 344, 133 N. W. 901, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 115, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 291. Jarman in his work on Wills (English edition) states that up to the time of the enactment of the statute of wills the effect of the revocation of the revoking will was to re-establish the will revoked. 1 Jarman on Wills, 192. In England this rule was changed by section 22 of the statutes of wills, enacted in 1837. 1 Jarman on Wills, 192; Schouler on Wills (5th Ed.) § 413; Pickens v. Davis, supra. That section is as follows:

"Sec. 22. And be it further enacted that no will or codicil, or any part thereof, which shall be in any manner revoked, shall be revived otherwise than by the re-execution thereof, or by a codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, and showing an intention to revive the same; and when any will or codicil which shall be partly revoked, and afterwards wholly revoked, shall be revived, such revival shall not extend to so much thereof as shall have been revoked before the revocation of the whole thereof, unless an intention to the contrary shall be shown." St. 7, Wm. IV & 1 Vict. c. 26, § 22, quoted in full in Schouler on Wills, supra.

Similar laws have been enacted in New York, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, Kentucky, California, Arkansas, Virginia. Pickens v. Davis, supra; Am. Stat. Law, Stimson, §§ 2673, 2679, p. 360.

The Legislature of this state in 1850 enacted that the common law of England should control in all matters where not repugnant to our statute law and constitutional law. Stats. 1850, p. 219. Therefore, in the absence of any statutory provision in regard to the effect of the revocation of a revoking will, we would be involved in the same confusion that existed in the English courts, prior to the statute of wills, and the additional difficulty arising from the fact that no such distinctions as that between the ecclesiastical and common-law courts of England existed in this state. This confused state of the English law was carried into some of our states, and was duly settled in Iowa as late as 1911, where that court adopted the view of the ecclesiastical courts of England, and held that the effect of the revocation of a subsequent will containing a revoking clause was a question of the intent of the testator "to be gathered from admissible parol testimony." The question was also an open one in Massachusetts until 1883, when it was settled in Pickens v. Davis by adopting the rule in the English ecclesiastical courts. Pickens v. Davis, 134 Mass. 252, 253, 256, 45 Am. Rep. 322. See, also Aldrich v. Aldrich, 215 Mass. 164, 102 N. E. 487, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 906.

It was therefore expedient that the same Legislature that adopted the common law of England as a basis of our jurisprudence in enacting our statute of wills should enact a provision similar to the English statute of wills. Section 22, supra. This was done by section 11 of the act of 1850 (Stats. 1850, p. 178), since codified as section 1297, Civil Code. It is thus apparent that the reason for enacting section 1297, Civil Code, was to settle a question which was in doubt at the common law and which had been settled in England by the statute of wills in 1837. The purpose of this legislation was to determine the effect of a revocation of a revoking will. The statute does not in terms provide that the revoking clause of a will is different from the balance of a will in that it operates eo instanti. Of course, it could be held as a matter of construction that the effect of this legislation was to make the revoking clause operative at once. This, however, is entirely a matter of construction of the statute and is of no importance where no question as to the method of proving the revoking clause is involved, as already pointed out.

It should be observed, however, that the question of the method of establishing the fact that the second will contained a revoking clause is not involved in this legislation or in the decisions rendered under the common law, for the reason that both under the statute of wills and under the common law the contents of a lost or destroyed will could be proved in the same manner that any fact could be proved, and therefore no question could arise as to whether or not a revoking clause could be proved and given effect as such when the balance of the will could not be proved because of a statutory rule declaring that two witnesses are essential to the probate of a lost or destroyed will. However, the tendency of the English courts was to hold that the whole will must be proved; otherwise the part proven could not be given effect. That rule has been followed by some of the American courts, but the general rule is to the contrary, at least so it was stated in Thornton on Lost Wills, §§ 110, 111. Estate of Patterson, 155 Cal. 626, 102 Pac. 941, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 654, 132 Am. St. Rep. 116, 18 Ann. Cas. 625, supra.

The question we have to consider in the case at bar is the effect of a statute passed after the statute of wills and first enacted in 1851, providing that a lost will could not be established except by the testimony of two credible witnesses (Stats. 1851, p. 452, § 38) and the codification of that statute enacted in 1872 (Code Civ. Proc. § 1339).

Is it unreasonable in this condition of the law to say that, when the Legislature declared the will could not be proved except upon the testimony of two witnesses, the rule applied to every part of the will, when it is sought to make the same operative?

Granting for the moment that the revoking clause operates instantaneously to revoke the previous will, the question still remains: How are we going to establish that the will contained such a clause, by one or by two witnesses? So far as we have discovered, there is no case arising under a statute similar to ours, holding that, where the question of revocation is in dispute, the revoking clause of an unrevoked, lost, or destroyed will can be proved by less than two witnesses.

The statute in relation to the proof of a lost or destroyed will (section 1339, Code Civ. Proc.) should be construed with reference to its purpose and object. The purpose of requiring the proof of such a will by two witnesses is to prevent the fraudulent proof of a purported, but really nonexistent, will by the testimony of only one witness, on the theory that there is less likelihood of two witnesses committing perjury than one. But this policy applies with almost equal force to the revoking clause, which, if established, will as effectively defeat the intention of the testator as would a fraudulent will. To say that you can establish one part of a will for any purpose by evidence which is incompetent to establish the balance of the will works a manifest departure from the intention of the deceased in every instance where the question arises. This is shown by the case at bar. If we examine the whole of the subsequent will, it is manifest that the testatrix never intended to revoke the first will. What she really intended to do was to make a few slight changes therein, and yet, if we act under the rule contended for by the appellant, we must necessarily hold that the property of the decedent goes to her husband, in violation of her will twice expressed with all the formality provided by law.

Question at issue here not involved in English cases:

As already stated, at common law or under the English statute of wills the question involved here as to the amount of proof required to establish the revoking clause of a lost and unrevoked will could not arise. The text-books on English probate law make this plain. In Theobald on Wills, pp. 51, 52, it is stated that the contents of a lost will may be established by secondary evidence, including the declarations of the deceased. The contents of such will may be established by a single witness, and, "where it is impossible to ascertain the whole contents of the will, effect will be given to such portions as can be ascertained, if the court is satisfied that they substantially represent the intention of the testator." That author also states the rule with reference to a lost will as follows:

"A subsequent will is no revocation of a former one if the contents of the later will are unknown, or if, though it is known that the later will differed from the former one, it is unknown in what respect it differed"—citing cases; Theobald on Wills, p. 45.

In Powles & Oakley on Probate, another English text-book (page 120), it is said:

"The contents of a lost will may be proved by a single witness, even though interested, whose veracity and competency are unimpeached. When the contents of a lost will are not completely proved, probate will be granted to the extent to which they are proved."

From the foregoing it is clear that the decisions of the English courts prior to the statute of wills are not authority upon the point involved here, and that the decisions subsequent to that statute cannot involve the question as to the proper measure of proof.

Effect of section 1297, Civil Code:

We conclude that it was foreign to the scope and purpose of section 1297, Civil Code, supra, to determine the effect of an unrevoked revoking clause of a will, and that whatever inferences are to be drawn therefrom with reference to the nonambulatory character of the revoking clause cannot overcome the more direct declarations of section 1339, Code of Civil Procedure, supra, as to the quantum of proof for a lost or destroyed will.

Further as to measure of proof:

A late case in Massachusetts (Giles v. Giles, 204 Mass. 383, 90 N. E. 595 [1909]), is worthy of consideration in connection with the subject of the effect of a revoking clause in a lost will. That court, it will be remembered, adopted the view of the English ecclesiastical courts as to the effect of a revoking clause a rule similar to our section 1297, Civil Code. Pickens v. Davis, supra. In Giles v. Giles, supra, the court considered the purpose of section 8, supra, Revised Laws, c. 135, providing for the method of revoking wills, which is similar to our section 1292, Civil Code. The question involved in the case is thus stated therein:

"The third issue was as follows: 'Was said instrument revoked by the said Charles E. Giles subsequently to the date, execution, and publication thereof by the making, execution, and publication of another will which has been lost or destroyed, and its contents cannot be proved so that it can be propounded for probate. * * * The purpose of the statute [section 8, supra] is to prevent the revocation of a will by a writing, without a strong proof of the execution and revocatory character of the writing as is required to establish a will." [Italics ours.]

The former decisions of the Supreme Court of that state on the subject are therein reviewed as follows:

"It is the law of this commonwealth that, 'when an instrument of revocation is in existence and capable of being propounded for probate, its validity should be tried by a direct proceeding instituted for the purpose in the probate court. Laughton v. Atkins, 1 Pick. 535.' Wallis v. Wallis, 114 Mass. 510. If such an instrument has been 'lost or destroyed, it cannot be admitted to probate without clear and satisfactory proof of its whole contents.' Davis v. Sigourney, 8 Met. 487. It was decided in Wallis v. Wallis, ubi supra, that, 'if it can be proved that a later will was duly executed, attested, and subscribed, and that it contained a clause expressly revoking all former wills, but evidence of the rest of its contents cannot be obtained, it is nevertheless a good revocation.' But Chief Justice Gray added: 'And it can be made available only by allowing it to be set up in opposition to the probate of the earlier will, in accordance with the practice established in the English ecclesiastical courts before the Declaration of Independence, and adopted by the courts exercising similar jurisdiction in New York and New Jersey.' Helyer v. Helyer, 1 Lee, 472; Nelson v. McGiffert, 3 Barb. Ch. 158, 164; Day v. Day, 2 Green Ch. 549. This means that proof of its execution is to be made in the same way as if it were to be admitted to probate as a will. Indeed, under our statute it takes effect in the same way and under the same requirements as to execution as a will that directly disposes of property. * * *

"We are of opinion that, under the R. L. C. 135, § 8, to show a revocation of a will by a writing, the proof that there is a 'writing, signed, attested, and subscribed in the same manner as a will,' must be of the same kind and quality as would be required to establish the writing as a will, except that proof of its contents, beyond the fact that they are revocatory, need not be given. We think it plain that, apart from the statute, proof by the declarations of the testator would not be competent." (Italics ours.)

It is true that in the foregoing decision the question of whether or not the contents of a revoking document must be established by two witnesses was neither considered nor decided, as it was not involved under the Massachusetts law. The language of the court and the general tenor and effect of the decision would point to the conclusion that under the Massachusetts statute that court would require the proof of the revoking clause of a lost will to be established by two witnesses if such proof was essential under their law to establish such a will for probate as is required in this state.

Does the particular will revoke the former will when considered as an entirety?

If we assume that a subsequent will may be considered as a revoking instrument, and therefore proved by one witness, it would be unreasonable to consider the revoking clause alone in determining the effect of the second will as an instrument of revocation. Such a construction would be opposed not only to the rule for the construction of wills, but of all other writings, which are to be construed as a whole to determine their legal effect. It is true that the authorities draw a distinction between a will which operated to revoke a former will because inconsistent therewith and a will that contains a revoking clause. This is pointed out in Blackett v. Ziegler, supra. That case holds that the latter operates eo instanti, and that the former only operates in case the will is in effect at the time of death. The court quotes with approval the following from Page on Wills, § 273:

"In the United States, in the absence of a statute on this subject, the decisions are by no means uniform. The better line of authority made a distinction between the cases where the later will contained an express revocation clause, and where it was merely inconsistent with the earlier will. 'There seems to have been material distinction, and on good ground, between the state of a former will after a second one merely inconsistent with it, and its state after a second one with a declaration expressly revoking it. In the first case the only chance for the second to operate in revocation of the first, according to the prevalent theories of the courts, was by its coming to a head as an active will, which it could do only by surviving its author. Being the last expression of the decedent, and at the same time practically inconsistent with the prior one, the intent to repeal the first by it was to be implied. In case, however, of its being recalled by the testator in his lifetime, it could not, on the theory referred to, be taken to have the effect to do away with its predecessor. Being cut off before having its disposition of property awakened into life, it could have no affirmative operation through its dispositions upon the estate.' Where such distinction is recognized, the destruction of a later will inconsistent with an earlier will, but containing no clause of express revocation, revives the first will. Where the second will contains a clause of revocation, it is held in many jurisdictions in the United States, in accordance with the distinction already given, that the destruction of the second will does not revive the first will."

In California, however, this distinction between a revocation by implication and an express revocation cannot well be drawn, for section 1296 of our Civil Code expressly provides that the will is revoked by a subsequent will containing provisions inconsistent with the previous will as well as by a will containing an express clause of revocation, and section 1297 declares the effect of the destruction of the revoking will. If the execution of an inconsistent will operates as a revocation as well as and with equal force as a will containing an express revoking clause, as seems to be declared by section 1296, it would seem to follow, if we are to adopt the view that a lost revoking will may be proved as such by one witness, that the whole of an inconsistent lost will, containing no revoking clause, could be proven by one witness to establish a revocation of an earlier will. If this be true, with equal propriety the whole will can be proven in connection with and in explanation of an express revoking clause, and thus the court having the whole will before it would be able to say in the case at bar that the second will, taken as a whole, was really a codicil to the first, confirming its bequest, and devise to the sister. We do not hold that this can be done, but we are inclined to agree with Mr. Justice SLOANE that the revoking clause in the second will should be considered as a conditional revocation; that is, that the revocation is conditional upon the whole will being effective, and for that reason cannot be given effect unless the balance of the will is also given effect.

The order admitting the will of November 25, 1916, to probate is reversed, and the trial court is directed to admit the will of May 13, 1908, to probate upon the uncontradicted testimony of its due execution already in evidence; each party to pay its own costs on appeal.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; LENNON, J.

SLOANE, J. I concur in the conclusion reached by Justice WILBUR that there is insufficient proof of the revocation of the first will.

I am not satisfied, however, that an instrument purporting to be a subsequent will and containing apt language showing a present revocation of former wills may not be offered in evidence as independent proof of such revocation, and, when lost or destroyed, its terms of revocation be proved by a single competent witness. But I think that such an instrument, executed for the concurrent purposes of creating a new will and revoking an old one, is subject to a different construction as to its revoking clause than obtains in the interpretation of an instrument executed solely to revoke a former will.

It is held by many authorities, a number of which are cited in Justice WILBUR'S opinion, that where a testator couples the revocation of former wills with the publication of a new one, he declares his intention not to die intestate, and there is a strong implication that he only intends the act of revocation to take effect if the new will becomes operative; and it has therefore been frequently held that it is only after the subsequent will has been admitted to probate that it can be used as evidence of revocation of former wills. Stickney v. Hammond, 138 Mass. 116; Peck's Appeal, 50 Conn. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 685; Reid v. Borland, 14 Mass. 208; Laughton v. Atkins, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 535; Wallis v. Wallis, 114 Mass. 510.

[10] But, conceding that the contents of such revoking will, though lost or destroyed, and not susceptible of proof as a will by a single witness, can be established as to a revocation of former wills by one competent witness, the whole contents and purpose of the instrument must be considered in determining whether it effects such revocation.

In the present instance Mrs. Thompson's second will was practically identical with the first in its disposition of her estate, and amounted to little more than a republication of the earlier will. It did contain express words of revocation of former wills, but it would be a very unjust and unreasonable construction of these words of revocation to hold that they were intended, in the event that this second will should fail of admission to probate, to defeat her twice-declared intention that substantially all her property should go to her sister.

In Wilbourn v. Shell, 59 Miss. 205, 42 Am. Rep. 363, the testator, in order to correct the spelling in his holographic will already executed, had it copied and attempted to execute the copy as a will, and destroyed the original. The court says:

"From a consideration of all the facts in evidence, we are satisfied that the testator destroyed his holographic will, under the belief that the copy thereof executed by him was a valid will, and not with the intention of dying intestate as to his lands. * * * Being inefficient because of the want of attestation, a revocation of the prior will, made by the testator under a belief in its validity, is conditional, and not absolute, and, the condition having failed, the original is in law still the existing will of the testator, and is entitled to probate."

Redfield on Evidence states the doctrine to similar effect:

"It is only where a testator revokes a former will, upon the supposition that he has executed a subsequent valid will, which proves invalid, that the act of revocation is held incomplete." 1 Redf. on Wills, *308.

"Where the testator destroyed his will, believing it had already been revoked by a later will, which proved to be invalid, and there was no other evidence of his intent except his declaration made at the time that it was no use to keep it, as he had another, it was held the will was not revoked." Redf. on Wills, *330.

In Stickney v. Hammond, supra, the court says:

"The testator manifestly had no intention to revoke the will of June, 1877, except as he at the same time substituted therefor the instrument of later date which differed from it only in a purely secondary matter."

So here Mrs. Thompson undoubtedly had no purpose or intent to destroy the testamentary effect of her former will except on the condition that the later will would become effective. Therefore, whether the evidence as to the contents of this second will is excluded or admitted, there is insufficient proof that the first will was revoked.

If this conclusion is sound, as the majority of the Justices concede, I see no need for this court to go further in its ruling on this appeal. The learned and persuasive arguments of the conflicting opinions filed herein but emphasize the intricacies of the subject and lead me to adopt the prudent course suggested in the quaint text of Swinburne, in his work on Wills, who, three centuries ago, found himself in deep water in trying to reconcile the accumulated learning of that day on this subject. On page 977 of the seventh edition of his work he is quoted as saying:

"Surely this question, especially concerning the manner of revocation to be made in the second testament, is very difficult, and such as in the answering whereof the writers do fight among themselves mightily and do contradict one another very strongly, so that the victory is very doubtful, and very hard it is to know whither opinion is truer, or more commonly received. Others labouring to reconcile these contradictions and to pacify these contentions have waded so for fine and dainty distinctions that they seem to swim up and down, and float hither and thither, I know not whither, in a deep and bottomless sea of intricate and confused divisions; so that if a man would adventure to follow them to the End of their Voyage, he might well doubt whether ever he should obtain any haven or safe landing. Wherefore for mine own part I thought to wade no farther from the shore than I could find fast footing, and where I might be within the reader's reach."

OLNEY, J. I dissent. The leading opinion holds that, because under our statute two witnesses are required to establish the contents of a lost or destroyed will for the purpose of probating it so that it may stand as the testator's last will effectively disposing of his property, two witnesses are likewise required to prove that it contained a clause revoking former wills, when it is sought, not to probate the instrument, but merely to show the revocation of a former will made by it. This position can be justified only upon the theory that a probate of the instrument is necessary in order that the clause of revocation contained in it be operative, since the Code section requiring two witnesses to prove the contents of a lost instrument applies only to the probate of a will. But that the probate of an instrument of revocation is not necessary appears plainly from our Code. Section 1292, Civil Code, provides in terms that a will may be revoked by any instrument suitably executed, whether it be a will or not, and manifestly probate cannot be required of an instrument that is not a will. The section reads:

"Except in the cases in this chapter mentioned, no written will, nor any part thereof, can be revoked or altered otherwise than:

"1. By a written will, or other writing of the testator, declaring such revocation or alteration, and executed with the same formalities with which a will should be executed by such testator. * * *"

It is in fact conceded that, if the instrument of revocation be not a will, the Code section requiring two witnesses for proof of the contents of a lost will can have no application, but it is said that this is not true when the lost instrument is a will. But why should there be any difference? It is not sought in either case to prove the instrument as a will, but merely as a revocation, a very different thing, and the effect and operation of the instrument as being a revocation is the same whether it be a will or not.

There would be ground for making a difference if the effect and operation of a revocation contained in a will were dependent upon the will finally becoming effective and operative as the testator's last valid will. There is but one method of establishing an instrument as a decedent's last valid and operative will, and that is the probating of it. If, therefore, the operation of a clause of revocation contained in a will were dependent upon the instrument appearing at the testator's death to be his last will, its probate would be necessary to show the revocation worked by it. But it is not the law of this state, or of the other states that have adopted the rule of the ecclesiastical courts, that the operation of a clause of revocation in a will is dependent upon the instrument continuing until the testator's death as his valid last will, unsuperseded and unrevoked. Section 1297, Civil Code, provides just the contrary. It reads:

"If, after making a will, the testator duly makes and executes a second will, the destruction, cancellation, or revocation of such second will does not revive the first will, unless it appears by the terms of such revocation that it was the intention to revive and give effect to the first will, or unless, after such destruction, cancellation, or revocation, the first will is duly republished."

If the revocation of one will contained in a second is still effective, although the second will is in turn revoked, such revocation is certainly not dependent on the second will appearing to be the last will of the testator. Right here is where fundamentally, as I see it, the leading opinion is wrong. It takes the position, in spite of the Code sections just quoted, that a revocatory clause in a will is ambulatory in effect like the disposing clauses of a will, and is not effective instantaneously with execution. Thus it is said:

"In order that the revoking clause in this lost and unrevoked will should be effective as such, it was necessary to establish that such clause was in her last will, and thus an effective part of her last will."

And again:

"If the revoking clause of a will stands upon the same basis as the balance of the will, there could scarcely be room for doubt as to the foregoing proposition, but it is insisted that section 1297, Civil Code, declaring the result of the revocation of a revoking will, in effect provides that the revoking clause operates instantly upon the execution of the will containing it, and that for that reason its existence can be proved by any competent evidence, thereby establishing the fact that the prior will was revoked as of the date of the revoking will. This view finds support in the department opinion In re Lones, 108 Cal. 688, 690."

Following the latter statement, the opinion then goes on to question the view expressed in Re Lones.

It is novel doctrine, indeed, that a formal revocation of a will, whether it be contained in a later will or in an instrument not a will, does not operate upon the execution of the instrument, but is ambulatory in effect in those jurisdictions which, like ours, have adopted the rule of the ecclesiastical courts that the revocation of a revoking will does not revive the first will. What authority is there for such doctrine, and what do our Code sections (1292 and 1297, Civil Code) mean other than that a formal revocation operates instantly with the execution of the instrument by which it is declared, regardless of whether that instrument be a will or not?

The leading opinion admits that, if the will containing the revocation clause is in turn revoked, the revocation is yet effective, the instrument cannot be probated, and, if destroyed, two witnesses as to its contents are not required for the purpose of proving the revocation. Is this not an admission that the revocation was effective from the beginning, from the time of execution of the instrument, and that the operation of the revocatory clause is quite different from that of the clauses disposing of the testator's estate? Upon what other theory is it possible that the revocation is effective although the will as a will has in turn been revoked? And when a will revoking former wills has been destroyed and secondary evidence of its contents is necessary, why should two witnesses be required to prove its contents, if its destruction were not by way of revocation, and less than two be sufficient if it were? What has the intent with which the instrument was destroyed got to do with the matter? If it be sought to prove the instrument for the purposes of probate as a will, then two witnesses as to its contents are required, regardless of whether it was destroyed animo revocandi or not. On the other hand, if it be sought to prove the instrument for some other purpose than probate, as, for example, to defeat the probate of a former will by showing its revocation, why should the secondary proof required of its contents vary according as its destruction was animo revocandi or not? The statute makes no such difference. It makes the effect of the instrument the same in either case; it works a revocation. The statute does make a difference in the secondary proof required according to the purpose for which it is sought to prove the instrument, and requires more in case it is sought to probate the instrument than where it is sought to prove it for some other purpose. There is here a rational and recognized distinction, and it is this and this alone which in my judgment the statute makes. And certainly proving an instrument, whether it be destroyed or not, for the purpose of showing a revocation of wills worked by it, is not proving it for the purpose of probating it.

The leading opinion admittedly cites no authority which directly supports its position, and presumably there is none. It does cite a number which it considers indirectly support its position. It would unduly extend this dissenting opinion—already too long—to discuss them. Suffice it to say that an examination of them all plainly discloses, in my judgment, that each and all go upon some point not present here and making this case radically different from them.

Nor is it the fact, as the leading opinion assumes, that there are no authorities directly in point. In a number of cases the distinction has been made between proving the contents of a lost will for the purpose of probating it, and proving the contents for the purpose of showing the revocation of an earlier will, and in one at least the exact question would seem to have been presented and decided. The rule of the English ecclesiastical courts was that two witnesses, or at least a single witness with corroborating circumstances, were required for the probate of a will. 3 Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 2045 and 2048. Yet in Helyar v. Helyar, 1 Lee, Ecc. 472, 161 Eng. Rep. 174, Sir George Lee, after considering the point, held that for the purpose of showing the revocation of one will by a later one, which had been lost or destroyed, the uncorroborated evidence of a single witness was sufficient for the purpose of establishing the contents of the second will operating as a revocation.

The syllabus in Day v. Day, 3 N. J. Eq. 549, correctly states the decision. It reads:

"If a prior will be revoked by a subsequent one, and both be improperly destroyed, the contests of the first instrument cannot be established as the testator's will, although the contents of the second will cannot be ascertained."

In Nelson v. McGiffert, 3 Barb. Ch. 158, 49 Am. Dec. 170, the testator made two wills, one in 1832 and one in 1837. The first was offered for probate before the surrogate. The second had been destroyed, and proof was offered of it in resistance to the probate of the first as having revoked it. Under the New York practice at the time, the chancellor alone, not the surrogate, had the power to receive proof of a destroyed will for the purpose of establishing it as a testamentary disposition of the decedent's property; that is, for the purpose of probate. The point was made that, the second will not having been so established, the surrogate, upon the proceedings for the probate of the first will, could not receive proof of the second for the purpose of showing that the first had been revoked. Concerning this point, the court said (page 164):

"The only remaining questions are as to the due execution of the subsequent will of 1837, and its effect upon the will of 1832. There is no doubt as to the jurisdiction and power of the surrogate to receive proof that the will of 1832 was revoked by a subsequent will of the testator, and that such subsequent will had been fraudulently destroyed, or that it was destroyed by the testator when his mind had become so impaired that he was incompetent to perform a testamentary act. The chancellor alone had the power to take proof of such a will for the purpose of establishing it as a testamentary disposition of the property of the decedent. But, in resisting the probate of the instrument propounded by McGiffert as the last will and testament of the decedent, the heirs and next of kin had the right to introduce any testimony which would be sufficient to satisfy the surrogate that the instrument propounded was not in force as a valid will at the death of the testator named therein."

The rule in Mississippi, as in some other states, is, or at least was, that a lost or destroyed will cannot be probated unless all its contents are duly proven. It was held, nevertheless, in Vining v. Hall, 40 Miss. 83, that although a destroyed will could not be established as a will because its contents could not be fully proven, yet the clause of revocation which it contained could be shown, and was effective as a revocation of a former will which it was sought to establish.

In Massachusetts itself, from whose Supreme Court the leading opinion quotes liberally, the distinction between proving a lost or destroyed will for the purpose of probate and proving it for the purpose of showing a revocation is made. The syllabus in Wallis v. Wallis, 114 Mass. 510, correctly states the ruling, and reads:

"When a will revoking a former will is in existence, it must be established in the probate court; but when it has been lost or destroyed, and its contents cannot be sufficiently proved to admit it to probate, it may nevertheless be availed of as a revocation in opposition to the probate of the will revoked by it."

Finally, there is the decision to which I have referred as exactly in point here. It is In re Wear's Will, 131 App. Div. 875, 116 N. Y. Supp. 304. There the probate of a will was resisted on the ground that it had been revoked by a second will which could not be found. That it is exactly in point here is apparent from the following quotation from it:

"The objection urged on this appeal from the decree of the surrogate refusing probate to the first will is that the proof offered and received of the execution of the second will is inadequate. The appellant contends that the proof must be of the character required by sections 2621 and 1865 of the Code of Civil Procedure, entitling a lost will to probate. The requirement of this section is that the provisions of such lost will must be established 'by at least two credible witnesses, a correct copy or draft being equivalent to one witness.' We are of the opinion that this contention cannot be sustained. It is one thing to admit to probate a will disposing of a man's estate where the will cannot be found, and quite another thing to merely establish that a second will, revoking a former will, has been duly made and executed and left in the possession of the decedent. In the one case we are assuming to dispose of property in a manner different from that prescribed by law in the absence of a will, while in the latter case we are merely permitting the property to descend in the manner which the law designates. In the case now under consideration the execution and delivery of the will to the decedent was proved by Mr. Eckstein, who drew both wills, and who was a subscribing witness in both of them. He would have been entirely competent to have proved the execution of the will, if it had been found, the remaining subscribing witness being dead; and he was equally competent to prove the execution and delivery of the will to the decedent, not for the purpose of establishing a lost will, but to show that the will offered for probate was not the last will and testament of the decedent, and that such an instrument was executed and left in such a custody that the presumption is that it was destroyed with the intention of revocation, with the result that the decedent died intestate. We are of opinion that the authorities relied upon by the learned surrogate support his conclusions, and that the decree refusing probate to the will of June, 1900, was properly made."

But one point more. The leading opinion in more than one place states in effect that the question is whether a less proof or a different measure of proof is required to prove a part of a will—to wit, a clause of revocation of former wills—than is required for proof of the whole instrument. In my judgment no such question is presented. The question which is presented is: Does the statutory rule as to the proof required for the purpose of probating the instrument, i. e., establishing it as the testator's valid and effective last will and testament, apply when it is not sought to prove the instrument for that purpose at all? The point that I would make is that, where the instrument is offered for the purpose of probate, the rule of the Code of Civil Procedure as to the proof required for that purpose applies, but where it is not sought to prove it for that purpose, then the Code section—applying in terms only to probate—has no application, and the general rules of evidence apply, and this, regardless of whether it is sought to prove the whole or only a part of the instrument.

It is easy in fact to suggest a case wherein it is sought to prove the whole of a will and where as well the will purports to dispose of property, and where yet the measure of proof required for probate would surely not apply. The declarations of a deceased member of a family as to relationship are always admissible in pedigree cases. Suppose in such a case it was desired to prove that John Smith was the son of James Smith, and for that purpose it was sought to prove a declaration to that effect by a brother of James Smith, the declaration consisting in a will reading, "I hereby give my estate to John Smith, the son of my brother James Smith." The declaration is certainly competent and admissible, whether the instrument has been probated or not, whether it is entitled to probate or not, or whether the declaration is all of the will or is only a part. And yet surely the proof of such a declaration is not governed by the rules applicable to proving the instrument for the purpose of probate, although the thing proven is identically the same in each case, the execution by a certain person of a certain document. The reason why a different measure of proof applies in one case than in the other is that the purposes for which it is sought to prove the instrument are different. If it is sought to prove an instrument for the purpose of probating it as the duly executed and unrevoked last will of the testator, we have a special statutory rule applicable. If it is sought to prove it for any other purpose, there is no special rule applicable, and the general rules of evidence apply. This would seem perfectly plain and simple, and yet the leading opinion would seem to fail completely to appreciate and meet it.

Reference is made to the rule that in this state and in other states which provide by statute for similar probate proceedings a will may not be introduced in evidence as a muniment of title, or, for that matter, be used in any way as a muniment of title, unless it has been probated. But this rule has no bearing on the present discussion. It is, in fact, not a rule of evidence at all. It is but a corollary of the propositions: (a) That an instrument which purports to be a will does yet not operate to transfer title unless it is the valid last will of a decedent; and (b) that in this state there has been provided by statute a proceeding in rem, i. e., probate, by which alone the fact that an instrument is the valid last will of a decedent may be established. The result is that, on the one hand, unless the instrument has been admitted to probate, no amount of proof will suffice to give it operation as a muniment of title, and, on the other hand, if it has been admitted to probate, no other proof is required than proof of the order admitting it, and if such proof is furnished it is final and conclusive. The rule, then, that a will cannot be used as a muniment of title until it has been probated is not a rule of evidence, but one simply that a certain adjudication in rem is required to establish its character as the valid last will of a decedent. The point in connection with the present discussion is that by sections 1292 and 1297, Civil Code, a will does not have to be the valid last will of a decedent in order to operate as a revocation of former wills.

In re SENG'S ESTATE.

MOELLERING et al. v. HASKINS.

(Civ. 3732.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 1, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 31, 1921.)

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

Courts ⟸202(5) — Order of probate court fixing commissions for sale of real estate held not appealable.

Where several real estate agents were employed by executor under Code Civ. Proc. § 1559, to effect a sale, and one agent procured a bidder, and another agent subsequently procured a bidder at an advanced price, and the land was sold to the last bidder and the sale confirmed, the agent procuring the last bidder could not appeal from an order in the probate proceeding fixing the amount of commissions to be paid and providing that the first agent should receive 5 per cent. of the amount of his bid, and the agent procuring the subsequent bidder 5 per cent. of the difference between the first and second bids, as in probate proceedings appeals lie only as prescribed by statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Peter Seng, deceased. From an order fixing the amount of commissions of E. A. Moellering, J. A. Goodwin, and J. L. Haskins, as real estate agents for the sale of real property belonging to the estate, the first two named agents appeal. Appeal dismissed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Fry & Jenkins, of San José, for appellants.

Maurice Rankin and Archer Bowden, both of San José, and H. W. A. Weske, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This appeal is from an order made in a probate proceeding fixing the amount of commissions to be paid to certain real estate agents for the sale of real property belonging to the estate.

The executor of the will of Peter Seng, deceased, employed the appellants Moellering & Goodwin, and also the respondent Haskins, all of whom were real estate agents, to effect the sale. The contract was entered into in conformity with the provisions of section 1559 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1181. The respondent, Haskins, procured certain purchasers for the property for the sum of $7,000. The bid of these purchasers was duly returned to the court, but before the hearing on confirmation appellants also procured a purchaser. The bid of this proposed purchaser was received too late to be returned, but at the hearing in open court he offered an increase of 10 per cent. over the returned bid, whereupon the sale was confirmed to him for the sum of $7,700. The court thereupon found that 5 per cent. upon the purchase price secured for the property was a reasonable and proper amount to be allowed as a commission, and made the order, here appealed from, dividing such commissions on the sale between appellants and respondent, by giving to the respondent who procured the first bidder 5 per cent. on the sum of $7,000, the amount of his bid, and giving to appellants, who procured the second (and successful) bidder, 5 per cent. on $700, the additional amount procured.

It is the contention of the appellants that under the provisions of section 1559, Code of Civil Procedure, respondent is not entitled to the sum allowed him, or to any commission, but that appellants are entitled to the whole thereof.

Section 1559, Code of Civil Procedure, reads as follows:

"Any executor or administrator may enter into a contract with any bona fide real estate agent to secure a purchaser for any real property belonging to an estate, which contract shall provide for payment to such agent out of the proceeds of sale to any purchaser secured by him of a commission, the amount of which must be fixed and allowed by the court upon confirmation of the sale. If a sale to a purchaser obtained by such agent is returned to the court for confirmation and said sale be confirmed to such purchaser, such contract shall be binding and valid as against the estate for the amount so fixed and allowed by the court.

"By the execution of any such contract no personal liability shall attach to the executor or administrator, and no liability of any kind shall be incurred by the estate unless an actual sale be made and confirmed."

It appears from the record that the court in making the order in the manner indicated followed the custom and practice which obtains in Santa Clara county to the effect that the broker who brings in the bid which is returned is allowed his commission on the amount of such bid, and the agent who procures a subsequent bidder is allowed a commission on the amount which his bid exceeds that of the one returned; and respondents claim that appellants contracted with this custom in view, and are bound thereby. It is further contended by respondent that the order directing the payment of commissions to real estate agents is not an appealable order, and further, even assuming it to be such, that the amount to be paid is purely a matter within the discretion of the trial court, and for that reason it is binding upon the appellants. Appellants' claim is based upon a literal construction of section 1559 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As pointed out by respondent, under such a construction neither party would be entitled to a commission. Respondent procured a purchaser, but his bid was not confirmed as required by the statute; and appellants' bid does not meet the requirements of the provision for the reason that it was never returned.

Whatever conclusion might be reached as to what is the proper construction to be given to the act we do not deem material. Nor do we consider a discussion of the other points raised necessary; for it seems plain to us that appellants are in no manner aggrieved by the order appealed from. Neither the estate nor the heirs are complaining of the amount allowed respondent for his services; and, if appellants have any claim against the estate for services rendered, their remedy is an appropriate proceeding for its recovery. What benefits respondent may have secured under the order is no concern of theirs.

The appeal is dismissed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 1, is denied.

We are satisfied that the order appealed from is not an appealable order. In probate proceedings appeals lie only as prescribed by our statutes, and an order of the character here involved is not among those specified as appealable. The appeal, therefore, was properly dismissed by the District Court of Appeal. Our denial of the petition is, of course, not to be taken as indicating any view on our part as to the correctness of the practice of the trial court in the matter of the fixing and apportionment of commissions of real estate agents under section 1559, Code of Civil Procedure, or as to the allowance thereunder of a commission to an agent on account of a purchaser to whom the sale is not confirmed.

All concur.

FERROGGIARO v. BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS et al. (Civ. 3717.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 29, 1921.)

1. Dedication ⟸19(1)—Marking of streets on maps immaterial, where not dedicated and used as such.

Where certain streets were never dedicated and accepted or used as such, it was immaterial that they appeared as public streets on certain maps on file in the recorder's office.

2. Dedication ⟸19(5)—Complete when owner files map showing streets and sells lots accordingly.

Dedication is complete when the owner of land files a map for record delineating certain streets and thereafter sells lots in accordance therewith.

3. Dedication ⟸19(5)—Filing of maps insufficient, where no general sale of lots in accordance and streets not used as such.

Where certain streets had never been used as such during 54 years of plaintiff's occupancy, and the city made no attempt to show formal dedication or acceptance, but relied solely upon the filing of certain maps as an implied dedication, and evidence of only one sale in accordance therewith was offered, the rule that a dedication is complete when the owner of the land files a map for record delineating the streets and thereafter sells lots in accordance therewith was inapplicable.

4. Dedication ⟸63(2)—Nonuser for statutory period works abandonment.

Under Pol. Code 1872, § 2620, even if the filing of maps with certain streets delineated was a sufficient dedication, failure to use them as such for five years worked an abandonment; such statute being in effect during such period.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Proceeding by A. Ferroggiaro against the Board of Public Works and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeals. Affirmed.

George Lull, City Atty., and D. S. O'Brien and Chas. S. Peery, Asst. City Attys., all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff instituted this proceeding against the board of public works of the city and county of San Francisco, and the members thereof, and the city and county of San Francisco, a municipal corporation, to restrain them from interfering with his possession of a certain strip of land situated in said city and county and appearing upon the map thereof as portions of Keith street and Egbert avenue. The complaint alleges that plaintiff is the owner of a lot of land which is described therein by metes and bounds, being bounded in part by the two streets in question, and referring to a map of the Bay View Homestead Association alleged to have been filed in the office of the county recorder of the city and county of San Francisco June 19, 1872. As to that portion of the land designated upon the map as Keith street and Egbert avenue, it is alleged that plaintiff is the owner in fee, and that he has been in the open, notorious and continuous possession thereof through himself and his predecessors for a period of 50 years last past. A windmill and some outhouses are alleged to have been constructed and maintained on those portions of the land designated as streets during all the period of plaintiff's possession, and the injunction was sought to restrain the defendants from removing these structures. The defendants answered, alleging, among other things, that the portions of said streets in controversy are parts of open and public streets of the city and county of San Francisco, duly dedicated and accepted as such. The court found that the land upon which the structures were erected was a part of what was designated on the map of the city and county of San Francisco as Keith street and Egbert avenue, and that said streets were never dedicated as public streets and never accepted or used as such by the city and county of San Francisco or the public thereof. The court also found that plaintiff had been in the open, notorious, and continuous possession of said property for a period of 54 years last past, and that during said period the plaintiff and his predecessors had occupied and used said premises and maintained thereon the outhouses and the windmill which the defendants were endeavoring to remove. From the judgment in favor of the plaintiff which followed these findings the defendants appeal.

[1] During the course of the trial defendants offered in evidence certain pages of a map book from files of the county recorder containing what purported to be copies of a map of the Bay View tract filed for record on May 23, 1867, and of the map of the Bay View Homestead Association filed for record June 17, 1872. Plaintiff's objection to the introduction of this evidence on the ground that a proper foundation had not been laid was sustained by the court. Thereupon defendants rested. It is now urged that the court erred in refusing to admit the map book in evidence, but even if error occurred it would not avail the defendants anything because the judgment must be affirmed upon the record. The trial court having found that the streets marked upon the map of the city and county as Keith street and Egbert avenue were never dedicated as public streets and never accepted or used as such, it is immaterial that they appeared as public streets upon the map filed in 1867 or upon the map filed in 1872.

[2, 3] Appellants' case rests upon the proposition that dedication to the public is complete when the owner of a tract of land files a map thereof for record delineating certain streets thereon and thereafter sells lots in accordance with said map. In support of the proposition reliance is had upon such cases as Davidow v. Griswold, 23 Cal. App. 188, 192, 137 Pac. 619; San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 175, 13 Pac. 405; Berton v. All Persons, 176 Cal. 610, 615, 170 Pac. 151. No quarrel is had with this proposition as an established rule of law in this state, but the record here does not bring appellants' case within the rule. The only evidence of any sales having been made in accordance with the map filed is that of Gilmore to Gibbs some time after May 30, 1872. So far as the record shows, no evidence of any other conveyance was offered to prove dedication or acceptance of these particular streets. Respondent rested upon the showing that the streets had never been used as such during the 54 years of his occupancy. No attempt was made by appellants to show formal dedication or acceptance. Appellants relied solely upon the filing of the maps of 1867 and 1872 as evidence of implied dedication..

[4] But even if this was a sufficient dedication at the times when the maps were filed, failure to use the streets as such for a period of five years worked an abandonment under the provisions of section 2620 of the Political Code, which was in force until its repeal in 1883.

Thus, while this statute was the law of the state, applicable in the city and county of San Francisco as elsewhere, a five-year period of nonuser worked an abandonment of the street, and respondent having been in the adverse possession of the land during that period and continuously thereafter, as the trial court found, the judgment must be affirmed.

O'SHEA v. SICOTTE et al.

(Civ. 3665, 3666.)

1. Gifts ⟸71—Causa mortis not favored.

The law does not regard gifts causa mortis with favor because of the opportunity they afford for fraud and perjury.

2. Gifts ⟸64(1) — Donor must give donee means of obtaining control, which in case of chose in action must be by assignment.

To complete a verbal gift causa mortis, the donor at the time of making the gift must do something which has the effect of placing in the hands of the donee the means of obtaining the control and possession of the thing given, and, in case of a chose in action not evidenced by a written instrument, the only means of obtaining control recognized is an assignment in writing or some equivalent thereof.

3. Gifts ⟸66(1)—Execution of power of attorney held not to complete verbal gift of bank deposits.

Where a stepmother told a stepson while on her deathbed that in case anything happened to her she wanted him to have everything she had, the execution of powers of attorney constituting the stepson her general agent, under which possession of amounts on deposit in banks was not obtained by the stepson during her lifetime, did not effectuate the gift, especially as, even if the powers of attorney had been executed by delivery of the possession of the money to the stepson, his possession would have been as agent, and the money would not have been beyond the dominion of the donor.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Two actions by Irvine T. O'Shea against Margaret Sicotte and others. From judgments for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Taugher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Andrew F. Burke and Paul A. McCarthy, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The actions in which these two appeals were taken were by stipulation of the parties tried and submitted upon the same evidence, and the determinative principles of law applicable to each are the same. The facts are also substantially similar and are as follows: Mrs. Helen O'Shea was the stepmother of the plaintiff and appellant, Irvine T. O'Shea. She was an elderly woman and was possessed of the sum approximately of $20,000, which she had derived from a settlement with her stepchildren as to her interest in the estate of her deceased husband, Jeremiah O'Shea. This money she had been keeping on deposit in her own name in two San Francisco banks—the Mission Savings Bank, where she had on deposit $5,000 of said sum, and the San Francisco Savings & Loan Society, where she had on deposit $15,000 of said sum. On November 16, 1917, Mrs. O'Shea, while at the home of the appellant herein, had an acute attack of illness which rendered her unconscious, and while in said unconscious condition she was removed to St. Luke's Hospital, where she died three days later. On the morning of November 17, 1917, she had so far recovered consciousness as to be able to talk briefly with one of her attendant physicians, and also a little later with the appellant herein. The physician at this first interview advised her that her condition was serious and that she ought to have her affairs fixed up, and that it would be advisable for her to execute a power of attorney "so that some one would attend to things while she was sick." A short while thereafter the interview between herself and appellant occurred which is relied upon by him as forming the basis of the gift causa mortis to himself of the money on deposit in the two above-named banks. The words of said conversation touching said matter, as testified to by appellant, are as follows: Mrs. OShea said to him:

"In case anything happens to me, I want you to have everything I have got. Now you had better go and get some one to fix the affairs so that you can get the money out of the bank so that you will have it in case anything happens to me."

Thereupon the appellant went out and telephoned to a notary public to come out to the hospital, where, as he stated to him, his stepmother wanted some papers drawn up. When the notary arrived at the hospital he was taken to the room of Mrs. O'Shea and, after a brief conversation with her, proceeded to another room, where he drew up a general power of attorney constituting appellant Mrs. O'Shea's general agent. This power of attorney, in addition to those general clauses usual in such documents, also contained the following clause:

"In addition it is my express wish that if my present illness should prove fatal I desire that the said Irvine Thomas O'Shea take charge of all of my estate."

When the notary had drawn up this power of attorney, he returned to the room where Mrs. O'Shea was and she signed the same. At the time she did so the notary, according to his testimony, said to her:

"If you turn it (the power of attorney) over to Irvine O'Shea, you are giving him entire charge of everything and you are practically turning your property over to him."

One of her physicians present at this time testified that the notary explained to Mrs. O'Shea that the document was a "power of attorney giving Irvine O'Shea the power to take charge of her business while she was sick." The power of attorney when thus executed was turned over to the appellant, who went that afternoon to the Mission Savings Bank, arriving about closing time, and not having with him the passbook of Mrs. O'Shea, he asked the cashier to transfer the account of Mrs. O'Shea to him, exhibiting at the same time the power of attorney. The bank cashier declined to make the transfer of the account until he had consulted with Judge Matt I. Sullivan, who was the bank's attorney and was also the appellant's attorney, and advised the appellant to see him about the matter. The appellant saw Judge Sullivan that afternoon and exhibited to him the power of attorney, explaining the circumstances under which it had been made, and was advised by him that Mrs. O'Shea should make a will. Thereupon the appellant returned to the hospital, according to his story, and spoke to Mrs. O'Shea about making a will, and she consented to do so, whereupon he returned to Judge Sullivan's office, coming back to the hospital a little later with an assistant in said office for the purpose of having a will prepared for execution by Mrs. O'Shea. She was found to be in a semiconscious condition, apparently unable to make a will, and she remained in that condition until the Monday following, when another vain effort was made to have her make a will. In the meantime and shortly before she died, the appellant went again to the Mission Savings Bank and requested its cashier to pay over to him the money in Mrs. O'Shea's account there, which the cashier refused to do. No demand or request for the money on deposit in the San Francisco Savings & Loan Society was made by the appellant during Mrs. O'Shea's lifetime, nor, in fact, until about two months after her death, which occurred on the Monday following her attack of illness. Upon the death of Mrs. O'Shea a will executed by her about a year prior to her death was admitted to probate. By its terms her entire estate was bequeathed to her sister, Mrs. Margaret Sicotte, and her children. These two actions were commenced by the plaintiff and appellant herein against these beneficiaries under said former will and against the bank having on deposit the sums of money to which these suits respectively refer.

[1] The contention of the plaintiff in each case before the trial court and upon this appeal is that a completed gift causa mortis in his favor was made by Mrs. O'Shea by the transaction above detailed. We are unable to agree with this contention: The law does not regard gifts causa mortis with favor because of the opportunity they afford for fraud and perjury. Drew v. Hagerty, 81 Me. 231, 17 Atl. 63, 3 L. R. A. 230, 10 Am. St. Rep. 255. The Supreme Court of this state thus states the well-established rule upon this subject:

"Gifts causa mortis are not regarded in the law with favor, since they are in contravention of the general rules * * * for the testamentary disposition of property, and therefore should in all cases be established by clear and convincing proof of the requisites of such a gift." Knight v. Tripp, 121 Cal. 674, 54 Pac. 267; Denigan v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Society, 127 Cal. 137, 59 Pac. 389; Freese v. Odd Fellows Sav. Bank, 136 Cal. 662, 69 Pac. 493.

[2] It is not intended or intimated that the appellant herein is either charged or suspected of any wrongdoing in his assertions and evidence as to the existence of a valid gift causa mortis in the instant case, but only that the means by which he sought to make such a gift effective were inadequate under the form of our statute to accomplish the desired result. Section 1147 of the Civil Code provides as follows:

"A verbal gift is not valid, unless the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing are given, nor, if it is capable of delivery, unless there is an actual or symbolical delivery of the thing to the donee."

It is not necessary to go far afield in search of authorities construing this section of the Civil Code. The case of Adams v. Merced Stone Co., 176 Cal. 418, 178 Pac. 498, 3 A. L. R. 928, contains a very clear and comprehensive statement of the requisites to the validity of gifts causa mortis. It is there held that in order to the completion of such verbal gifts the donor at the time of making the gift must do something which has the effect of placing in the hands of the donee the means of obtaining the control and possession of the thing given; and in the case of a chose in action not evidenced by a written instrument the only means of obtaining control that is recognized by the authorities is an assignment in writing or some equivalent thereof. The donor must part with the dominion over the thing given, and unless that is done the gift is not complete. In announcing this view the court in that case quoted from the case of Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 170, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 83, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19, which has special application to the instant case by reason of the similarity of its facts. In the case quoted a father had given to his son a check for a thousand dollars upon a bank with the intention of making him a gift of that amount of money. After delivering the check to his son the father stated that he wished that he would not present it until after his death. To this the son agreed, and upon the death of the father presented the check to the bank, where it was refused payment upon the ground that it had been revoked by his father's death. The court upheld the action of the bank in this respect, saying:

"In the present case the gift was verbal, and the property which the father intended to give to his son was money on deposit in the bank. The check was not itself the property which the father intended to give, but merely a direction to the defendant to pay one thousand dollars to the son. It indicated the amount to be given and the place at which the money was to be delivered. * * * The request of the father that the son would not present the check until after his death did not affect the sufficiency of the gift. If the gift were complete by the delivery of the check such request would not destroy its validity, and if not then complete this request would not have the effect to dispense with its presentation for the purpose of making it complete. By the failure of the son to present the check, there was no delivery of the money during the lifetime of the father, and the gift was not therefore complete."

[3] It is impossible to discover a distinction between the case last above cited and the case at bar. The appellant herein was given by the donor a power of attorney which would, if executed, have placed the money in the banks in question in each case within the appellant's custody; but this power of attorney was never executed to the extent of placing the funds in either of these banks within the appellant's custody or control. It was like the check in the case cited, in that it was merely an order for the delivery of the money which must have been executed during the would-be donor's lifetime in order to effectuate her gift; but it was unlike the check in one very essential respect, since even if executed it would not have removed the money in question beyond the dominion of the donor, since the possession of the money by the donee would have been simply the possession of his principal and not of himself. The donor would still through her agent have had complete possession and dominion over the thing which was the subject of the attempted gift, and, this being so, the power of attorney in question must be held to have been an ineffectual method of completing the gift causa mortis so as to make it valid in law. Edwards v. Guaranty, etc., Bank, 190 Pac. 57; Provident, etc., v. Sisters, etc., 87 N. J. Eq. 424, 100 Atl. 894.

The judgments are affirmed.

Ex parte ARATA. (Cr. 790.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 29, 1921.)

1. Arrest ⟸70—Arresting officer must take accused before magistrate without delay.

Police officers, upon arresting a person on a criminal charge, must take him before a magistrate without delay.

2. Bail ⟸43—Detention because of criminal charge unlawful after order to release on bail.

Where accused was arrested without a warrant, and two days later a complaint was filed in police court charging her with prostitution, whereupon she was arraigned and pleaded not guilty, the magistrate acted as his duty required in fixing bail and ordering her release pending trial, and she could not be thereafter detained because of the criminal accusation against her.

3. Health ⟸24—Authorities may quarantine only for reasonable ground.

Health authorities may place under quarantine a person afflicted with an infectious or contagious disease, as defined in Pol. Code, § 2979a, only where reasonable ground exists to support the belief that such person is so afflicted.

4. Habeas corpus ⟸85(1)—Burden on authorities to show facts justifying quarantine.

Where a person restrained of his liberty by quarantine questions the power of the health authorities, the burden is on them to show facts in support of the order.

5. Health ⟸24—Mere suspicion will not justify quarantine.

A mere suspicion, unsupported by facts giving rise to reasonable or probable cause, will not justify depriving a person of his liberty under an order of quarantine.

6. Health ⟸24—Habitual indiscriminate sexual intercourse affords reasonable probability of venereal disease, justifying quarantine.

The fact that women of ill fame indulge in repeated and promiscuous acts of sexual intercourse affords a presumption based on a reasonable probability that such a person is infected with venereal disease, so as to justify quarantine.

7. Habeas corpus ⟸85(1)—Authorities claiming one quarantined because of likelihood of venereal disease is prostitute have burden of proof.

If the health authorities claim that a person quarantined is a prostitute, and hence likely to be afflicted with disease, the burden is on them to prove such fact.

8. Constitutional law ⟸82—No encroachments on liberty of citizen though result sought beneficial.

Encroachments on the liberty of the citizen cannot be tolerated even though the general result sought is a beneficent one.

9. Habeas corpus ⟸79—Narrative of facts in return to writ held not proof of prostitution, justifying quarantine.

Where petitioner, accused of prostitution, gave bail and was ordered released pending trial, and at the hearing of the writ proof was not offered that at the time of her arrest she was a woman of ill fame, a narrative made in the return as to a police officer having been directed to petitioner's room wherein she offered to commit sexual intercourse with him and fixed a price therefor, which he paid, whereupon other officers, working with him, broke in the door and arrested her, could not be taken as proof that the charge of prostitution was true, so as to justify her detention in quarantine.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by A. Arata, directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles. Writ granted.

James W. Groom, Frank Dominguez, and Rchard Kittrelle, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Erwin W. Widney, City Prosecutor, by Harry A. Mock, Deputy City Prosecutor, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Habeas corpus to determine the right of respondent to detain petitioner and deprive her of her liberty. Upon return being made to the writ and hearing had thereon, petitioner's prayer was granted and her discharge ordered by decision heretofore made from the bench. That the reasons for the decision may be made to fully appear, this opinion is now filed.

In the petition filed herein it was alleged that respondent, chief of police, detained and confined in the city prison of Los Angeles the petitioner, and that said detention and imprisonment was without process of law or lawful authority. It was further alleged that petitioner was arrested without a warrant, by persons claiming to be police officers of the city of Los Angeles, on the 9th day of April, 1921, and that two days later a complaint was filed in the police court charging petitioner with a violation of the provisions of an ordinance of said city, which ordinance, stating its terms generally, was one making it an offense for a woman to commit an act of prostitution. The petition further set out that thereupon the petitioner was arraigned in said police court, entered a plea of not guilty, and that her trial was set for a certain date; that the bail was fixed in the sum of $50, which, it was alleged, petitioner furnished, and that she thereupon secured an order from said police court directing her discharge from custody pending said trial; that the written order of release so secured was presented to the jailer of the Los Angeles city jail; and that the jailer refused to discharge said person for the reason, as stated by him, that the health department of the city of Los Angeles had instructed the jailer and chief of police not to release petitioner until she had submitted to an examination desired to be made by said health department for the purpose of determining whether she was infected with a communicable, infectious, or quarantinable disease. In the petition it was further asserted that petitioner was not infected with any such disease; that the health department of the city of Los Angeles had no reason to believe that she was so infected; that she had never been theretofore arrested or charged with any crime; that she was not and never had been a prostitute, and did not commit the act charged against her by the complaint in the police court. Upon the alleged facts so stated no question can be made but that petitioner's detention by the chief of police was wholly unauthorized and without any warrant in law. In the return made to the writ respondent admitted that petitioner was being detained by him in said city jail, and then proceeded to narrate alleged facts in evidentiary form as to a certain police officer having been directed to a room occupied by petitioner wherein petitioner offered to commit an act of sexual intercourse with said officer and fixed a price therefor, which the officer paid, whereupon other officers, acting in conjunction with the first, broke in the door and arrested petitioner. The return next set out the terms of the ordinance which purports to make the commission of the alleged act an offense. The return further set forth that immediately upon being arrested said petitioner was "by order of the health department of said city" placed in a quarantine ward in the city jail, and there held "in qurantine to be examined by officers of the health department of said city, to determine her freedom from contagious or infectious quarantinable venereal disease, as provided by statute and the rules of the State Board of Health of the state of California." It was further stated in said return that a physician duly appointed as a medical examiner of women by the health department of said city and by order of the health commissioner visited petitioner for the purpose of making a medical examination to determine the existence of any such disease as has been described, and that petitioner refused to submit to the examination, and that the health commissioner ordered that she be held in quarantine pending the determination of her freedom from such disease. Further statement is made in the return that "the health department of the city of Los Angeles has determined from experience in a large number of cases that over 90 per cent. of all women apprehended in the commission of acts of prostitution are infected with contagious or infectious quarantinable venereal disease such as is enumerated in section 2979a, Political Code; that the rules of the State Board of Health adopted pursuant to section 2979, Political Code, require that the health commissioner of the city of Los Angeles cause examination to be made of all such persons to determine their freedom from such disease."

[1, 2] Referring briefly first to the duty of the chief of police and officers working under his direction, it is enough to say that the plain and unmistakable terms of the law require such officers, upon making the arrest of a person on a criminal charge, to take such person before a magistrate without delay, where the accused may be arraigned upon a sworn complaint and secure a judicial hearing. The magistrate, in the case of petitioner, acted strictly as his duty required of him in fixing bail and giving the order for release of petitioner pending trial, and, as we shall proceed to show, the right of the chief of police to further detain the petitioner must be justified on grounds having no reference at all to the fact that an accusation had been made in the police court charging petitioner with a crime.

[3] That the health authorities possess the power to place under quarantine restrictions persons whom they have reasonable cause to believe are afflicted with infectious or contagious diseases coming within the definition set forth in Political Code, § 2979a, as a general right, may not be questioned. It is equally true that in the exercise of this unusual power, which infringes upon the right of liberty of the individual, personal restraint can only be imposed where, under the facts as brought within the knowledge of the health authorities, reasonable ground exists to support the belief that the person is afflicted as claimed; and as to whether such order is justified will depend upon the facts of each individual case.

[4, 5] Where a person so restrained of his or her liberty questions the power of the health authorities to impose such restraint, the burden is immediately upon the latter to justify by showing facts in support of the order. It might be proved, for instance, that the suspected person had been exposed to contagious or infectious influences; that some person had contracted such disease from him or her, as the case might be. Such proof would furnish tangible ground for the belief that the person was afflicted as claimed. And we wish here to emphasize the proposition, which is unanswerable in law, that a mere suspicion, unsupported by facts giving rise to reasonable or probable cause, will afford no justification at all for depriving persons of their liberty and subjecting them to virtual imprisonment under a purported order of quarantine.

[6] Coming then to a case where it is claimed that the person suspected is one whose habits are such as to warrant the belief that they are afflicted with a venereal disease: We may agree that in cases of persons who commit acts of prostitution—that is, acts that are commonly understood to fall within the "commercial vice" definition—such a majority of them may be afflicted with infectious venereal disease as to justify the health department in enforcing the preliminary quarantine measures as here shown against any such; in other words, that, based upon the experience of the health authorities as it is stated to be in the return, it is reasonably probable that a person found to be of the class mentioned is so infected with such disease. The presumption which this statement allows to be made as against the individual in the first instance has its foundation in the fact that women of ill fame, by the very nature of their occupation, indulge in repeated and promiscuous acts of sexual intercourse. We have held heretofore (Ex parte Dillon et al., 186 Pac. 170) that this inference which the health authorities seek to draw was not a fairly reasonable one to be deduced under proof of sexual acts between individuals charged under an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles forbidding intercourse between unmarried persons, which ordinance had as its intent the prevention of hotels and lodging houses being resorted to for such purpose. The distinction that is suggested between the two classes of cases is apparent and requires no argument to illustrate the reason for it.

[7] If the health authorities rely upon the claim that the person quarantined is a prostitute and hence likely to be afflicted with disease, then the burden is on the quarantine officers to establish the proof of the claim that the accused is of the class and character mentioned. If such person has been legally convicted of being of such class and character, the record of conviction may be relied upon to establish the important fact. In the absence of such conviction, the burden will be with the health authorities to establish the fact by sufficient evidence; for it is the existence of that condition in the person suspected that furnishes the ground for the belief, as an inference only, that the disease exists. It will not do to allow the inference of probable cause to be drawn from a mere suspicion.

[8] We have gone to the pains of making clear our view of the law in the case under discussion. The health authorities, with capable counsel at their elbow, no doubt are well advised of the limitations attached to their powers as they have been herein stated to be. One of the most important rights guaranteed under our Constitution, that of the liberty of the citizen, is involved and cannot be lightly passed over, nor can encroachments upon that right be tolerated even under the argument that, in the main, the general result sought is a beneficent one. The law may not be set at defiance, even to subserve the best-intentioned effort; much less by officers who have taken an oath to uphold it.

[9] At the hearing of this writ proof was not offered to be made that petitioner was at the time of her arrest a woman of ill fame. The narrative contained in the return of alleged acts in which the police officer took part cannot be taken as proof that the charge made against petitioner in the police court was true.

No sufficient cause has been shown authorizing respondent to detain petitioner in his custody.

CENTRAL IRON WORKS v. CALIFORNIA BAKING CO. (Civ. 3736.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 28, 1921. Rehearing Denied May 27, 1921.)

Appeal and error ⇐1011(1) — Judgment on conflicting evidence affirmed.

Where the only question presented by the record on appeal is the sufficiency of the evidence as to the existence of a contract sued on, and the evidence sharply and substantially conflicts on every point in which the execution and validity of the contract is involved, a judgment for defendant on finding in its favor by the trial court must be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the Central Iron Works against the California Baking Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Louis H. Brownstone, of San Francisco, for appellant.

tum Suden & tum Suden, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was instituted by the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendant for its alleged breach of a contract by the terms of which the plaintiff was alleged to have had its aid for the steel work upon a certain structure in contemplation of erection by the defendant accepted, but performance thereunder prevented by the fact that the defendant did not construct the building for the steel work upon which the plaintiff's bid had been made. The defendant by its answer denied that such a contract had ever been entered into by it, and the cause went to trial upon that issue, in the course of which a large amount of evidence was presented pro and con by the respective parties; and the cause being submitted the court made general findings to the effect that those paragraphs of the plaintiff's complaint wherein it was alleged that the contract had been entered into between the respective parties to the action in substance as above stated were untrue, and that the paragraph of the defendant's answer wherein the existence of any such contract was denied, was true. Judgment was accordingly rendered in the defendant's favor, and from such judgment this appeal has been taken.

We have carefully examined the somewhat voluminous record herein with a view to ascertaining whether any other question is presented than that of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and judgment of the trial court; and we are not only unable to find that any other question is so presented, but we are able to find that upon the single issue of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and judgment of the trial court the evidence is so sharply and substantially conflicting upon every point in which the execution and validity of the contract in dispute is involved as to bring the case fully within the rule universally applied to such cases.

The appellant's two contentions are: First, that the defendant's secretary in indorsing upon the plaintiff's bid the words, "Accepted on behalf of the California Baking Company, M. Wiessenhutter, Secretary," had power to bind, and hence had bound, the corporation; and, second, that its board of directors by their subsequent conduct, with knowledge on the part of a majority of their number of the existence of such indorsement, had ratified the action of its secretary. On both of these questions the evidence is hopelessly in conflict. An instance of these irreconcilable conflicts in the testimony may be cited. The architect Righetti testified that a short while before the defendant's secretary came to his office and affixed said indorsement to the plaintiff's bid, he had received a telephone message from Mr. Loesch, the president and general manager of the defendant, that he was sending Mr. Wiessenhutter to sign the bid. Mr. Loesch himself was dead at the time of the trial, and hence his testimony was not available; but the secretary himself testified that he had not been so instructed nor so sent nor authorized, but had acted entirely upon his own initiative in the matter, and had affixed his signature to the bid in question without authority or direction so to do but under certain persuasions on the part of the architect. In the presence of conflicts in the evidence of which the above is but one of many examples, the trial court made its findings against the plaintiff's contention.

The attitude of this court with relation to cases wherein the evidence is substantially conflicting is set forth clearly and at length in the case of Anglo-American Land Co. v. Heine (No. 3734), 198 Pac. 1009, just decided, to which reference is made.

With the legal questions and cases presented by the appellant we have no present dispute, but the substantial conflicts in the evidence as to which these are sought to be applied leave no room for their application.

The judgment is affirmed.

DANTON v. HAAS et al. (Civ. 3477.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 26, 1921.)

Apprentices ⇐14 — Obligation to provide for indentured child ceases with master's death.

Under Domestic Relations Law N. Y. art. 8, § 121, and Laws 1872, c. 635, amending the charter of the New York Foundling Hospital, the obligation of the master to whom an orphan child is indentured to provide maintenance and instruction for the minor terminates with the death of the master, and any covenants as to maintenance, etc., must end with death, as does the correlative obligation to serve; hence there can be no recovery on behalf of a foundling indentured to a woman who agreed to maintain the child as her own during infancy and in event of returning the child to provide a full outfit, but, in case the child continued in her service until reaching majority, to provide a trust fund and make a bequest in her behalf, where the woman died during the infancy of the child.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Beatrice Danton, a minor, by the Title Insurance & Trust Company, her guardian, against Walter F. Haas and another, executors of the estate of Rosa Von Zimmerman, deceased, and others. From a judgment for defendants granted on motion for nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. A. Gibbs, of Pasadena, for appellant.

H. L. Dunnigan and L. A. Lewis, both of Los Angeles, for respondents Walter F. Haas and others, executors.

Walter Loewy, of San Francisco, and Edward F. Wehrle, of Los Angeles, for respondents Klara Kombst and others.

CONREY, P. J. The New York Foundling Hospital is a corporation of the state of New York. Its charter was amended by chapter 635, Laws of New York of the year 1872, which statute was in force at all times herein mentioned. That law authorized the corporation to receive and keep under its care, charge, custody, and management certain classes of children. The corporation was given power, when children in their care attained a proper age, to place them at suitable employments and cause them to be instructed in suitable branches of knowledge, and had discretion to bind out or indenture such children as clerks, apprentices, or servants, to some profession, trade, or employment, for such time or period as they may deem proper, not exceeding, however, in the case of girls, the age of 18 years. Section 6 reads as follows:

"In the case of the death of any master to whom any child shall have been bound to service under the provisions of this act, * * * then such death shall have the effect to cancel and annul the indenture or contract of service; and thereupon the said corporation shall resume the charge and management of such child, and have the same power and authority with regard to it as before the indenture or contract of service was made."

On the 29th day of June, 1912, the hospital had in its care and custody the plaintiff, Beatrice Danton, then three years of age. On that day, by an agreement in writing entered into between said hospital and Rosa Von Zimmerman, the hospital, as party of the first part, placed and indentured the said Beatrice Danton to Rosa Von Zimmerman, as party of the second part, "as her own child in every respect until the said Beatrice Danton shall arrive at her legal majority, to live with, and be employed by, the said party of the second part in and about her house and household, and the affairs thereof, and to be instructed therein and also as hereinafter specified. * * *" The party of the second part agreed, among other things:

"I. That during all the time aforesaid Baroness Rosa Von Zimmerman will provide said Beatrice Danton with suitable and proper board, lodging, and medical attendance, and all things necessary and fit for any indentured child, and in all respects similar to what would ordinarily be provided and allowed by the said party of the second part, or one in her station of life, for her own child or children. If the said child is returned to the party of the first part when she shall reach her legal majority, then the party of the second part shall give to said child a new Bible, a complete suit of new clothes, together with all those she shall then have in use, and an outfit of at least the same in every respect as their own child."

II. To provide for the education and instruction of the minor, as stated, "and generally that said child shall be maintained, clothed, educated, and treated with like care and tenderness as if she were in fact the child of the party of the second part, and will provide for said child, financially and in every other way, as if the said child were adopted by the said party of the second part under the laws of the state of New York."

VIII. It was further provided that if the child be not returned to the party of the first part when she attains her legal majority, or before that time, and the agreement of indenture canceled and annulled by consent of both parties, the party of the second part agreed to provide for said child as follows: "If said child shall attain the age of 18 years, the party of the second part agrees, in consideration of this indenture and of being permitted by the party of the first part to keep said child, to create a trust fund or $15,000, said $15,000 to be deposited with I. & W. Seligman, of New York City, as trustee. The interest of said trust fund of $15,000 is to be devoted by the said trustee to the care and maintenance and education of said Beatrice Danton until the said Beatrice Danton shall attain the age of 30, at which time the principal and any accumulations of interest are to be paid over to her."

"IX. And the party of the second part further agrees that her last will and testament shall contain a provision giving and bequeathing to the said Beatrice Danton a further sum of $15,000. In the event of the death of the party of the second part before the said Beatrice Danton shall attain the age of thirty, said sum of $15,000 is to be deposited with the I. & W. Seligman, and the interest devoted to the care and maintenance of Beatrice Danton until she shall attain the age of 30, when the principal and any accumulations of interest shall be given to her."

After the indenture had been made, Rosa Von Zimmerman took Beatrice Danton into her possession and brought her to the county of Los Angeles, state of California, where they resided until the death of the Baroness Von Zimmerman, which occurred on the 25th day of April, 1917. The baroness left an estate of large value, apparently sufficient to satisfy the claims at issue in this action. After the 25th day of April, 1917, the Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation, was duly appointed guardian of the estate of said minor, and as such guardian presented two claims against the estate of Rosa Von Zimmerman, one for $50,000, to provide maintenance and care for said minor until she should reach her majority, and another for $30,000, $15,000 thereof to be placed in trust with I. & W. Seligman of New York, and $15,000, which it was alleged that under said agreement Rosa Von Zimmerman agreed should be provided in her will to and for the benefit of said Beatrice Danton. The claim for $50,000 was rejected. The claim for $30,000 was allowed and paid as to the $15,000 agreed to be provided by the will of the deceased, and as to the remainder of the $30,000 claim the claim was rejected. The will of Rosa Von Zimmerman made no provision for said Beatrice Danton. This action to recover upon the rejected claims was brought by the guardian against the executors and the beneficiaries named in the will of the deceased. Answer having been made denying all of the material allegations of the complaint, the case went to trial. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence a motion for nonsuit was granted and judgment entered in favor of defendants. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The facts are not in dispute. The questions upon which the appeal rests are questions of law and of interpretation of the contract, the answers to which will determine the rights of the plaintiff to the relief demanded.

The terms of the indenture which provides for instruction to be given to the minor were placed therein pursuant to the statute mentioned above, together with certain other statutes, all of which were mentioned in the articles of indenture. These statutes were by stipulation introduced into the record as admitted facts of this case. Aside from the provisions of section 6 of chapter 635, which we have stated, the only other provision relating to the education of indentured children, in the statutes referred to in the contract, is contained in chapter 14 of the Consolidated Laws (Domestic Relations Law, art. 8, § 121) of the state of New York. In subdivision 9 of that section it is provided that if a minor is indentured by the authorities of an orphan asylum, the master or employer shall agree to cause the child "to be instructed in reading, writing and the general rules of arithmetic."

Concerning the first rejected claim, it was stated in the demand as presented to the executors, and is now claimed by the plaintiff, that the sum of $50,000 is the amount necessary to carry out the terms of the indenture, wherein the deceased agreed to provide said minor child with proper board, lodging, medical attention, and to maintain, clothe, and educate said minor, and to provide for said minor financially and in every other way until said minor shall reach her majority. As the minor was only seven years old at the time of the death of Rosa Von Zimmerman, this period of minority, unexpired at the time of said death, was about eleven years. In the statement of the case made by counsel for appellant, we fail to observe that any evidence or stipulation was introduced to prove that the sum required would amount to $50,000, or any other definite sum. But since no point is made concerning this, we shall assume that, if there had been no judgment of nonsuit, the court might have been placed in position to determine the reasonable amount necessary for the stated purposes. The inventoried value of the estate exceeded $2,000,000, and it was stipulated that, "if it becomes a matter for the court to decide," the exact value of the estate might be shown.

Under the laws of New York which apply to the case, the obligation of the master to provide maintenance and instruction for the minor terminates with the death of the master. In a New Jersey case arising under similar laws of New York it was held that the covenants on the part of the master were personal, and that the covenant for support must end with his death, as also did the correlative obligation to serve. Petrie v. Voorhees' Executor, 18 N. J. Eq. 285. We think that this is the true rule. It also seems clear that the contract in the case at bar was made upon the assumption that this was the law. Being willing, however, that the minor should be provided for beyond her minority, if until attaining the age of 18 years she remained with Rosa Von Zimmerman, the latter agreed that in that event she would create a trust fund, the interest whereof would be devoted to the maintenance of Beatrice Danton until she became 30 years old, when the entire fund would be paid to her. And being further willing to provide for the support of said Beatrice Danton even in the event of her own death, Rosa Von Zimmerman further agreed to make a bequest in favor of the child, in the manner stated in the contract of indenture. This last provision would not have been necessary to accomplish the purpose stated, if the other obligations assumed were those claimed by appellant. Fulfillment of the condition upon which Rosa Von Zimmerman could have been required to create a trust fund available in her lifetime has become impossible. The demand for a fund of $50,000 to provide an income for appellant's support is based upon the same theory which the parties must have had in mind in making the agreement that the will of decedent should provide a fund of $15,000 for the ward's benefit. For that fund was to provide for her maintenance and support during her minority, although, in addition, she would have further support, and ultimately receive the entire fund. This express agreement having been made, no other may be raised by implication. Admitting it to be true, as contended by counsel for appellant, that the contract was far more generous than the statutes required in the case of such an indenture, and that "the baroness" undertook to treat the child as her own, the limits of the agreement are, nevertheless, fixed and determined. We think that those limits exclude the demands made in this action.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SPRAGUE. (Cr. 760.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 27, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⊂=351(1)—Conduct of suspected person showing consciousness of guilt is admissible.

The conduct of a suspected person charged with crime, when such as to show a consciousness of guilt, is always admissible.

2. Criminal law ⊂=351(1), 722(2)—Evidence of defendant's appearance and conduct when he met witness held admissible, and argument thereon proper.

Evidence that when defendant met a witness who he must have known was the occupant of the room adjoining that in which the crime was committed his face was disfigured and that he appeared blanched or somewhat excited was admissible, and it was permissible to argue therefrom that he did or did not behave as an innocent person would under similar circumstances.

3. Criminal law ⊂=448(11)—Evidence concerning defendant's appearance held admissible over objection that it was a conclusion.

Evidence that when defendant met a witness soon after a crime was claimed to have been committed his face was disfigured and he appeared blanched or somewhat excited was admissible over the objection that it was a conclusion, as the observations of an ordinary witness concerning the various mental and emotional aspects of humanity are admissible.

4. Criminal law ⊂=822(4) — Introductory statement in instruction stating prosecution's contention held not erroneous as assuming fact in dispute.

A statement by the court in the charge that the prosecution contended that the crime was rape because at the time it was alleged to have been committed the prosecutrix was under the age of 18 years was not erroneous as assuming as a fact that she was under 18, where it was but introductory to an instruction to convict only in case the jury found beyond a reasonable doubt that she was under 18, as no juror of ordinary intelligence could have understood it otherwise than as a mere statement of the prosecution's contention.

5. Criminal law ⊂=822(1)—Charge must be taken as a whole in determining correctness.

To determine whether or not the law was properly declared for the guidance of the jury, the charge as a whole, and not an isolated excerpt therefrom, must be looked to.

6. Criminal law ⊂=785(8)—Refusal to charge that witness may not be impeached by particular wrongful acts held not error.

Where witnesses who testified that defendant's general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity was bad testified on cross-examination that their testimony was based on conversations with creditors who had difficulty in collecting debts, and the court charged that a witness might be impeached by evidence that his reputation for truth or honesty was bad, an instruction that a witness might not be impeached by evidence of particular wrongful acts was properly refused, as it was the duty of the jury to consider the testimony of the character witnesses in its entirety, including the cross-examination as well as the direct examination.

7. Criminal law ⊂=1186(4)—Judgment not reversed for refusal of instruction unless there has been a miscarriage of justice.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, the refusal of an instruction that a witness could not be impeached by proof of particular acts does not require a reversal where after reading the evidence the court is not of the opinion that a miscarriage of justice has been caused by the error.

8. Criminal law ⊂=829(1)—Refusal of instruction covered by those given not error.

The refusal of a requested instruction was not error where the subject-matter was completely and correctly covered in the charge to the jury, and the jury were clearly advised upon all the principles of law pertinent to the charge set forth in the information.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

J. A. Sprague was convicted of rape and he appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

E. I. Feemster, of Visalia, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant, who was convicted of the crime of rape, committed on the body of a young girl 16 years of age, appeals from the judgment and order denying him a new trial.

[1-3] A witness for the prosecution—a man who occupied a room adjoining that in which it was claimed the offense was committed—after testifying that he witnessed the criminal act and that he met defendant shortly thereafter, was asked by the prosecuting attorney on his direct examination what was defendant's appearance when he thus met him. Defendant's counsel objected upon the ground that the question called for the conclusion of the witness. The objection being overruled, the witness testified that defendant's face was rather disfigured, and that he appeared blanched or somewhat excited. The conduct of a suspected person charged with crime, when it is such as to show a consciousness of guilt, is always admissible. It was pertinent to show, therefore, how defendant behaved under the trying circumstances when he met, face to face, the man whom he must have known was the occupant of the room adjoining that in which he is alleged to have satisfied his lustful passions on the body of this young girl. It was permissible to argue that defendant did or did not behave as would an innocent person under similar circumstances. The weight of the testimony was for the jury, but it was not error to admit it. People v. Rowell, 133 Cal. 39, 65 Pac. 127; People v. Cole, 141 Cal. 90, 74 Pac. 547; People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 339, 86 Pac. 671. Nor was the question objectionable upon the ground that it called for the conclusion of the witness—the only ground of objection made in the court below. The observations of ordinary witnesses concerning the various mental and emotional aspects of humanity are admissible in evidence. Thus, when the subject-matter is relevant, it is permissible to ask a witness what was the appearance of another as to anger, fear, intoxication, etc.

"There are," says the court in Robinson v. Exempt Fire Co., 103 Cal. 5, 36 Pac. 956, 24 L. R. A. 715, 42 Am. St. Rep. 93, "many cases where a witness, though not an expert, may be permitted to state the result of his observation, notwithstanding it involves, in a sense, his opinion or judgment, such as the apparent state of health of a person, whether a person is drunk or sober, or other characteristic or state which manifests itself to the apprehension of the common observer."

See People v. Lavelle, 71 Cal. 351, 12 Pac. 226; People v. Monteith, 73 Cal. 7, 14 Pac. 373; People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 260, 46 Pac. 1073; People v. Sehorn, 116 Cal. 511, 48 Pac. 495; Holland v. Zollner, 102 Cal. 633, 36 Pac. 930, 37 Pac. 231; People v. Arrighini, 122 Cal. 121, 54 Pac. 591.

[4, 5] Complaint is made of an instruction beginning:

"In this case the prosecution contends that the crime is rape, because at the time the offense is alleged to have been committed as set forth in the information, Grace ——— was under the age of 18 years."

It is claimed that this part of the instruction assumes as a fact that the prosecutrix was under the age of 18 years. We think the language is not fairly open to this construction. The clause we have quoted is but introductory to an instruction whereby the jurors were told, in substance and effect, that it is their duty to convict only in the event that they shall "find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that at the time mentioned Grace ——— was under the age of 18 years." In the introductory sentence complained of by appellant—that which precedes the instruction as to what facts the jurors must believe beyond a reasonable doubt before they might justly find defendant guilty—the court was dealing solely with the prosecution's contention respecting its theory of the case, and was not declaring as a fact that the prosecutrix was under the age of 18 years at the time when it was claimed that the crime was committed. To determine whether or not the law was properly declared for the guidance of the jury, we are to look, not to an isolated excerpt from an instruction, but to the charge as a whole. People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 370, 97 Pac. 871. When the whole instruction is read and considered in its entirety, we are satisfied that no juror of ordinary intelligence could have taken the language complained of as being aught than a mere statement by the court that the prosecution was contending that the girl was under 18 years of age, and that for that reason it was further contending that the crime of rape had been committed.

[6] On rebuttal, and after defendant had testified as a witness in his own behalf, the prosecution put on the stand several witnesses, each of whom, on his direct examination, testified that he knew defendant's general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity in the community in which he lived, and that it was bad. On the cross-examination of some of these witnesses defendant's counsel drew out the fact that their testimony as to defendant's general reputation, given on their direct examination, was based upon conversations which they had had with some of defendant's creditors, wherein the latter had stated to the witnesses that they, the creditors, had had difficulty in collecting debts due them from defendant. The lower court instructed the jury that "a witness may be impeached by the party against whom he is called, by contradictory evidence or by evidence that his reputation for truth, honesty, or integrity is bad." The court refused to give, at defendant's request, a similar instruction with the additional admonition that a witness may not be impeached "by evidence of particular wrongful acts." It is argued that the requested instruction should have been given that thereby the jury might have been instructed to eliminate from their consideration the testimony respecting the difficulties defendant's creditors had had with him in the collection of their claims. The refusal to give the instruction was not error. There is no claim that the testimony of the character witnesses was not admissible. Their testimony, and all of it, was in the case for the jury's consideration. It was the jury's duty to consider the testimony of each of the character witnesses in its entirety in order to determine the weight to be given it. It was their duty to consider the facts brought out on the cross-examination as well as those adduced on the direct examination, in order to determine whether the prosecution had established the evil character of defendant's general reputation for truth, honesty, or integrity. And if, after such consideration, the jury believed defendant's reputation to be bad, they were at liberty to take that fact into consideration in determining the weight to be given this testimony. The jury's duty thus to consider the evidence accords precisely with that enjoined upon them by the court's instruction to the effect that a witness of an adverse party may be impeached by contradictory evidence or by evidence that his general reputation for truth, honesty, or integrity is bad. See Steeples v. Newton, 7 Or. 110, 33 Am. Rep. 705, where the court upheld an instruction to the effect that evidence of misunderstandings that the impeached witness had had with his neighbors, if brought out on the cross-examination of the impeaching witnesses, may be considered by the jury as affecting the credibility of the impeached witness.

[7] Moreover, even if we should concede, though we do not, that it was error to refuse an instruction in the form requested by defendant, nevertheless the evidence in this case is of such a character that it satisfies us that no miscarriage of justice could result; and unless, after reading the evidence, this court shall be of the opinion that a miscarriage of justice has been caused by any error in giving or refusing instructions, the judgment cannot be set aside. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

[8] Complaint is made of the court's refusal to give two other instructions requested by defendant. The subject-matter of each of these was completely and correctly covered in the court's charge to the jury, who were clearly advised upon all the principles of law pertinent to the charge set forth in the information. The trial court, therefore, did not err in refusing to give the requested instructions.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

JACKSON v. WILDE, Mayor of City of San Diego, et al. (Civ. 3116.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 15, 1921.)

1. Master and servant ⊂=364—Fireman an "officer" and not "employee" within Compensation Act prior to its amendment.

A regularly appointed member of a city fire department is an officer and not an employee in the sense that he is not in service of contract of hire, so that firemen were not included in the Workmen's Compensation Act prior to its amendment by statute of 1917, p. 835, so as to make the term employee include all elected and appointed paid public officers.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé; Officer.]

2. Municipal corporations ⊂=199—Charter reference held to incorporate ordinance giving fireman sick leave with pay.

The amendment of San Diego Charter, art. 2, c. 1, § 2, in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1828), expressly continuing in force an ordinance reorganizing the fire department and providing for a firemen's relief and pension fund, makes the ordinance, including the provision for leave of absence with pay in case of sickness contracted while on duty, a part of the city's organic law.

3. Municipal corporations ⊂=176(3) — Fixing compensation of fireman is municipal affair as to which freeholder's charter prevails over general law.

The fixing of the compensation to be received by city firemen under the authority given by Const. art. 11, § 8½, subd. 4, to provide for compensation for municipal officers and employees, is a municipal affair within the meaning of article 11, § 6, so that such provision is paramount to any general law respecting the matters dealt with in ordinance fixing compensation.

4. Municipal corporations ⊂=199—Officer is entitled to pay while disabled by sickness.

The salary of a public officer is an incident to the title of the office and not to its occupation or exercise, so that a fireman who is a public officer is entitled to compensation although he may be disabled by sickness from performing its duties if there is no law or regulation authorizing a discontinuance of compensation during disability.

5. Master and servant ⊂364—Municipal corporations ⊂199—Pay of fireman during sick leave is not "compensation for injury."

Payment of salary of fireman under the terms of the city ordinance for the period while he was on leave of absence for sickness contracted while on duty is not "compensation for injury" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

6. Mandamus ⊂71—Lies to enforce particular act clearly required by law.

Although mandamus will not lie to control the discretion of an inferior tribunal or officer, that is, will not lie to enforce a particular decision, it will lie to enforce action by the inferior tribunal or officer when the law clearly establishes a petitioner's right to such action with no room for the exercise of discretion.

7. Mandamus ⊂101—Issued to compel auditing board to allow claim which it had no discretion to reject.

Though mandamus will not issue against auditing body to allow a claim the determination of which involves the exercise of some quasi judicial or discretionary power, it will issue to compel the allowance of a claim with respect to which the auditing board has not discretion.

8. Municipal corporations ⊂1012—Auditing board held to have no discretion to disallow pay to fireman granted sick leave with pay.

Under a city ordinance authorizing the fire superintendent to grant a fireman leave of absence with pay during a sickness contracted while on duty, the determination by the superintendent that a fireman's sickness was so contracted is conclusive, and the auditing board has no discretion to disallow the fireman's salary during such lease, though the pay roll as made out and verified by fire chief must pass through the hands of the auditing committee in the ordinary course of business.

9. Municipal corporations ⊂199—Evidence held to sustain fire chief's finding fireman contracted sickness in the line of duty.

Evidence that a fireman was on duty 24 hours a day except for one day in every five or six, and that the nature of his duties made him peculiarly subject to colds, held sufficient to sustain the fire chief's finding that the cold contracted by a fireman which subsequently turned into influenza was contracted while on duty, though the particular time when it was contracted was not established.

10. Mandamus ⊂101—Fire chief's determination fireman's sickness was contracted in line of duty is conclusive.

In mandamus to compel allowance of a fireman's compensation during time he was absent on leave with pay, the fire chief's determination, in granting leave of absence, that the fireman's sickness was contracted while on duty is conclusive, if rendered in the exercise of his honest judgment.

11. Mandamus ⊂187(9)—Errors in rules of evidence as to question on which fire chief's determination was conclusive are not prejudicial.

In mandamus to compel allowance of fireman's salary for the time he was on sick leave with pay, where the fire chief's determination that the fireman's sickness was contracted while on duty was conclusive, error in rulings on questions asked the fire chief as witness relating to the fireman's sickness were not prejudicial to defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Petition of A. L. Jackson for a writ of mandate to Louis J. Wilde, as mayor of the City of San Diego, and others. From a judgment granting the writ, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. B. Cosgrove, City Atty., of Los Angeles, S. J. Higgins, of San Diego, and Arthur F. H. Wright, of Bisbee, Ariz., for appellants.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, a member of the fire department of the city of San Diego, awarding a peremptory writ of mandate commanding defendants, as members of the city's auditing committee, to allow, approve, and order paid the city's pay rolls for the months of January and February, 1919, in so far as the same pertain to plaintiff's salary.

Since 1889, San Diego has been operating under a freeholders' charter. This charter provides for an auditing committee whose duty it shall be "to examine, allow, and order paid, or reject and disallow all claims, demands and bills of whatever nature (except monthly salaries of city officers as fixed by this charter) which may be presented against the city." It is further provided that "the auditor shall not draw a warrant for any bill unless the same has been approved by a majority of the whole auditing committee," and that "all demands, bills and claims which may arise against the city, including the pay roll of all employees of the city, whether under regular monthly salary or not (except salaries of city officers fixed by this charter), shall be duly verified as hereinafter provided, and shall be filed with the secretary of the auditing committee, who shall file and number the same in the order of presentation, and refer the same to the auditing committee for action, whose duty it shall be to allow or reject the same, in whole or in part, and if allowed, designate the particular funds from which they are to be paid. * * *" Stats. 1889, p. 704.

Plaintiff, for seven or eight years past, has been a fireman regularly employed in the city's fire department at a monthly salary of $125, less the sum of $1 per month which the city treasurer is required to retain from the monthly pay of every member of the department to be paid into the firemen's relief and pension fund. In January, 1913, an ordinance numbered 4979, and entitled "An ordinance reorganizing the San Diego fire department and providing for a firemen's relief and pension fund," was regularly adopted. This ordinance provides that the city's fire department shall be under the management of the superintendent of fire, who, subject to the approval of the common council, shall organize the department, create such fire companies as he may deem necessary, prescribe the number and duties of the officers and employees, and exercise full power and authority over all appropriations made for the use of the department, subject to the approval of the common council. Section 8 of the ordinance provides:

"The superintendent of the department may grant such leave of absence with full pay, not to exceed one year, to any fireman who has contracted sickness or disability in the line of duty. * * * The chief of the fire department may grant such leave of absence, not to exceed thirty days, with full pay, or for other reasons, a leave of absence without pay."

In the months of January and February, 1919, one Louis Almgren was both superintendent and chief of the fire department. Plaintiff, some time shortly prior to January 26, 1919, contracted a cold. Upon the ground that plaintiff's cold was a sickness or disability contracted by him in the line of his duty as a fireman, Almgren, as superintendent and chief of the fire department, granted plaintiff a leave of absence, with full pay, from and including January 26, 1919, to and including February 8, 1919. Almgren made out the department's pay roll for each of the months of January and February. Each pay roll contained a provision to the effect that plaintiff was entitled to the full amount of his monthly salary of $125, less the $1 required to be deducted for the firemen's relief and pension fund. The pay rolls were duly approved and verified by Almgren, as provided by said Ordinance No. 4979, and on March 20, 1919, they were delivered to the secretary of the auditing committee for the committee's allowance and approval. On March 26th each of the pay rolls, so far as it related to plaintiff's salary, was disallowed and rejected by the auditing committee upon the ground that plaintiff's sickness and disability was not contracted in the line of his duty as a member of the fire department, and that therefore he was not entitled to any salary during the time he was absent from duty. The trial court found that plaintiff's sickness was contracted in the line of his duty, and adjudged that the writ issue commanding defendants, as members of the auditing committee, to allow, approve, and order paid each of the pay rolls in so far as they pertain to plaintiff's salary.

[1] Appellants' first contention may thus be stated: If plaintiff were allowed pay during the days he was absent from duty on sick leave, he, in effect, would be receiving from the city of San Diego compensation for "injury," within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act; that act, in section 6, declares that liability for the compensation provided therein for any injury sustained by an employee, arising out of and in the course of his employment, shall exist against his employer in lieu of any other liability for such injury (Stats. 1917, p. 834); the city's charter is silent respecting compensation to city employees for injuries sustained by them in the course of and arising out of their employment; therefore, so the argument runs, the case is within the rule that a city having a freeholders' charter is subject to general laws, even in municipal affairs, when the subject-matter is not covered by the charter; and plaintiff therefore is entitled only to such compensation for the sickness which he claims was contracted by him in the line of his duty as is provided by the Workmen's Compensation Act. In short, the claim is that the provision of the ordinance authorizing the superintendent or chief of the fire department to grant a fireman sick leave on full pay has been superseded by the Workmen's Compensation Act, and no longer is in force. Were it not for the amendment of 1917 to the Workmen's Compensation Act, there would be no possible basis for any such contention, for, prior to that amendment, the act was not applicable to "public officers" (Mono County v. Industrial Acc. Comn., 175 Cal. 752, 167 Pac. 377); and a regularly appointed member of a city's fire department is an "officer," and is not an "employee," in the sense that he is in service under a contract of hire (McDonald v. New Haven, 94 Conn. 403, 109 Atl. 176, 10 A. L. R. 193; see, also, Blynn v. Pontiac, 185 Mich. 35, 151 N. W. 681). In 1917, the statute was amended so as to cause the term "employee," as used in the act, to embrace "all selected and appointed paid public officers." (Stats. 1917, p. 835.)

[2] Appellants' argument assumes that the charter of San Diego is wholly silent upon the right of a fireman to sick leave on full pay. Such, however, is not the case. In 1915, section 2 of chapter I of article 2 of the city's charter was amended, so that subdivision "j" of that section now reads:

"Such manager of operation and superintendents shall be the executive heads of their respective departments and shall appoint and remove their assistants and employees, subject to such civil service regulations as this charter may provide, except that provisions now contained in the People's Ordinance No. 4979 and entitled 'An ordinance reorganizing the San Diego fire department and providing for a firemen's relief and pension fund' shall continue in full force and effect." Stats. 1915, p. 1828.

Here is an express declaration in the city's charter that the provisions of the ordinance under which plaintiff claims the right to full pay for the two months during parts of which he was absent on sick leave "shall continue in full force and effect." To all intents and purposes the ordinance, including the provision that a fireman on sick leave shall be entitled to full pay notwithstanding his enforced absence, has become a part of the city's organic law.

[3] That provision of Ordinance No. 4979 under which plaintiff claims the right to a full month's salary for each of the months of January and February, 1919, relates to the "compensation" of the members of the city's fire department. By subdivision 4 of section 8½, art. 11 of the State Constitution, plenary authority is given to provide in any freeholders' charter, or in any amendment thereto, for the "compensation" that shall be received by every municipal officer or employee. The fixing of the compensation to be received by a city fireman is a "municipal affair," within the meaning of section 6, art. 11. It follows, therefore, that the amendment of 1915 to the charter, whereby it was declared that the provisions of Ordinance No. 4979 "shall continue in full force and effect"—an amendment adopted after section 6 of article 11 had been amended in 1914—is paramount to any general law respecting such matters as are dealt with in the ordinance.

For the foregoing reasons we fail to see how there can possibly be any room for the application of the rule that, with respect to a municipal affair upon which a freeholders' charter is silent, the provisions of any general law pertaining thereto shall control.

[4] Moreover, appellants' contention is based upon the erroneous assumption that if plaintiff receive pay for the time he was away on sick leave he will thereby be receiving compensation for "injury," within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Law. Plaintiff was not employed by the day, nor did he contract for or receive a per diem compensation. He was appointed for an indefinite period, at a fixed monthly salary. His compensation, provided, we assume, by ordinance duly adopted by the common council, was annexed to or was an incident of his office or employment. So long as he continues to fill the office of fireman he is entitled to the full amount of his monthly salary, regardless of any temporary absence from duty, save, of course, in so far as the ordinance in question contemplates that he shall not receive full pay if he be absent from duty without a leave of absence on account of sickness or disability contracted in the line of duty. It is well settled that a person holding a public office has a prima facie right to the salary thereof, although he be physically disabled from performing his duties; and if there be no law or regulation authorizing the discontinuance of the compensation during the disability, the only remedy is his removal. His right to compensation is not by virtue of contract, express or implied, but exists, when it exists at all, as a creature of law and as an incident to the office. Bates v. St. Louis, 153 Mo. 18, 54 S. W. 439, 77 Am. St. Rep. 701; Stratton v. Oulton, 28 Cal. 44; Burke v. Edgar, 67 Cal. 182, 7 Pac. 488; Cavanee v. City of Milan, 99 Mo. App. 672, 74 S. W. 408; O'Leary v. Board of Education, 93 N. Y. 1, 45 Am. Rep. 156; Bryan v. Cattell, 15 Iowa, 538; People v. Bradford, 267 Ill. 486, 108 N. E. 732. As said in Stratton v. Oulton, supra, the salary "is incident to the title to the office and not to its occupation or exercise." 28 Cal. 51. This rule has been held to apply to such public servants as policemen. People v. French, 91 N. Y. 265; State v. Walbridge, 153 Mo. 194, 54 S. W. 447; Frederick v. Peoria, 203 Ill. App. 486. If applicable to policemen, the rule must be equally applicable to firemen.

Plaintiff's title to the office of fireman is not disputed. To that office the law attaches a monthly salary, and to that salary he is entitled so long as the law creating it remains in force and he continues to hold the office. The legal right to the office carries with it the legal right to the salary, and his right thereto is not dependent upon the fact or value of services actually rendered.

[5] Ordinance No. 4979 contemplates the performance of services by a fireman only during such times as he is not incapacitated for duty by reason of sickness or disability. The monthly salary that goes with the office is the fireman's compensation for the services that are contemplated by the ordinance. The salary is not compensation for anything other than the services that are within the purview of the ordinance. In no sense, therefore, can a fireman's fixed monthly salary be regarded as compensation for "injury," within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, even though it be pay for a period of time during a part of which he may have been absent on sick leave.

For the foregoing reasons we conclude that there is no merit in appellants' first contention.

It next is claimed that mandamus is not the proper remedy. Appellants' argument is, in substance, this: The auditing committee, in passing upon the city's pay rolls, is vested with discretionary and judicial powers; in the instant case the committee was vested with power to determine whether plaintiff's alleged illness was contracted in the line of his duty; in deciding that question the committee exercised a discretionary or quasi judicial power; therefore, say counsel for appellants, mandamus will not lie.

[6] While it undoubtedly is true that mandamus will not lie to control the discretion of an inferior tribunal or officer, meaning by that that it will not lie to force the exercise of discretion in a particular manner, it will lie to force a particular action by the inferior tribunal or officer when the law clearly establishes the petitioner's right to such action. Where, by the express declaration of the Legislature or other lawmaking body, a given result must follow a given state of facts, with no room for the play of discretion upon the part of the inferior tribunal or officer, the writ may issue to compel the granting of specific relief. Inglin v. Hoppin, 156 Cal. 483, 105 Pac. 582. In Hensley v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 541, 44 Pac. 232, the superior court had refused to make or enter an order or decree of due notice to creditors, upon the ground that the order for the notice was not in conformity with the law. The Supreme Court, in issuing its mandate, declared:

"Where, as here, the law affixes a right to specific relief upon certain facts, and there is no question made as to the existence of such facts, the court has no discretion to refuse the relief. In such a case the limit of the discretionary power of the court has been reached, and nothing but a clear duty remains; and if the relief is refused, and there is, as in this instance, no appeal or other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, mandamus will lie to compel it."

[7] Though the writ will not issue against an auditing body to allow a claim where the determination of whether the claim should be allowed or rejected involves the exercise of some quasi judicial or discretionary power, the nature of the claim may be such as not to require the exercise of any judgment or discretion whatever. In that case the writ may issue to compel the committee or auditing body to audit and approve the claim. Lawrence v. Booth, 46 Cal. 187; Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. 766, 9 Am. St. Rep. 249; Hammel v. Neylan, 31 Cal. App. 21, 159 Pac. 618; Bryan v. Cattrell, supra.

[8] In the instant case, defendants, members of the auditing committee provided for by the San Diego city charter, were not called upon to exercise any legal discretion whatever. By the express terms of the ordinance under which plaintiff claims the right to a full month's salary for each of the months of January and February, Almgren, as superintendent and chief of the fire department, was vested with the whole power to grant leave of absence, with full pay, to any fireman who, in the chief's opinion, had contracted sickness or disability in the line of duty. Almgren, who at this time was both superintendent and chief of the fire department, alone had the right to pass upon the sufficiency of the cause of absence, and whether it had been produced by sickness or disability contracted in the public service; and the right of any fireman to sick leave rested solely and entirely in his discretion. See Santa Minto v. City of New York, 3 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 386.

The superintendent and chief of the fire department having, in the exercise of the discretionary power with which he alone is vested, granted to plaintiff a leave of absence with full pay, on the ground that he had contracted sickness while acting in the line of his duty, the ordinance, upon that state of facts, steps in and declares, in effect, that plaintiff is entitled to his full month's pay without any deduction whatever, save, of course, the one dollar that goes to the firemen's relief and pension fund. No room, therefore, was left for the exercise of any discretion on the part of the auditing committee, and it clearly was the duty of the superior court to issue its mandate to defendants, that thereby plaintiff might be accorded the right to which the city's ordinances indubitably entitle him. Sullivan v. Gage, 145 Cal. 759, 79 Pac. 537, a case upon which appellants place much reliance, is nowise inimical to our conclusion that mandamus is a proper remedy. The claim that was presented to the state board of examiners in that case was one essentially calling for the exercise of the board's discretion and judgment. Discretion and judgment were exercised by the board, with the result that the claim was rejected. Here the only question involving the exercise of discretion or judgment was: Did plaintiff contract his illness while acting for the city in the line of his duty as a fireman? The power and authority to answer that question was lodged in the superintendent and chief of the fire department, where we naturally would expect it to be placed. The authority and power to determine whether plaintiff was ill, and, if he was, whether his illness was contracted in the line of duty, was an authority and power that had to be lodged somewhere. The ordinance, the provisions of which were incorporated into the city's charter by the amendment of 1915, lodges that power in the person who, by reason of his daily association and contact with the men under his supervisory care, is the one best fitted to exercise such discretionary powers—the superintendent and chief of the fire department. True, the pay rolls, when made out, approved, and verified by the fire chief, must pass through the hands of the auditing committee in the ordinary course of business; but the amounts of the salaries allowed by the committee can be no other than such as are fixed by the charter or by ordinance passed pursuant thereto. In the Sullivan Case our Supreme Court quotes from the opinion of the New York Court of Appeals in Osterhoudt v. Rigney, 98 N. Y. 223, as follows:

"The acts of a board of audit, within its jurisdiction, in the absence of fraud or collusion, are final and conclusive, and cannot be questioned on a collateral proceeding. Whether the claim is a proper town or county charge, in a case where it is doubtful, and rests upon disputed evidence, and what amount shall be allowed when not fixed by statute, are questions which the statute commits to the determination of the board of audit; and however much it may err in judgment upon the facts, so long as it keeps within its jurisdiction, and acts in good faith, its audit cannot be overhauled, but is final, as well as to the taxpayers as to the claimant." (Italics ours.)

If plaintiff's rights be measured by this clear and correct statement of the law, it will be apparent that he has not mistaken his remedy. The fire chief, in whom the whole power is lodged, determined that plaintiff contracted illness in the line of his duty, and for that reason gave him leave of absence with full pay. The amount, therefore, to which plaintiff was entitled, was not doubtful, it did not rest upon disputed evidence, and it was definitely fixed by ordinance.

[9] Appellants contend that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that plaintiff contracted sickness and disability in the line of his duty as a member of the fire department. Fire Chief Almgren, the only witness in the case, testified that plaintiff had contracted a cold which later turned into influenza; that plaintiff was on duty 24 hours a day, except one day in every five or six, when he was given a day off duty under a regulation which allows every fireman one day off in every five or six; that firemen are peculiarly subject to colds by reason of their exceptional exposure when on duty; and that at the time in question a great number of the men had colds. Absolute certainty as to the time when plaintiff contracted the cold is not required. It is sufficient that it is more probable that he contracted it while on duty, when he was peculiarly exposed to the ordinary causes of such an illness, than that he "caught the cold," as the saying is, when off duty. See San Francisco v. Industrial Acc. Comn., 191 Pac. 26; Engels, etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comn. (Cal.) 192 Pac. 845; Santa Minto v. City of New York, supra.

[10] Moreover, as we view the case, the question whether plaintiff contracted the cold while on duty was not a proper issue in the case. For reasons already stated, we think that was primarily a question for the fire chief, to be determined by him when he was called upon to decide whether plaintiff should be given a leave of absence with full pay. His decision upon that question, in the exercise of his honest judgment, was final and conclusive; for in him, and in him only, was that discretionary or quasi judicial power lodged. Of course, if he did not exercise an honest judgment, which is nothing other than to say no judgment whatever, then his mere arbitrary or fraudulent ipsi dixit would not vest plaintiff with the rights appertaining to a valid sick leave. But no claim has been made that the fire chief acted fraudulently, collusively, or arbitrarily. No issue of that kind was presented by appellants in their return to the alternative writ. The chief's determination, therefore, that plaintiff was entitled to sick leave on full pay, was final and conclusive.

[11] Finally, the claim is made that the lower court erred in sustaining certain of respondent's objections to questions propounded to the witness by appellants' counsel and in overruling certain objections interposed by appellants to questions put to the witness by respondent's counsel. These contentions are based upon the assumption that the discretionary power to grant leaves of absence, and to determine whether they should be granted with full pay on account of sickness contracted in the line of duty, is not wholly lodged in the superintendent or chief of the fire department, and that the chief's decision thereon is subject to review by the auditing committee. Since we think that the whole power is lodged exclusively in the superintendent and chief, and that an honest exercise of his discretionary power is final and conclusive, we do not think it necessary to consider these objections in detail. The rulings objected to certainly were not prejudicial.

There are no other points that merit consideration.

Judgment affirmed.

FANCHER CREEK NURSERIES v. LOESCHER. (Civ. 3685.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 22, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 20, 1921.)

Principal and agent ⊂63(3)—Contract making agent "personally responsible" for goods sold makes him directly and primarily responsible.

Contract between principal and selling agent providing that he would sell for cash only, and shall be "personally responsible" for all goods sold, makes him, where selling on credit, directly and primarily responsible to his principal, without any necessity of the principal's first resorting to the buyer.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Personally Responsible.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by the Fancher Creek Nurseries against E. F. Loescher. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

N. Lindsay South, of Fresno, for appellant.

Harris, Johnson, Willey & Griffith, of Fresno, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in an action upon a contract by the terms of which the defendant was created the agent of the plaintiff to makes sales of nursery stock.

The contract, which was entered into on December 10, 1918, after providing for the appointment of the defendant as the plaintiff's agent for the purpose of selling and canvassing for the sale of nursery stock, contained a clause providing that the defendant as such agent agreed that he would sell nursery stock for cash only, would keep full and correct accounts of all sales made, and would make remittances promptly as sales and collections were made; the prices at which such sales were to be made were to be fixed from time to time by the principal; the defendant was to receive a commission of 20 per cent. on all sales of nursery stock except citrus and grafted grape vine stock, upon which his commissions were to be 10 per cent., which commissions were to be paid only on orders which had been actually closed and paid for in cash. The clause in said contract out of which this action arose was in the following words:

"The party of the second part shall be personally responsible for all goods sold and bills contracted under this agreement."

The complaint herein was in three counts, the first being a general count in assumpsit for a balance claimed to be due upon the entire amount of business transacted by the defendant as the plaintiff's agent, including an amount claimed to be due upon a direct purchase of nursery stock made by him on his own account. The second count was one to recover the sum of $287.50, the amount of the defendant's said personal purchase; while in the third count the contract was pleaded in full, and only the sum claimed to be due from the defendant for sales made by him to others as the plaintiff's agent was demanded.

The defendant upon the trial and upon this appeal admits his indebtedness in the sum set forth in the second count of the complaint springing from his personal purchase of nursery stock, and only complains of the findings of the trial court as to his liability under the personal responsibility clause in the contract above quoted for sales made by him to others as the plaintiff's agent. The sole question which he thus raises upon this appeal is as to the construction to be placed upon said clause; his contention being that under said clause in his contract he was only to be held liable for such sums as might remain uncollectible after the plaintiff had first had recourse to those whose orders had been taken and filled for nursery stock, and hence that, the plaintiff, not having alleged or proven any demand or attempted recourse upon the parties originally liable upon such orders, it had not shown the existence of a cause of action against the defendant and appellant herein.

We are unable to sustain this contention. The contract in question, when construed as a whole, clearly provides that the defendant, as the plaintiff's agent, should sell for cash only to such customers as he might succeed in obtaining orders from for the plaintiff's nursery stock; the plaintiff being required to fill these orders when so taken. It is quite evident that the principal inserted the clause in said contract providing for the personal responsibility of the defendant upon all orders taken by him for its own protection, and to our minds there is but one reasonable construction to be placed upon said clause, and that is that the agent, being authorized by the terms of his contract to sell for cash only, was bound, in the event of his accepting any orders for nursery stock other than cash orders, to make good such orders in cash directly to his principal.

The case of Fuerst v. Musical Mut. Protective Union (City Ct.) 95 N. Y. Supp. 155, upon which the appellant relies, must be read as to its interpretation of the phrase "personal responsibility" with its context; and when so read it is clear that its definition of that phrase as applicable to that particular case cannot be given application to the facts of the case at bar. The clause in the contract under review in this case would be meaningless if it was not intended to make the agent directly and primarily responsible to his principal upon all orders taken by him. The trial court correctly took this view in its findings and judgment, and, since this is the only question involved in this case, the judgment is affirmed.

A. R. G. BUS CO. v. WHITE AUTO CO.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 1, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 31, 1921.)

1. Evidence ⟸442(6)—Parol evidence held inadmissible to show that 10 order contracts were but parts of a single transaction.

In an action for damages for failure to deliver auto trucks, parol evidence of the circumstances under which 10 order contracts were made, each one stating that it was a complete contract, held inadmissible for the purpose of showing that the order contracts were all but parts of a single transaction, under Civ. Code, §§ 1636, 1642.

2. Customs and usages ⟸17—Parol evidence of custom held inadmissible.

In an action for damages for failure to deliver auto trucks evidence that there was in the automobile business a general and well recognized custom and usage that where trucks were sold and the purchase price not paid in full at the time of the sale, automobile lease contracts in a certain form should be executed, was properly refused; it contradicting the written order contracts, providing that there was not between the parties any understanding or agreement with respect to the sale, "except such as are embraced in the terms therein."

3. Sales ⟸62—Held that there was no supplemental executed oral agreement concerning undelivered motor trucks.

In an action for damages for failure to deliver motor trucks, where defense was that plaintiffs refused to insure the trucks and execute lease contracts and notes, the fact that plaintiffs had executed lease contracts and notes and furnished insurance policies in connection with the delivery of three trucks, which were delivered by defendant, did not constitute an executed supplemental agreement, affecting the terms or performance of the separate and independent contracts involved.

4. Sales ⟸418(2)—Damage difference between contract price and market price on failure to deliver.

Where seller fails and refuses to deliver motor trucks, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price of the trucks at the time when seller repudiates the contract, under Civ. Code, §§ 3308, 3354.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

5. Evidence ⟸442(6)—Parol evidence inadmissible to show that purchaser of auto trucks was to execute lease agreement and take out insurance.

In an action for damages for failure to deliver motor trucks under written order contracts, which provided that there was not between the parties any understanding or agreement with respect to the sale "except such as are embraced in the terms therein," parol evidence was inadmissible to show an oral agreement that purchaser should execute a lease agreement and carry insurance on each truck for the benefit of the seller; there being no provision in the order contracts for the execution of such lease agreement, or any lease agreement at all, whether the order contracts for each truck were or were not parts of a single transaction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by A. R. G. Bus Company against the White Auto Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeals, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Herbert W. Kidd and Eugene D. Williams, both of Los Angeles (A. J. Verheyen and Rex Hardy, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Alfred H. McAdoo and George E. Mills, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On the 18th day of June, 1917 (defendant's corporate name at that time being Pioneer Commercial Auto Company), a contract in writing was entered into between plaintiff and defendant whereby the plaintiff agreed to purchase from defendant an automobile truck therein described, and to pay therefor the stipulated price of $3,383.90. The terms of the contract, so far as it is necessary to set them forth here, are as follows:

"To be paid on delivery $783.90, balance in 18 monthly notes, interest at 8 per cent. per annum. Or said deposit of $——— to be forfeited to the Pioneer Commercial Auto Company as their compensation for withholding sale. Title to above-described property to remain in Pioneer Commercial Auto Company until same is paid for in full. Approximate delivery date as soon as possible."

"It is understood that the car above ordered is subject to the warranty published in the catalogue of the manufacturer, and that no other warranty or guaranty is or will be given, and that there is no understanding or agreement whatsoever between the undersigned and the Pioneer Commercial Auto Company, or its agents, with respect to the above order, except such as are embraced in the terms therein."

The complaint alleged that on said day plaintiff and defendant entered into seven separate contracts, all of which are identical in their provisions and all containing the terms above stated; that under and by virtue of these contracts the plaintiff agreed to purchase from the defendant, and the defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff, seven Model GBBE White automobiles at a total price and consideration of $3,383.90 each; that defendant had wholly refused and failed to make delivery of said automobiles, notwithstanding demand therefor was made by plaintiff; that defendant had announced and declared to plaintiff that it does not intend to and will not make delivery of said automobiles as aforesaid. The first count of the complaint, after stating the foregoing facts, alleges that by reason of the breach and failure of the defendant to deliver said automobiles under and pursuant to the terms of the said contracts, plaintiff has suffered damages in the sum of $9,472.40. There are seven other counts in the complaint, all of which are like the first count, except that each of them states a separate cause of action on one of the seven contracts, and claims damages on account of the defendant's failure and refusal to deliver the automobile described in the contract. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for damages in the sum of $2,500, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

The answer of the defendant, so far as denials of facts alleged are concerned, raises no issue except upon the fact of damage to the plaintiff and the amount thereof. But as a further and affirmative defense, it was alleged in the answer that on said 18th day of June, 1917, plaintiff and defendant entered into one certain contract, whereby the plaintiff agreed to purchase from the defendant, and the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff, 10 White automobile trucks at a price of $3,383.90 per truck, "plus the additional necessary cost of installing upon each of said trucks special bodies therefor." The terms of this alleged contract included a cash payment of $783.90 on delivery of each truck and the giving of 18 notes for the unpaid portions of the purchase price of each of said trucks, with the further provision that a written lease contract as to each of said trucks was to be entered into by plaintiff and defendant on delivery of each of said trucks, and that certain insurance was to be placed on each of said trucks in favor of the defendant at the time of delivery of said trucks to the plaintiff. It was alleged that three of the trucks were delivered, but that the plaintiff failed and refused to place insurance on any of them as required by the alleged contract, or to deliver to the defendant any insurance policies. Further allegations of the answer show that on or about October 1, 1917, the fourth automobile truck included in said contract was ready for delivery, and defendant offered to deliver it to the plaintiff "upon the payment by it to defendant of said sum of $783.90, and upon the furnishing of insurance upon said truck in the sum of $2,600, and thereupon notified plaintiff that unless said payment was made upon said fourth truck, and said insurance furnished thereon not later than October 9, 1917, defendant would refuse to deliver said truck, or any of the remaining six trucks contemplated to be sold and delivered under the terms of said contract"; that plaintiff failed and refused to comply with these demands, and that by reason thereof defendant notified plaintiff that it would refuse to proceed further with the filling of said orders or with the delivery of the remaining seven trucks contemplated to be delivered under the terms of said contract.

Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the court's finding that at the time stated the plaintiff and defendant entered into the seven separate written contracts mentioned in the complaint, and that each one thereof was an independent contract; and that the court erred in refusing to admit parol testimony and other evidence going to prove that the 10 order sheets constituted but one contract. This presents the most important question in the case. It should be noted, however, that the defendant sought, not only to prove that the 10 order sheets constituted but one contract, but also to prove by evidence extraneous to those writings that the plaintiff agreed to sign "lease contracts" and to furnish insurance on the trucks in favor of the defendant. All of this offered evidence was objected to by respondent and excluded by the court. In support of appellant's contention that the court erred in these rulings, we are referred to two sections of the Civil Code and to certain decisions, and especially to Torrey v. Shea, 29 Cal. App. 313, 155 Pac. 820.

"A contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as the same is ascertainable and lawful." Civ. Code, § 1636.

"Several contracts relating to the same matters, between the same parties, and made as parts of substantially one transaction, are to be taken together." Civ. Code, § 1642.

In Torrey v. Shea, supra, the rule is approved that where an inspection of the instruments themselves is not sufficient to ascertain whether or not several writings between the same parties were intended to cover a single contract, the intention of the parties being either not expressed or doubtfully expressed, resort may be had to extrinsic evidence which will show the circumstances under which the several instruments were made, for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties concerning the scope and effect of the several instruments. The rule was so applied in that case that the defendants were permitted to show in evidence a contemporaneous collateral oral agreement of the parties to the several instruments to the effect that the subject-matter of each instrument should be but a unit in a series of sales which as a whole were to constitute the subject-matter of a single transaction. It was pointed out that in that case the defendants did not seek nor were they permitted to contradict by parol proof the covenants of the particular instrument in suit, and that therefore the rule that parol evidence is not admissible to alter, vary, or contradict a written instrument was not applicable. But the court further stated:

"Of course, this exception to the general rule can be invoked and applied to a written instrument which prima facie purports to embody the complete legal obligations of the parties, only where the established circumstances surrounding and attending its execution warrant the inference that the parties did not intend that it should be a complete and final statement of the whole transaction before them."

[1] In the case at bar, each one of the written contracts contains the following stipulation:

"That there is no understanding or agreement whatsoever between the undersigned and the Pioneer Commercial Auto Company, or its agents, with respect to the above order, except such as are embraced in the terms therein."

This is a direct declaration of intention that the writing is itself a complete contract. To have permitted appellant to prove by parol evidence that this was only part of a transaction wherein at the same time other trucks were sold by the defendant to the plaintiff, and that all of the sales constitute one transaction, would be a direct contradiction of the terms of each contract. To go further, and permit defendant to prove an addition to the agreed price by charging the purchaser with the duty of paying for insurance on the trucks for the benefit of the vendor, would constitute a further addition to and contradiction of the terms of the contract.

It is next contended that the court erred in refusing to receive testimony to explain ambiguity in the contracts. The illustrations offered by counsel related to items not relevant to the actual controversy between the parties. Appellant's refusal to perform its contracts did not in any instance grow out of any disagreement with respondent concerning the color of the automobile, or the extent of lengthening of wheel bases, or the meaning of the phrase "18 monthly notes." Appellant proceeded upon the theory that notwithstanding the terms of each contract to the contrary, it could treat them all as one transaction, and impose upon respondent conditions not specified in any one of the contracts as written. Its breach of the contract grew out of that assumption, and did not result from ambiguities in the specifications of the orders. As to the elements of contract which have any bearing upon appellant's claimed right to refuse performance, we think the court did not err in treating each contract as complete upon its face.

[2] We think that the court did not err in refusing to admit evidence of witnesses to the effect that there was in the automobile business, at the time when these contracts were entered into, a general and well-recognized custom and usage that where trucks were sold and the purchase price not paid in full at the time of the sale, automobile lease contracts in a certain form should be executed. This could not have been done without contradicting the agreement of the parties that there was not between them any understanding or agreement with respect to the sale "except such as are embraced in the terms therein."

[3] The conclusions already announced compel the further decision that the court did not err in refusing to receive testimony going to prove that defendant's refusal to deliver the fourth truck, or to make further deliveries, was warranted or justifiable. Neither did the court err in refusing to admit evidence proving that subsequent to the date of the execution of the contract, the same was supplemented by an executed oral agreement. The fact that respondent executed lease contracts and notes and furnished insurance policies in connection with the delivery of the three cars which were delivered to it by appellant in no wise constituted an executed supplemental agreement affecting the terms or performance of the other separate and independent contracts.

[4] The remaining point suggested is that the evidence does not sustain the finding establishing the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiff. The claim is that the evidence proved nothing more than a speculation or guess concerning the loss sustained. It is claimed that the only witness on this subject testified to nothing definite. In answer to the question:

"What in your opinion would have been the reasonable market value in Los Angeles on October 9, 1917, of a new truck exactly as any one of the three trucks that were delivered by defendant to plaintiff?"

—the answer was:

"Why, I would assume possibly $3,930 each."

But on cross-examination the witness stated that these figures were the result of a computation which he had made, and gave details which were sufficient to establish the difference between the contract price and the market price of such trucks at the time when appellant repudiated the contracts. There was other testimony tending to show that this computation was not excessive. The measure of damages was appropriately determined in accordance with sections 3308 and 3354 of the Civil Code. Connell v. Harron, Rickard & McCone, 7 Cal. App. 745, 95 Pac. 916.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; JAMES, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the district court of appeal of the second appellate district, division one, is denied.

[5] In denying the petition we would say that we withhold approval from the portion of the opinion of the district court of appeal holding that parol evidence of the circumstances under which the ten order contracts were made was inadmissible for the purpose of showing that the order contracts were all but parts of a single transaction. A decision of the question so presented was not necessary. The evidence was offered only for the purpose of laying the foundation for a further showing that it was agreed that upon the delivery of each machine the plaintiff should execute a lease agreement and that this lease agreement should contain a provision whereby the plaintiff would in effect carry insurance on the machine for the benefit of the defendant. There was no provision in the order contracts for the execution of any such lease agreement or any lease agreement at all. This being so, the attempt to show an understanding for the execution of the lease agreements was but an attempt to vary by parol or extrinsic evidence the terms of written contracts. This could not be done, whether the ten contracts were or were not parts of a single transaction.

OLNEY, J., SHAW, J., WILBUR, J., and SLOANE, J., concur. ANGELLOTTI, C. J., and LENNON, J., concur in the denial of the petition for hearing in this court.

DILLINGHAM et al. v. DAHLGREN.

(Civ. 3688.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 21, 1921.)

1. Frauds, statute of ⟸158(4)—Evidence held insufficient to show complete written contract of sale.

In an action for the breach of an agreement to sell real estate, wherein the statute was urged as a defense, testimony taken in connection with a reference in the preliminary agreement to a contract to be completed held to indicate that the parties intended the execution of a new agreement with a preliminary agreement as a basis, and that the defendant never delivered to plaintiff for her approval a proper written contract, but that he delivered a proposed contract containing important features in addition to those contained in the preliminary agreement.

2. Frauds, statute of ⟸106(2)—Contract for transfer of realty must be complete.

Where the transfer of a piece of real estate is involved, the parties cannot leave to future oral agreement any of the essential parts of their contract.

3. Evidence ⟸158(27)—Frauds, statute of ⟸71—Agreement for transfer of realty cannot be proved orally.

In an action for the breach of an agreement to sell her real estate, wherein the statute of frauds was involved, and the case did not involve a lost instrument, the case did not come within the rule concerning secondary evidence as provided for by Code Civ. Proc. § 1855, but was covered by section 1973, providing that, where such an agreement is involved, evidence cannot be received without the writing.

4. Frauds, statute of ⟸158(3)—Defective recital may be cured but not created by parol evidence.

A description of land sought to be sold under a broker's contract can be cured, but not created, by parol evidence, and such rule applies with equal force to every other recital which the law requires to be in writing.

5. Contracts ⟸15—Consent of parties necessary.

It is essential to the validity of contracts that the parties should have consented to the same subject-matter in the same sense, and they must have contracted ad idem.

6. Contracts ⟸32—Agreements to be reduced to writing not binding until so reduced.

Preliminary negotiations leading up to the execution of a contract must be distinguished from the contract itself, and to be final the agreement must extend to all the terms which the parties intend to introduce, and there is no binding contract where, although its terms have been agreed on orally, the parties have also agreed that it shall not be binding until evidenced by writing; the same rule applying whether the preliminary negotiations were oral or written.

7. Contracts ⟸25—Agreement to make contract invalid.

An agreement that parties will in the future make such contract as they may then agree upon amounts to nothing, and cannot be made the basis of a cause of action; for, where a final contract fails to express some matter as time of payment, the law may imply the intention of the parties, but, where a preliminary contract leaves certain terms to be agreed upon for the purpose of a final contract, there can be no implication of what the parties will agree upon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Evelyn L. Dillingham and husband against A. L. Dahlgren. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

G. L. Aynesworth, L. N. Barber, and A. W. Carlson, all of Fresno, for appellant.

H. L. Meyers, Ray C. Wakefield, and H. F. Briggs, all of Fresno, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $1,350 for the breach of an agreement to sell to the plaintiffs a certain piece of real property situated at Fresno, Cal.

Appellant contends that the complaint, evidence, and findings are insufficient to sustain the judgment because they do not show a binding agreement between the parties for the sale of this property. The contract sued upon is brief, and is as follows:

"A. L. Dahlgren agrees to sell to Evelyn L. Dillingham the following described property.

"Lots 7 and E. ½ 8 Blk. 33 Belmont Add. for the sum of $3,750.00, to be paid as follows: $100.00 deposit, $400.00 on completion of contract, and $35.00 per month or more including interest at 7%.

"Seller agrees that he will paint woodwork in kitchen, varnish woodwork in dining and living rooms, also paint porch and steps. Seller agrees to pay for cement walk from house to street, buyer to pay for street work.

The case as made by the plaintiff contains two frailties: (1) Concerning the applicability of the statute of frauds; (2) concerning the making of contracts in general. These two frailties happen to run arm in arm under the facts of this particular case, but are not necessarily dependent one on the other.

First, we shall take up the consideration of the case as to how it measures up when we consider the clause of the statute of frauds.

The trial court found:

"That by the phrase 'on completion of contract' in said preliminary agreement (the document herein set out) the parties intended the execution of a more formal agreement in writing in accordance with the terms of said preliminary agreement."

It is the contention of appellant that this finding is not sustained by the evidence, and that it appears from the testimony of the plaintiff that it was not intended that the parties had completed their agreement, but that it was the intention of all parties to agree to enter into an agreement in the future embodying conditions which would be satisfactory to both parties. The testimony of the plaintiff certainly sustains this position. She testified as follows:

"Q. At the time this little memorandum which has been introduced in evidence was signed, was there any conversation between you and Mr. Dahlgren that some formal agreement would be drawn up for the sale and purchase of the lands? A. Mr. Dahlgren was to go ahead and complete a form of contract. Q. Now was anything said about what would be in the terms of that contract? As a matter of fact nothing was said as to what the terms of that contract would be, was there? A. No; only just there would be a mutual agreement. Q. And this little paper that has been introduced in evidence here, marked Plaintiff's Exhibit 2, was not intended to be an agreement at all, but simply something to be signed until the formal agreement was drawn? A. Well, it was an agreement. Q. But it wasn't to be an agreement that you people should buy and sell property? A. It was an agreement from which a contract was to be made. Q. But you were not going to sign just any agreement Mr. Dahlgren drew up, were you? A. Any reasonable form of contract; yes. Q. But you don't answer my question. Please answer the question. You wouldn't have signed just any agreement Mr. Dahlgren would have drawn up, no matter what its terms were, would you? A. I don't believe I quite understand. Q. In other words, if Mr. Dahlgren had drawn up an agreement for the sale and purchase of that land with terms and provisions in it that you didn't like, you wouldn't have signed it, would you? A. No. Q. In other words, whatever agreement he was to draw up would have to be one which you would agree to? A. I was perfectly willing to sign a regular form of contract. Q. Your idea was that any contract he drew up would have to be such as you would approve? Is that right? A. Yes; I think so. Q. In other words, if he had drawn a contract with terms which you thought were wrong or unfair to you, you would not have signed it. A. No. Q. And as to the matter of an agreement, neither you nor he had said anything about just what terms or provisions were to go into it, had you—hadn't been a word said about it? A. Not exactly, but Mr. Dahlgren handed me a contract which was perfectly all right with me and which I was willing to sign. Q. Was that before this little memorandum was signed? A. No; after. Q. That is the paper that was introduced in evidence? A. Yes sir. Q. But, now, Mrs. Dillingham, answer my question. Prior to the time that paper was drawn up and handed to you, you and he had had no discussion whatever as to the terms and conditions of the contract to be drawn. A. No. Q. And you didn't know what terms and provisions the contract he was to draw would have in it? A. No; certainly not, but I was certainly under the impression it would be a regular form of contract that is always used in real estate sales. Q. Now tell me what the regular form of contract in real estate sales contains. I want to say I have never seen one and I have been in the business for 12 years. A. I don't say I can explain exactly, but I think you have one in your hand. Q. No; I have not. I am sorry to say I have not. Now, Mrs. Dillingham, as a matter of fact there is no such thing as a regular form of contract, is there? A. Yes; in a way. Q. Well, you have never seen two contracts that were the same? A. Not exactly. Q. Now, as a matter of fact, you and Mr. Dahlgren didn't say a word about the drawing of a regular form of contract, did you? A. Well, no; but it was understood. Q. It was your intention whenever he submitted whatever form of contract he did submit to you that you should take it to your attorney for examination, wasn't it? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you did take it to your attorney for examination? A. Yes, sir. Q. And asked him if it was all right? A. Yes, sir. Q. And if he had not said it was all right, you would not have signed it? A. No. Q. Now, then, as a matter of fact, did he furnish you a certificate of title? A. No; he did not. Q. There was nothing in the agreement about his furnishing you a certificate of title, in that little memorandum of agreement? A. No, sir. Q. Wasn't anything said in it about furnishing you that, and you would not have gone ahead with the agreement if he had not furnished you one? A. No, sir.

Q. And he would have had to agree to put that in the contract before you would have gone ahead with the contract? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. As a matter of fact, as far as you and Mr. Dahlgren are concerned, nothing was ever said between you at all prior to the submission to you of this particular memorandum in evidence about the terms that would go into the contract, other than what happens to be in this little memorandum about the price and description of the property, terms of payment, and things he would fix around the place and things you would fix and pay for; that was all that was discussed? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you left for future determination all the terms that should go into a completed contract, didn't you? A. Yes."

[1] The foregoing testimony, taken in connection with the reference in the preliminary agreement to a contract to be completed, indicates clearly that the parties intended the execution of a new agreement, with the preliminary agreement as a basis, but containing many additional provisions to be determined by future negotiations. The evidence does not show that the defendant delivered to the plaintiff for her approval, a contract in writing which embodied substantially the terms of the preliminary agreement, together with the conditions that would have been implied by law, but that he delivered to her a draft of a proposed contract to which was added many important features in addition to those contained in the preliminary agreement.

[2, 3] In the transactions between the plaintiff and defendant, involving as they did a transfer of a piece of real estate, the parties could not leave to future oral agreement any of the essential parts of their contract. The case does not involve a lost instrument, and therefore does not come within the rule concerning secondary evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 1855. But the case is covered by Code of Civil Procedure, § 1973, which provides that in a case involving such an agreement as is here claimed evidence cannot be received without the writing. In Swisher v. Conrad, 76 Fla. 644, 646, 80 South. 564, 565, the Supreme Court of Florida said:

"The written memorandum for the sale of land required by the statute of frauds cannot rest partly in writing and partly in parol, but the written memorandum must disclose all the terms of the sale. Rhode v. Gallat, 70 Fla. 536, 70 South. 471."

In Klein v. Markarian, 175 Cal. 37 at page 40, 165 Pac. 3, at page 4, Mr. Justice Sloss, speaking of such a contract as this memorandum, says:

"Furthermore, the contract fails to provide how the obligation to make the deferred payments is to be evidenced or secured. The option was signed by the defendant alone. He was to convey his land upon payment of less than one-fourth of the purchase price. Thereupon he would have no writing signed by any one evidencing an obligation to pay the balance, nor any security for such balance beyond the inadequate security of a vendor's lien. If this was the intent of the parties, specific performance might have been properly refused upon the ground that the contract was not 'just and reasonable' as to the defendant. Civ. Code, § 3391; Godwin v. Collins, 3 Del. Ch. 196; Diamond, etc., Co. v. Todd, 6 Del. Ch. 163 [14 Atl. 27]. If, on the other hand, the parties contemplated that the purchaser should give some form of secured evidence of indebtedness to cover the deferred payments—and this the plaintiff's own conduct shows to have been his view—the agreement was entirely uncertain with respect to the manner in which the balance should be evidenced and secured. Marsh v. Lott, 8 Cal. App. 385 [97 Pac. 163]."

In the case of Co-op. Ass'n v. Phillips, 56 Cal. 539, the court refused to enforce an agreement because it appeared that it was not really the final contract between the parties, but the basis on which to conclude a contract for the sale of land. In the case of Wineburgh v. Gay, 27 Cal. App. 603, 150 Pac. 1003, the memorandum which was the basis of the action read as follows:

"I will lease to you the stores now occupied by the Union Title & Trust Co. for 5 years, beginning Jan. 1, 1911, $250 for the first two years and $275.00 for the following three years. Usual clauses in lease to rebuilding."

It was held that the last sentence in this memorandum was uncertain and that it was not a completed agreement. In this case the memorandum set forth was also a preliminary agreement, and the controversy arose over a failure to agree upon the provisions to be included in the formal contract between the parties. The court said, at page 605 of 27 Cal. App., at page 1005 of 150 Pac.:

" 'It is well settled that no action will lie to enforce the performance of a contract, or to recover damages for its breach, unless it be complete and certain; and the rule applies as well to price as to subject-matter and parties.' Talmadge v. Arrowhead R. Co., 101 Cal. 367, 371 [35 Pac. 1000]. 'To satisfy the statute of frauds a memorandum "must contain the essential terms of the contract expressed with such a degree of certainty that it may be understood without recourse to parol evidence to show the intention of the parties." 5 Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 371. In Breckinridge v. Crocker, 78 Cal. 529 [21 Pac. 179], the court said: "The memorandum must contain all the material elements of the contract." ' Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 787, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154, 106 Pac. 88."

In the case of Poel v. Brunswick, 216 N. Y. at page 314, 110 N. E. at page 620, the court says:

"In order to satisfy the requirements of the statute of frauds, the written note or memorandum must include all the terms of the completed contract which the parties made. It is not sufficient that the note or memorandum may express the terms of a contract. It is essential that it shall completely evidence the contract which the parties made. If, instead of proving the existence of that contract, it establishes that there was in fact no contract or evidenced a contract in terms and conditions different from that which the parties entered into, it fails to comply with the statute."

Rutenberg v. Main, 47 Cal. 213, involved a cash sale; Mann v. Higgins, 83 Cal. 66, 23 Pac. 206, involved an exchange in præsenti; Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 27 Pac. 280, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123, involved a contract to sell on time, but the terms were stated in the memorandum except such terms as the law implies; Preble v. Abraham, 88 Cal. 245, 26 Pac. 99, 22 Am. St. Rep. 301, involved a defective description which it was held could be cured not by the introduction of the oral conversations, but by evidence showing ownership in the defendant to certain lands at the time of the contract, the location thereof, etc.; and as stated by Mr. Justice Lennon in Proulx v. Sacramento Valley Land Co., 19 Cal. App. 529, at page 534, 126 Pac. 509, at page 511:

"In short, a description of land sought to be sold under a broker's contract can be cured, but not created, by parol evidence."

[4] What was said by the learned justice in reference to a defective recital as to description applies with equal force to every other recital which the law requires to be in writing.

We will now take up a consideration of the case under the rules governing the creation of contracts in general, and in this behalf we will for the moment turn our backs on the statute of frauds.

[5, 6] "It is essential to the validity of a contract that the parties should have consented to the same subject-matter in the same sense. They must have contracted ad idem." Breckinridge v. Crocker, 78 Cal. 529, 536, 21 Pac. 179, 181. In this connection one of the rules governing the creation of contracts in general is stated in 13 Corp. Jur. 289, § 100, as follows:

"The preliminary negotiations leading up to the execution of a contract must be distinguished from the contract itself. There is no meeting of the minds of the parties while they are merely negotiating as to the terms of an agreement to be entered into. To be final, the agreement must extend to all the terms which the parties intend to introduce, and material terms cannot be left for future settlement; nor is there a binding contract where, although its terms have been agreed on orally, the parties have also agreed that it shall not be binding until evidenced by writing."

The same rule applies whether the preliminary negotiations were oral or in writing, if it manifestly appears that certain parts of the contract are later to be agreed upon and inserted in the formal draft. The writer has carefully selected all of the following cases as substantiating the foregoing proposition: Fuller v. Reed, 38 Cal. 99, 109; Co-operative Ass'n v. Phillips, 56 Cal. 539, 545; Pac. R. M. Co. v. Railway Co., 90 Cal. 627, 633, 634, 27 Pac. 525; Talmadge v. Arrowhead R. Co., 101 Cal. 367, 371, 35 Pac. 1000; Spinney v. Downing, 108 Cal. 666, 668, 41 Pac. 797; Jules Levy & Bro. v. A. Mautz & Co., 16 Cal. App. 666, 670, 117 Pac. 936; Las Palmas, etc., Distillery v. Garrett & Co., 167 Cal. 397, 400, 139 Pac. 1077; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 461, 469, 168 Pac. 1037; Durst v. Jolly, 35 Cal. App. 184, 190, 169 Pac. 449. The rule is general in California whether the question arises in a case of specific performance (Co-operative Ass'n v. Phillips, supra); or an action to foreclose a mortgage (Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset, etc., Co., supra); an action to quiet title (Durst v. Jolly, supra); or an action for damages (Talmadge v. Arrowhead R. Co., supra; Jules Levy Bros. v. A. Mautz & Co., supra; Las Palmas, etc., Distillery v. Garrett & Co., supra).

[7] An agreement that parties will, in the future, make such contract as they may then agree upon amounts to nothing. An agreement to enter into negotiations and agree upon the terms of a contract, if they can, cannot be made the basis of a cause of action. Where a final contract fails to express some matter, as, for instance, a time of payment, the law may imply the intention of the parties; but where a preliminary contract leaves certain terms to be agreed upon for the purpose of a final contract, there can be no implication of what the parties will agree upon. Shepard v. Carpenter, 54 Minn. 153, 55 N. W. 906. See, also, Ridgway v. Wharton, 6 H. L. Cases, 263, 10 Reprint, 1297.

In the present case it not only appears that the agreement relied upon was silent as to many matters essential to a contract between the parties, but it further appears that it was not intended and did not purport to be a final contract between the parties, but only a preliminary agreement; that the parties intended further negotiations and mutual agreements as to numerous other matters involved in the transaction between them; that these matters when agreed upon were to be embodied in a final contract between the parties, but no agreement with reference to them was ever reached.

The judgment is reversed.

CHADBOURNE et al. v. WHITE.
(Civ. 2266.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third Distirct, California. April 22, 1921.)

Principal and agent ⊂=166(4)—Knowledge of agent's act necessary for ratification by principal.

For an alleged agent's warranties and representations to be ratified by the principal, the principal must have knowledge thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by F. A. Chadbourne, Jr., and another, partners as Chadbourne Bros., against J. M. White. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Harry Davids, of Chico, for appellants.
Bond & Deirup, of Chico, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is by the plaintiffs as copartners against the defendant upon a promissory note for the sum of $1,000, dated April 3, 1914, and due and payable on September 1, 1914. The complaint is in the usual form of such an action. In due time the defendant filed an answer, admitting the execution of the note by him, and that it was given as in part payment of a certain tractor, but defending himself against the validity of the note on the ground that the tractor failed to measure up to an alleged express warranty made by the seller as to the capacity of the machine to perform the work for which it was designed. The answer alleges that, immediately upon discovering that the tractor was not as warranted, the defendant rescinded the contract for its purchase and offered to restore the tractor to the plaintiffs, at the same time demanding the return to him of the note in suit; that plaintiffs refused, and ever since have refused, to accept the return of said tractor and to deliver to defendant the said note. In the same answer the defendant set up a second defense based upon false and fraudulent representations by the plaintiffs relative to the tractor and its capacity or power for doing the work it was intended for. That cause of action also contained, in the same language as it appeared in the first cause of action, the allegation that, in the month of July, 1914, the defendant first discovered the worthlessness of the tractor and then offered to return the same to plaintiffs and to place the latter in the same position as they were before the defendant entered into the contract for the purchase of the engine and demanded of plaintiffs the return of the note upon which the complaint declares, and that plaintiffs have at all times since said offer refused to accept the same and to redeliver said note to defendant. The answer prayed for the cancellation of the note and for the sum of $3,000 for loss of crop by reason of the failure of the tractor to perform the work essential to the growing and the harvesting of the crop for the year 1914.

The special defense or the counterclaim was answered by the plaintiffs, and on the day the cause came on for trial (December 4, 1918) the defendant made an application for leave to amend his answer, and the same was allowed. The effect of the said amendment was to exclude from the answer all the allegations as to false and fraudulent representations, and consequently to leave in the case as the sole ground for the rescission of the contract of purchase and thereupon the cancellation of the note in suit the fact, as alleged, that the tractor was not as warranted by the plaintiffs, alleging also that immediately upon discovery of that fact defendant offered to return the tractor, etc.

Upon the issues thus framed the case was tried, and on the 16th day of December, 1918, the case was taken under advisement.

On March 11, 1919, no decision then having been arrived at or declared, the defendant moved for leave to file another amended answer or counterclaim so that the same would "conform to the pleadings and the proof taken at the trial." The amended answer changed the allegation with regard to offering to return the tractor, etc., "immediately upon discovering that said tractor was worthless," by stating in lieu thereof that from the time of the delivery of the tractor to the defendant the same "proved unworkable," but that defendant believed and had faith that by making proper repairs on the same said tractor could be put in condition to perform the labor which the plaintiffs and their agent "warranted and represented that it would perform as aforesaid." The allegation goes on with the statement that defendant continued to have faith, etc., until the date he rescinded the contract of purchase; that the tractor could be put in workable condition, and that he employed many expert tractor engineers on such faith, at great expense, to work on and operate and repair the machine, to no purpose, however, since the parts of the tractor continued to get out of order or be broken; that thus the defendant tested and experimented with the tractor upon the belief that its defects could be so corrected as to render it capable of performing its work properly until the month of August, 1914, when he discovered that said tractor was inherently defective in its construction and not capable of being repaired so as to make it work as warranted, etc. The relief asked for by this amended answer, in addition to rescission and cancellation, was for damages, not for the crop, as was the prayer in the original pleading of defendant, but for money alleged to have been expended by defendant in repairing and attempting to operate the tractor.

The plaintiffs moved to strike out the second amended answer, and also filed a demurrer thereto, but the motion was denied and the demurrer overruled. These orders were made on the 8th day of September, 1919. Plaintiffs thereupon filed an answer to the answer and counterclaim of defendant. On the 15th day of September, 1919, the court filed a written decision against the plaintiffs, and on the 23d day of September, 1919, counsel for plaintiffs moved to reopen the cause before judgment. The principal ground upon which said motion was founded and pressed was that the second amended answer, filed, as seen, after the trial of the case—that is, after the proofs had been received and the case submitted for decision—contained "new and other matter than that contained in the amended answer and cross-complaint upon which said defendant relied when the said cause was tried and heard, and when the said cause was submitted to the above-entitled court for decision." This motion was denied.

Findings were made and judgment rendered and entered rescinding the contract of sale of the tractor and ordering the note in suit to be delivered to defendant for cancellation. The defendant was not awarded damages.

This appeal is by the plaintiff from the judgment so entered, and is supported by a transcript of the proceedings had at the trial, as prescribed by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The assignment of error first discussed in the briefs involves the action of the court in allowing the defendant to file the amended answer after trial had been completed and in denying the motion of the plaintiff for a reopening of the case after the filing of said amended pleading, but we may waive consideration of this point, since we have concluded that the judgment must for other reasons be reversed.

In taking up the merits of the controversy it is deemed the more orderly first to state the facts of the transaction upon which this action is founded. One Joseph Peltier was in the year 1913, and down to the date of the sale thereof by him, the owner of a ranch not far from Suisun City, in Solano county, consisting principally, if not altogether, of tule lands. Either in the month of November or December, 1913, he purchased at Los Angeles two Buffalo-Pitts gas tractors, paying therefor the sum of $1,500 each; the price of said tractors later and at the time of the trial of this action having advanced to the sum of $3,000 each. Before completing the contract for the purchase of said tractors, Peltier had the machines examined by an expert "gas engine man" employed by him for that purpose. Peltier worked the tractors on his ranch satisfactorily from the time that they were delivered to him (either in the month of November or the month of December, 1913) for very close to two months and until the winter rains set in, causing the ground to become so soft that the engines could no longer be used for plowing purposes. When, for the reason just stated, the working of the tractors ceased, Peltier caused the magneto and electric parts of the machine in question here to be removed and the tractor to be covered at the place on the ranch where the work of operating it had ceased, and there allowed it to remain until it was sold and delivered to the defendant in the month of April, 1914, as will be later more fully explained.

Within four months, approximately, after the operation of the tractor had been stopped, as above explained, Peltier sold his ranch and all its equipments, including the tractors referred to, to Chadbourne Bros., the plaintiffs herein. The ranch and all the machinery—the agricultural implements, including, as stated, the tractors mentioned—on said ranch were sold by Peltier for a lump sum.

After Peltier had made arrangements to sell his ranch to the Chadbournes (this statement is based on the testimony of Peltier testifying as a witness for the defendant and is not contradicted), a man named Cline, residing in San Francisco, called on him (Peltier) and said to Peltier that he (Cline) had a client for one of those engines, and asked Peltier if he desired "to sell them." Peltier replied that the tractors were not then his property and referred Cline to the plaintiffs. Peltier, at the time of that conversation with Cline, had never met or seen White, the defendant. Peltier never at any time resided on the ranch, his residence having been in the city of San Francisco. His son, however, had lived on the ranch, having been in charge of the reclamation work thereon while his father was the owner of the ranch.

Fred A. Chadbourne, one of the plaintiffs, called as a witness by the defendant, testified that he had never met the defendant, White, prior to the transaction eventuating in the sale of the tractor to the latter; that shortly after they (the Chadbournes) had bought the Peltier ranch he was told by Peltier that he had a prospect for a buyer of one of the tractors, and Chadbourne was referred by Peltier to Cline, who, Peltier told Chadbourne, would give him "the details of what could be done with it"; that he (witness) thereafter called on Cline in San Francisco, and that the latter explained the proposition for the purchase of the tractor, the terms of payment and where and how the same was to be shipped to the defendant, the proposed purchaser; that the proposition made to him by Cline was satisfactory to him and he agreed to pay Cline, for his services in effecting the sale of the tractor for the sum of $1,500, 20 per cent. of the sale or purchase price.

The defendant White was, at the time of the transactions involved herein, engaged in the business of farming in Butte County, then having under lease 2,000 acres of what was then known as the "Phelan ranch," in said county, and farming the same on shares. About a year prior to the time of the transactions involved herein the said Cline called on White at his ranch and undertook to sell to him (White) a Hart-Parr engine, but failed in the undertaking. Subsequently White received a letter from Cline in which the latter stated that "he had found an engine that would do my work, and all the trouble was that it was too heavy for the ground that it was in." Cline in said letter asked White to "come down and look it over." White shortly thereafter went to San Francisco, and on the day following that of his arrival in that city, he, accompanied by Cline, and a man named Spears, a friend of the defendant, and who, although a carpenter by trade, had had considerable experience in handling gas engines, went to the Chadbourne ranch and there inspected the tractor. This was in the month of February, 1914. White, when testifying, stated, in reply to a question by his attorney as to whether "there were any representations" made with regard to the tractor, replied that there were and that such representations were made "by Mr. Cline and by Mr. Peltier's son." Asked what those representations were, White answered:

"Mr. Cline told me the machine was in perfect condition and had never been run only to demonstrate it, and that the only objection to it was that it was too heavy, and that it would do my work here; that he knew that it would do my work on the Phelan ranch, and I asked him how it compared with the Rumley, and he said that it was three times as good an engine as the Rumley, and that is the kind that I hired to help me with the crop, and that is all I remember."

The witness Spears, who, as seen, went to the Chadbourne ranch with defendant to inspect the engine, testified as to the representations or warranty of the tractor made by Cline on that occasion as follows:

"After we went up to the engine he (Cline) explained to us what the machine was supposed to do and what it would do. He represented that the engine was in first-class shape and that it would develop 75 horse power on good ground such as we had up through our valley here, especially in Chico, and so forth, and he said the engine was new and in first-class shape, and up to the representations."

It appears that, before F. A. Chadbourne had seen Cline after having been told by Peltier that the former had a prospect for the sale of the tractor, Cline had arranged to get the tractor for White on the following terms: $100 cash down; $400 to be paid plaintiffs upon the delivery of the tractor to White at his ranch; and a promissory note to be executed and delivered by White to the Chadbournes for the balance, $1,000, said note to become due and payable on the 1st day of September, 1914. As seen, this arrangement was explained by Cline to F. A. Chadbourne, who accepted it. It further appears that White, before said Chadbourne had seen Cline, had paid Cline the cash payment of $100. This sum Chadbourne permitted Cline to retain as a part of his commission.

The tractor was shipped to and received by White some time in the month of April, 1914. From the time that the machine reached the ranch of White until the date on which the latter received a notice from a local bank that his note in favor of the Chadbournes for $1,000 was due and payable and at said bank for collection, the defendant, according to his testimony, as well as that of a number of other witnesses testifying for him (some of the witnesses were experienced in handling gas engines), experienced much difficulty in making the tractor work. Parts would break on every occasion on which he attempted to use it, and the breaks would, of course, have to be repaired and new parts installed in the machine, and all this at great expense and also resulting in delay in the preparation of his crop for that year. The defendant testified that the engine failed to develop the power which Cline represented that it was capable of developing; that, although it ought to have pulled at least twelve plows, it could not at any time pull a greater number than four or five; that he did succeed in plowing 160 acres of land with it, but this was accomplished with great difficulty, expense, and delay. A number of persons of more or less experience in operating and repairing gas engines, having been called by White to his assistance in efforts to make the engine work satisfactorily, corroborated White's testimony that the tractor would not do the work required of it on his ranch.

Some ten days or two weeks after the tractor had been delivered to White, F. A. Chadbourne went to the White ranch. This was the first time that said Chadbourne had ever met White. Chadbourne testified that White had either telegraphed or written to him, stating that he (White) was having trouble with the machine; that the ignition would not work. The witness said that he had no trouble in starting and operating the tractor. Chadbourne found that certain parts originally of the tractor had been removed and other parts substituted. On the occasion we are now referring to White did not say to Chadbourne that he desired to return the machine or rescind the contract of purchase, although he testified that the tractor did not work satisfactorily on that occasion.

As before suggested, the note from White to plaintiffs as in part payment for the tractor (dated April 3, 1914) was due and payable on September 1, 1914. A few days prior to the last-named date the plaintiffs placed the note in the hands of a bank for collection. The bank notified defendant that it had the note and requested him to call and take it up. The defendant called at the bank and declared to a proper officer thereof that he would not pay the note; that the tractor was a mechanical failure and wholly worthless. On the 29th of August, 1914, a few days prior to the maturity of the note, and after defendant had been notified that the note was in the hands of the bank for collection, the defendant addressed the following letter to plaintiffs:

"I notified Mr. Cline two months ago I couldn't do anything with the engine and I intended to give it up. It has been a bill of expense to me and I could accomplish nothing. I have fooled with the damned thing until it has practically broke me up. It broke down at the beginning of harvest and I had to hire an oil pull to pull my machine, and by the time I got the extras from Buffalo, New York, I was through harvesting. I paid seven hundred dollars for the use of the engine 21 days, and getting extras and fixing the Buffalo tractor cost two hundred and fifty dollars to fix it up and it hasn't done anything since. I found it is first one thing breaks and then another. Now I don't intend to pay any more on the engine. The engine is here. If you want it—all right."

To the above statement is to be added the testimony of defendant to the effect that, when he inspected the tractor on the Chadbourne ranch prior to entering into the contract for its purchase, he came to the conclusion that the engine was worth the price he asked for it. It should also be stated, as the court in effect found, that the defendant, when testifying, offered as excuse for delay in rescinding the contract the statement that, notwithstanding the repeated "breakdowns" of the engine, he still had faith that it could finally be made to operate satisfactorily, and that he was encouraged to cherish such faith and belief until the month of August, 1914, when he discovered that the failure of the machine to operate properly was due entirely to its inherent defects, or defects which could not be remedied.

The foregoing statement, which embraces the salient facts of the transaction from the time of the purchase of the tractor by defendant to the time of his alleged rescission of the contract of purchase, is based entirely upon the testimony of witnesses called by and in behalf of the defendant. It should also be stated that neither Cline nor the younger Peltier testified in the case.

As the attorney for appellant correctly declares in his brief, to uphold his special plea in bar or defense, it was incumbent upon the defendant to prove these facts: (1) That Cline was the agent of the plaintiffs, with authority to sell the tractor; (2) that Cline, as such agent, warranted the tractor to be capable of performing saisfactorily the work for which such a machine is intended; (3) that the tractor failed to measure up to the warranty; and (4) that there was prompt rescission of the contract of purchase upon discovery of the alleged defects of the tractor rendering it incapable of doing the work as warranted. The plaintiffs contend that none of these essential elements to warrant a recovery by defendant was shown by the evidence to exist.

The theory upon which the defendant tried this case in the court below was that the alleged warranty or representations were made by Cline when he was prosecuting the alleged negotiations with Peltier for the tractor, and that the plaintiffs, having concluded the transaction already started by Peltier and Cline when the former was still the owner of the engine, and accepted the benefits thereof, must be held to have ratified the transaction as so begun, including whatever representations or warranty might have been made by Cline to defendant as to the quality, condition, and horse power of the tractor. The case is presented by respondent upon this appeal upon the same theory, and the proposition is thus stated in his brief:

"Respondent's theory is that Cline became Chadbourne's agent by ratification; that the tractor was bought on warranties, and that there was a sufficient and proper rescission."

There is, as we read the record before us, absolutely no warrant in the evidence for the position of defendant upon the question of the alleged ratification of the transaction so far as Peltier had anything to do with it; if as a matter of fact he may be said to have been a party to it at all. As seen, the testimony of Peltier is that, when Cline approached him with the proposition to buy or sell the tractor, he (Peltier) had sold the tractor with his ranch to plaintiffs, and that he referred Cline to the plaintiffs to make with them as owners of the machine such arrangements about selling or purchasing it as he might be able to. Peltier's testimony was not contradicted. It is true that defendant testified that Cline told him, when the latter first brought to his (defendant's) attention the tractor in question, that Peltier was then the owner of the engine, but that testimony was purely hearsay or at any rate is valueless in the face of the positive testimony of Peltier himself that he had sold the machine to the Chadbournes prior to the time at which Cline first spoke to him about selling it. Furthermore, if it be assumed that Peltier did own the machine at the time Cline first approached him with a proposition to purchase or sell the same, then there is no evidence of any kind or character showing or even tending to show that the plaintiffs, when accepting Cline's proposition for the sale of the tractor to defendant, had any knowledge of the facts characterizing the transaction between Cline and defendant, or, in other words, had any knowledge that the inducing cause of the sale of the tractor to defendant was the warranty made by Cline as to the character and capacity of the engine while he was negotiating with Peltier. "Ratification necessarily presupposes a knowledge of the thing ratified." Huffman v. Knapp, 30 Cal. App. 759, 761, 159 Pac. 456.

The above considerations are, upon the theory upon which it was tried and is presented by the defendant, decisive of the case against the legal validity of the judgment appealed from. We may, however, with no impropriety, notice some other features of the case as it is presented here.

It is only a rational interpretation of the evidence to hold that Cline's position in the transaction was merely that of a broker. The defendant testified, as seen, that about a year prior to the date of the receipt by him of a letter from Cline that he (Cline) had found a tractor that would be suitable for his (defendant's) purposes, Cline made a futile attempt to sell him a Hart-Parr tractor; that subsequently the letter referred to was addressed to defendant by Cline. From this testimony the inference is reasonable, and indeed natural, that Cline had been looking about for a tractor for the defendant; that is, looking for an engine that he could sell to the defendant. F. A. Chadbourne testified as a witness for defendant (and there is no contradiction to this testimony) that, when he called on Cline in San Francisco for the first time after having been told by Peltier that the former had a proposition to make with respect to the sale of the engine, Cline said to Chadbourne that defendant would buy the tractor for $1,500; that he had already paid him (Cline) $100 down on the proposition; that he would make a further payment of $400 on the delivery of the engine to him (defendant) and give to Chadbourne his promissory note for the balance, $1,000, payable September 1, 1914. Chadbourne then agreed to pay Cline 20 per cent. of the purchase price as his compensation for negotiating the sale of the tractor, and also told Cline that he could retain the $100 cash payment as part of his commission. Thus it is clear that Cline had already arranged for the sale of the tractor before he had ever seen or communicated in any manner with Chadbourne about the proposed sale, and it would seem to be equally clear from this testimony that Cline was acting no less for the defendant than he was for the plaintiffs. In other words, the testimony just adverted to well affords the inference that Cline was a mere broker in the transaction, acting for himself and upon his own initiative. An agent of the Chadbournes he became, it is true, but only when, after laying the proposition of the defendant before them for the sale of the tractor, they accepted the proposition made by Cline for defendant, and he was then still no less the agent of the defendant than that of the plaintiffs. But he then became their agent only to the extent of being authorized to execute the terms upon which the sale was to be made. The proposition for the purchase of the tractor and the terms thereof having first come from defendant to the Chadbournes through Cline, and whatever representations Cline made to defendant as to the character of the tractor having been so made before Cline became the agent of the plaintiffs, it is manifest that the latter cannot be bound by the representations or warranty so made. However, we think the judgment should be reversed for the reasons first hereinabove given, and it is so ordered.

DAVIS v. MENE et al. (Civ. 3153.)

1. Animals ⇐74(5)—Finding of knowledge of vicious propensities of dog justified.

In an action for damages from the bite of a dog, evidence that the animal was a bulldog, which was muzzled when at large and chained when at home, and that he was kept as a watchdog because of the presence of petty thieves in the neighborhood, held to justify a finding that defendants knew of the dog's vicious propensities.

2. Animals ⇐74(4)—Dog's reputation admissible.

In an action for damages from the bite of a dog, evidence of the general reputation of dog as to viciousness is proper to support the inference of the owner's knowledge of the dog's habits.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Arthur W. Davis against Louis Mene and another, copartners doing business as the Los Angeles Baking Company, for damages for personal injury. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. P. Johnson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank W. Walden, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action for damages caused by the bite of a dog. Plaintiff had judgment, and the defendants appeal. It is impossible to make a statement of the facts of the case, except from assertions made in the briefs of each of the parties and not denied by the other. Both counsel recite facts without reference to the record, and this fault is so frequent that we are unable to make a statement from that source.

From the meager material presented to us the facts appear to be these: Respondent went on a business errand to the house of one of the appellants. The dog was on the front porch of the dwelling, tied to a post by a chain nearly six feet in length, which allowed him to get to or near the entrance door. When respondent was at this point he was bitten by the animal.

[1] Appellants object to the sufficiency of the evidence to support several of the findings of the trial court. Most of these points depend upon the objection that there was no evidence to justify the finding that appellants knew of the vicious propensities of the dog. Counsel have afforded us enough of an insight into the facts to enable us to say that the animal was a bulldog, that he was muzzled when at large, that he was chained when at home, and that he was kept as a watchdog, because of the presence of petty thieves in the neighborhood. All of these matters were properly to be considered in determining the knowledge of appellants as to the proclivities of the animal (3 C. J. 118, 119; 1 R. C. L. 1117, 1118), and, as appellants indicate no contrary evidence in the record, the court could have made no other finding on the subject.

In discussing the sufficiency of the evidence to support a certain finding, appellants charge respondent with contributory negligence "in walking within the length of the 57-inch chain on which a vicious-looking bulldog was attached to one end thereof." Respondent, in his turn, claims that appellants were negligent "in chaining him so close to the door that he could bite an unsuspecting caller, as was done in this case." As the burden is on appellants to show error (Kellogg v. Kellogg, 170 Cal. 84, 148 Pac. 518), and as we are pointed to no evidence on this interesting subject by either counsel, we shall assume that respondent was not aware of the presence of the dog, and that the charge of contributory negligence is an unjust imputation upon him.

[2] Over the objection of appellants respondent was allowed to show the general reputation of the dog as to viciousness, and it is contended that the trial court committed error in receiving the evidence; but such evidence is proper to support the inference of knowledge on the part of the owner as to the habits of a dog kept by him. 3 C. J. 116. However, even if that were not true, in this case, as we have already shown on the other evidence alone the court could have made no finding but that appellants knew of the dangerous proclivities of the animal.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WILDER. (Cr. 552.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 21, 1921.)

1. Indictment and information ⊂=189(9)—Offense of petit larceny included in that of grand larceny.

The offense of petit larceny of which defendant was convicted was comprehended within that of grand larceny, with which he was specifically charged in the information.

2. Criminal law ⊂=1178—Where no appearance or brief for defendant, submission being on the record, all matters other than violation of fundamental rights are presumed waived.

On calling a criminal case for argument in regular order on the calendar, where there was no appearance for defendant and no oral argument made or being filed, and upon motion of Attorney General the case was submitted on the record, the Court of Appeals is required to examine the record only as far as is necessary to determine whether if in any of the trial proceedings any fundamental right of the accused was violated, and all other points involving other questions will be presumed waived.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Joseph H. Wilder was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

N. A. Gernon, of Red Bluff, and C. H. Braynard, of Redding, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. [1] The defendant was, by an information filed in the superior court in and for the county of Tehama, charged with the crime of grand larceny, in that he unlawfully and feloniously stole and took away from the premises of one J. A. Noble, in said county, 30 chickens, of the "Rhode Island Red" variety or breed, of the alleged value of $2 each, or the aggregate value of $60. The jury found the accused guilty of petit larceny, said crime being comprehended within that specifically charged in the information, and he has appealed from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[2] The case was regularly placed on the calendar of the April, 1921, term of this court for hearing and argument, and counsel for the defendant and the Attorney General were duly and regularly notified thereof. On calling the case for argument in the regular order in which it appeared on the calendar, there was no appearance for the defendant, and therefore no oral argument in support of his appeal made to or before the court; nor has there been any brief filed in behalf of the accused. This being the state of the case when called for hearing, the same, upon motion of the Attorney General, was ordered submitted upon the record.

When an appeal in a criminal case is thus submitted, we are required to examine the record only so far as it may be necessary to enable us to determine whether, in any of the proceedings of the trial, any fundamental right of the accused has been violated. All points involving other questions are, by reason of the failure to file a brief or present an argument in some other form in support of the appeal, presumed to be waived, or, at least, regarded by defendant of not sufficient force to sustain the appeal.

The information accurately, according to legal form, states the crime of grand larceny. We have carefully read the evidence, and upon its face it is amply sufficient to support the verdict. We have also examined the charge of the court to the jury, and therein the principles of law applicable to the offense and the evidence received as in proof of the crime charged are fully, clearly, and correctly declared.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

HAGEMAN v. COLOMBET. (Civ. 3630.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 25, 1921.)

1. Evidence ⊂=434(9)—Where fraud is asserted, parol evidence is admissible, notwithstanding brokerage contract was in writing.

In an action to recover commissions for effecting an exchange of lands, where defendant asserted the transaction was tainted with fraud, and that writings did not show the true contract, parol evidence is admissible to show the real agreement between the parties.

2. Fraud ⊂=58(1)—Provable by circumstances.

Fraud may be proved by circumstances.

3. Brokers ⊂=67(1)—Broker who undertook to make secret commission from opposite party cannot recover.

Where plaintiff, engaged as a broker by defendant to effect an exchange of lands, undertook to collect compensation from the opposite party by insisting that defendant should pay a larger cash sum, it being agreed that as a commission from the opposite party he should receive the excess, plaintiff was guilty of such fraud as would deprive him of the right to collect commissions from defendant.

4. Brokers ⊂=66—Broker who entered into secret agreement with agents of opposite party to divide commission not entitled to recover.

Where plaintiff, acting as defendant's broker in an exchange of lands, agreed with brokers of opposite party to divide with them his commissions, he was guilty of conduct which deprived him of the right to collect commissions from defendant, for he was acting in a supposed confidential and advisory capacity towards defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by Joe Hageman against C. W. Colombet. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. C. McComish, of San Jose, for appellant.

Owen D. Richardson and J. B. Peckham, both of San Jose, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $1,250, alleged to be due as a commission for effecting an exchange of real estate. The trial court held that the transaction was so tainted with fraud on the part of the plaintiff as to preclude a recovery, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

[1] The appellant rested his right to recover upon certain writings signed and approved by the respondent. The respondent asserted that the agreements produced by appellant did not show the true contract, but had been fraudulently altered in material respects by the appellant after execution. During the course of the trial the court admitted, over the objection of appellant, evidence of verbal negotiations between the parties, for the purpose of ascertaining just what the parties had agreed to, and what was the real nature of the transaction between them. The evidence was properly admitted. In case of fraud no mere form of words of which the parties have made use can shut out inquiry as to the real facts. Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 533, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189. While the testimony is conflicting in material matters, certain facts appear which, with the inferences to be drawn therefrom, are amply sufficient to support the judgment. The respondent engaged the appellant, a real estate broker, acting as his agent only, to effect an exchange of respondent's apartment house and property in San Jose for the ranch property of E. J. Lee near Watsonville, upon conditions set out in a written offer signed by respondent.

One of the terms of the exchange contained in the offer when it was signed by respondent was the payment by respondent to Lee of the sum of $5,000 cash, in addition to the other expressed consideration. The respondent testified that there was no provision in the offer at that time as to the payment of a commission to appellant by either Lee or the respondent. The appellant took this offer to Lee, who was willing to make the exchange upon the terms offered by respondent, and induced Lee to pretend that he would not close the deal unless respondent paid him $7,500 cash, instead of $5,000 cash, as the offer stood, and to further agree to pay the additional $2,500 thus obtained from respondent to appellant as a commission for making the exchange. Lee agreed to the plan, and appellant, in the absence of respondent, and without his knowledge or consent, altered the written offer already signed by respondent, to read "$7,500 gold coin," instead of "$5,000 gold coin," as the amount respondent should pay in cash to Lee. He also inserted a stipulation that Lee should pay appellant a brokerage fee of $2,500, and that respondent should pay him a like fee of $1,250 for making the exchange. Lee then signed the altered agreement. Appellant then represented to respondent that Lee would not make the exchange unless he was paid $7,500 cash. Being anxious to consummate the deal, and believing the representations, respondent turned over to appellant $7,500, of which sum he paid Lee $5,000 only, retaining the balance of $2,500 for his purported commission. He later divided this amount with agents who represented Lee in the transaction. In this action he is seeking to recover $1,250 additional from respondent.

[2, 3] There is other evidence of the dealings between appellant and respondent and of the details of the entire transaction. But we think we have recited enough to show the nature of the fraud and bad faith, and the element of concealment on the part of appellant which characterized his dealings with the respondent. In all cases it is permissible to prove fraud by circumstances. In aid of the direct facts proved, legitimate inferences are permitted to be indulged in to establish other facts not directly in evidence. Maxson v. Llewelyn, 122 Cal. 195, 198, 54 Pac. 732.

Little need be supplied in this case, however, in addition to the facts proved. If the appellant was acting solely as agent for respondent, as the court found, he was bound in the exercise of the utmost good faith to use every endeavor to make the best bargain fairly obtainable for his principal. He admitted on the stand that he "was to make the best deal possible" for respondent. When he deliberately set about forcing respondent to pay $2,500 more to Lee than Lee was willing to accept in the exchange, in order that he might enrich himself to that extent under the guise of collecting a commission from Lee, he was guilty of such bad faith that his right to compensation from respondent was lost. 9 Corp. Jur. 566, and cases cited.

[4] Appellant was undoubtedly endeavoring to act in the matter of the exchange of properties for both Lee and the respondent, without respondent's knowledge or consent. The lower court also found that, during the course of his employment by respondent, and without his knowledge, the appellant entered into a secret agreement with the agents of Lee to pay them one-third of any commission he might receive making the exchange. He was not a mere middleman whose duty was ended when he brought appellant and respondent together. He was acting in a supposed confidential, advisory capacity for the respondent, who relied upon his advice and assistance. For these reasons, also, he was not entitled to recover in this action. Clark v. Allen, 125 Cal. 276, 278, 57 Pac. 985; 9 Corp. Jur. 568, 571.

The judgment is affirmed.

LOS ANGELES TITLE INS. CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (Civ. 3492.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 4, 1921. Rehearing Denied June 3, 1921.)

1. Injunction ⟸105(1)—Insurer of titles cannot restrain enforcement of inapplicable municipal license tax ordinance.

Where a municipal ordinance imposing license taxes on various businesses, including the business of preparing abstracts, excepted companies insuring titles, a title insurance company will not be granted an injunction restraining municipal authorities from enforcing the ordinance as to it, though not applicable, and though such companies were exempted by Const. art. 13, § 14; for equity will not enjoin a criminal prosecution on the ground of insufficiency of evidence of guilt.

2. Injunction ⟸85(1)—Enforcement of ordinance not restrained on theory that it imposed excessive penalties so that it could not be tested.

Although equity by injunction proceedings may determine the validity of a statute or ordinance which imposes such extreme or cumulative penalties that the persons affected are practically prevented from resorting to the courts to determine the validity or the applicability of the law, the proposed enforcement of a license ordinance which imposed a fine of $500 and imprisonment against violators, and declared that each day business was conducted without the payment of a license should be a separate violation will not be restrained on that ground, at the suit of a title insurance company which, though not within the terms of the ordinance, asserted that the municipal authorities were about to enforce the same against it.

Action by the Los Angeles Title Insurance Company against the City of Los Angeles and others for an injunction to restrain enforcement of a license tax ordinance. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Jesse E. Stephens, Wm. P. Mealey, and Julius V. Patrosso, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Tom C. Thornton and O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. From the complaint in this action it appears that the city council of the city of Los Angeles adopted an ordinance providing for licensing and regulating the carrying on of certain professions, trades, callings and occupations. It was provided in the ordinance that on and after January 1, 1920, it shall be unlawful for any person, etc., to carry on any of said occupations without having first procured a license from the city so to do. Certain fees are to be paid for each license. Among the businesses specified is that of searching titles to real property and issuing abstracts, statements, or certificates purporting to show the condition of the title to any particular property, "but which abstract, statement, or certificate does not insure or purport to insure the title to real property, or any interest therein." Violation of the provisions of the ordinance is made a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment in the city jail for a period of not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"Each such person, firm or corporation shall be deemed guilty of a separate offense for every day during any portion of which any violation of any provision of this ordinance is committed, continued or permitted by such person, firm or corporation, and shall be punishable therefor as provided by this ordinance."

The complaint further shows that the plaintiff is engaged solely in the business of issuing for a premium certain classes of documents (which are set forth as exhibits to the complaint) relating to the title of real property. The plaintiff does not issue any abstracts, statements, or certificates relating to the condition of title to any property, or purporting to show or certify to the condition or state of title to any property, excepting only the said documents. It is further alleged:

"That under and pursuant to the terms and provisions of art. 13, § 14, Constitution of the state of California and acts of the Legislature of the state of California passed pursuant thereto, plaintiff is compelled to pay to the state of California as a tax a certain percentage of its gross premiums. Plaintiff alleges upon its information and belief that by the terms and under the force and effect of said section 14, art. 13, of the Constitution of the state of California it is not subject to any taxation by the defendant city of Los Angeles either in the form attempted by said purported Ordinance No. 39600 (New Series) or otherwise or at all, and that said city of Los Angeles has no jurisdiction to impose upon this plaintiff the tax or so-called license fee provided in said ordinance."

It is alleged that the city of Los Angeles threatens to, and will, unless restrained and enjoined therefrom, endeavor to enforce the terms of said purported ordinance against the plaintiff; that, if plaintiff fails or declines to secure a license and to pay therefor the fees as fixed and provided in the ordinance, the city will institute criminal proceedings against the plaintiff and its officers for alleged breach of the purported ordinance and will cause the plaintiff and its officers to be prosecuted therefor, and will endeavor to collect from the plaintiff the fees provided in said ordinance. Further facts are stated to the effect that such adverse proceedings against plaintiff will result in great and irreparable injury and damage to the plaintiff and its business; that plaintiff has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law.

By reason of the facts so alleged, the plaintiff prayed for a judgment decreeing that said purported ordinance has no operation or effect as to the plaintiff, that the plaintiff has a right to conduct its business without procuring the license provided for in the purported ordinance and without paying the fees fixed therein, and that the defendant city, its officers and agents, be enjoined from attempting to enforce any of the provisions of said purported ordinance against the plaintiff.

The defendants demurred to the complaint upon the grounds that the court has no jurisdiction of the subject of the action, and that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendants or any of them. The demurrer having been overruled, defendants declined to answer, and a decree was entered in favor of the plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. The defendants appeal from the judgment.

[1] Aside from the contention (which will be considered later herein) that the ordinance is void by reason of excessive penalties provided therein, no attack is made upon its validity. If it be true in fact that the plaintiff in the course of its business limits itself to the business of an insurance company, then it is not subject to the provisions of the ordinance, or, in other words, the ordinance does not apply to the plaintiff and its business. The ordinance does not in any way disregard the provisions of the Constitution to which reference has been made. This being so, the plaintiff's action is one wherein it seeks to enjoin certain officers of the defendant city, charged with the enforcement of its laws, from wrongfully prosecuting the plaintiff by accusing it of the commission of a misdemeanor in that it has violated the provisions of a valid ordinance. The case is practically the same as it would be if these officers were threatening to prosecute the plaintiff for conducting a grocery business without obtaining a license required by the ordinance, when in fact the plaintiff was not conducting or proposing to conduct a grocery business in the city of Los Angeles. It seems very clear that an injunction will not be granted to protect any person from prosecution for the alleged commission of a criminal offense by proving to a court of equity that he is not guilty of such offense. The court having jurisdiction over criminal offenses is the forum in which such questions of fact must be determined.

"Courts of equity will, in proper cases, enjoin the attempt to enforce a law or ordinance making certain acts a criminal offense and imposing a punishment therefor, where the law or ordinance is invalid and its enforcement will injure or destroy the plaintiff's property or property rights. * * * These however, are all cases where the penal law was considered invalid. * * * We know of no principle of jurisprudence which authorizes a court of equity, on the ground that it will prevent a multiplicity of actions, or that it will prevent an injurious interference with plaintiff's business, to proceed to investigate as to the truth of criminal charges that have been or may be preferred against him, to hear the evidence in regard to his guilt or innocence, to determine, in advance of the decision of the lawfully constituted criminal courts, the question of his guilt or innocence of pending charges and his probable guilt or innocence of future charges, and, if found in his favor, to forestall the action of the law courts and enjoin the enforcement of a constitutional and valid law against him, on the sole ground that there is not, and never will be, sufficient evidence of his guilt." Sullivan v. San Francisco Gas, etc., Co., 148 Cal. 368, 83 Pac. 156, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401, 7 Ann. Cas. 574.

[2] Respondent, while conceding the validity of the ordinance in all other respects, contends that by reason of severe and rigorous penalties imposed thereby, its enforcement against the plaintiff will constitute a denial of due process of law and of the equal protection of the laws. The doctrine relied upon, in so far as it has the support of judicial authority, is declared in Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 52 L. Ed. 714, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 932, 14 Ann. Cas. 764. This decision has been approved in many later cases, some of which are mentioned in the brief of respondent herein. As stated by counsel for respondent:

It was determined in Ex parte Young "substantially as follows: That when the penalties for disobedience of a law are by fines or imprisonment so heavy and severe that the persons affected thereby are as a practical proposition prevented from resorting to the court for the purpose of determining the validity of the statute, they are thereby denied the equal protection of the law and their property rendered liable to be taken without due process of law, and that such statute is therefore void as being in conflict with the Constitution of the United States."

We have underscored the clause in counsel's statement which differentiates that decision, and those which have followed it, from the case at bar. There is nothing in the present action evincing a purpose of, or necessity for, determining the validity of the provisions of the ordinance whereby license fees are imposed upon persons conducting the businesses specified therein. In Ex parte Young, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States quoted from its earlier decision in Cotting v. Godard, 183 U. S. 79, at page 102, 22 Sup. Ct. 30, at page 39, 46 L. Ed. at page 106, as follows:

"It is doubtless true that the state may impose penalties such as will tend to compel obedience to its mandates by all, individuals or corporations, and if extreme and cumulative penalties are imposed only after there has been a final determination of the validity of the statute, the question would be very different from that here presented. But when the Legislature, in an effort to prevent any inquiry of the validity of a particular statute, so burdens any challenge thereof in the courts, that the party affected is necessarily constrained to submit rather than take the chances of the penalties imposed, then it becomes a serious question whether the party is not deprived of the equal protection of the laws."

This was very far from a declaration that one who is not challenging the validity of a statute upon any other ground will by reason of the severity of the penalties prescribed by the statute be entitled to a decree restraining the officers of the law from prosecuting him for alleged violation of such statute.

The judgment is reversed.

FAVORITE et ux. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3524.)

1. Mandamus ⟸154(2)—Petition, not showing what parties appeared or what objections were urged to order complained of, is insufficient for a peremptory writ.

In a proceeding for writ of mandate against the superior court to enforce contempt proceedings, where the petition merely showed that the matter was heard and the order dismissed, and not whether the adverse parties appeared, or what objections might have been urged against the order, if any, a peremptory writ was properly refused.

2. Contempt ⟸21—Court held without jurisdiction to order corporation to exhibit its books to plaintiff in action for damages.

It was the duty of plaintiffs, in an action against a corporation and others for damages caused through defendant's acts in obtaining contracts with plaintiffs, and because of frauds committed in connection therewith, to have secured all information essential to the designation of the parties, including the stockholders' names and shares held by each before commencing their action, so that the court was without jurisdiction to make an order requiring the corporation to exhibit its books to plaintiffs, so that a contempt order should not be enforced.

3. Discovery ⟸96—Order requiring corporation to exhibit books should not be granted upon ex parte application, but only after notice.

In an action against a corporation for damages in procuring contracts from plaintiffs and for fraud, held that an order that the corporation exhibit its books to the plaintiff to furnish information as to stockholders and the amount of stock held by each was not an order to be granted in the first instance upon ex parte application under Code Civ. Proc. § 166, declaring that such may be made at chambers by judges of the superior court, but could only be secured after notice to the opposite party, in the same manner as prescribed for securing of inspection of documents by the provisions of section 1000.

4. Mandamus ⟸181(4)—Peremptory writ to compel contempt proceedings denied, where order violated was erroneously made.

Where an order of the superior court that a corporation exhibit to plaintiffs certain books was improper, the court had authority to vacate it as having been inadvertently made, and to dismiss the proceeding, and where the facts were presented in answer to the order to show cause why the circuit court should not be compelled by mandamus to proceed against the officers of the corporation for contempt for violation of such order, the peremptory writ should be denied.

Petition by O. J. M. Favorite and wife for writ of mandate against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for San Bernardino County and J. W. Curtis, Judge thereof. Alternative writ was issued. Peremptory writ denied.

D. B. Chapin, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Adair & Winder, of Riverside, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Petitioners prosecute this proceeding for the purpose of obtaining a writ of mandate to compel the respondent superior court to enforce contempt proceedings against the secretary of the Security Investment Company, a corporation, the alleged contempt consisting in the refusal of said secretary to obey an order requiring that he exhibit to the petitioners the stock books of the corporation in order that they might ascertain the names of the stockholders and the number of shares owned by each. Petitioners had insisted upon that right under the terms of section 378 of the Civil Code, as alleged creditors of the corporation. By the petition filed herein petitioners show that at the time of the commencement of this proceeding there was pending in the superior court of the county of San Bernardino an action wherein these petitioners were the plaintiffs and the Security Investment Company and others defendants, which action was one to secure judgment for a large amount of damages alleged to have been caused to the plaintiffs through certain acts of the defendant corporation in obtaining the contracts of the plaintiffs, and because of acts of fraud committed in connection therewith. The petition shows that in the action referred to there were named as defendants more than 100 persons and corporations fictitiously designated, whose connection with the action was shown by an allegation in the complaint that such fictitiously named parties were stockholders in the corporation defendant, and that the particular names and the amount of stock held by each were unknown to the plaintiffs. The petition herein further recites that the superior court in that action made its order requiring the plaintiffs to amend their complaint and show the true names and the number of shares of stock held by the various persons and corporations therein fictitiously designated; that in order to obtain that information plaintiffs made a written application, and filed the same in the court wherein the action was pending, which application set forth that plaintiffs were creditors of the defendant corporation; that they had demanded leave to inspect the books of the corporation for the purpose of obtaining the names and number of shares of the stockholders, and that such demand had been refused; further stating that in order to comply with the direction of the court requiring an amendment to be made to the complaint it was necessary that the information be secured. The petition further shows that upon the filing of that application, which was presented ex parte and without notice to the corporation or its officers, the superior court made its order requiring the stock books of the Security Investment Company to be exhibited to the plaintiffs. The petition further shows that the order so made was served upon the secretary of the corporation, and that the secretary refused to comply therewith; that thereafter these petitioners applied to the superior court for an order requiring said secretary to appear and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt in disobeying the order of the court. In the petition it is then alleged.

"That on, to wit, the 14th day of February, 1921, said order to show cause came on for hearing before said court and judge, and said court and judge then and there made and entered an order dismissing the same, and refused and still refuses to enforce said order. That the said judge had no discretion to grant or refuse an order for an attachment for the contempt in said matter, but was bound in law to issue it."

Alternative writ was issued herein. In response thereto respondent demurred to the sufficiency of the facts stated in the petition, and upon the issue of law so raised the matter was submitted for final determination.

[1] In order to determine whether the action of the trial judge in dismissing the order to show cause was without justification, it is necessary that it be made to appear what particular matters were before the court upon the hearing of the order to show cause. The petition shows merely that the matter came on for hearing, and that the order was dismissed. Whether the adverse parties appeared, and as to what objections might have there been urged against the order as made, if any, we are not advised, and this condition of the petition affords sufficient reason in itself why peremptory writ should be withheld.

[2] However, several points are urged on behalf of respondent in opposition to the prayer for the writ, chief of which are: First, that the court in the action referred to had no jurisdiction to make an order requiring the corporation to exhibit its books to plaintiff; second, that if jurisdiction to make an order of that purport be conceded, that such order could not be granted upon an ex parte application, but could only be secured after notice to the opposite party, in the same manner as is prescribed for the securing of inspection of documents by the provisions of section 1000, Code of Civil Procedure. We are inclined to agree with respondent as to both of these positions. It was the duty of plaintiffs in the action referred to, to have secured all information essential to the designation of the parties, to wit, the names of the stockholders and the number of shares held by each, before commencing their action. That suit in no way involved an issue to obtain a disclosure of the names and stock holdings of the fictitiously designated defendants. It was an action purely for damages and does not fall within the holding of State ex rel. Watkins v. Donnell Mfg. Co., 129 Mo. App. 206, 107 S. W. 1112, where the Missouri Court of Appeal said:

"When a proceeding in equity is pending between the same parties at the time of the application for mandamus, in which suit the relief sought by mandamus could be fully administered, it is entirely proper for the court to decline to issue the writ."

This authority was cited by petitioners in response to respondent's claim that the plaintiffs in the superior court action should have proceeded by mandamus to obtain the inspection desired, that remedy being declared a proper one in Johnson v. Langdon, 135 Cal. 624, 67 Pac. 1050, 87 Am. St. Rep. 156.

[3] Under respondent's second point we are of the opinion that the order made was not one to be classified as of the kind "usually granted in the first instance upon ex parte application," as section 166, Code of Civil Procedure, declares may be made at chambers by judges of the superior court. The corporation and its officers, had they been given notice, might have resisted the application for the order by a showing, for instance, that there were no stockholders in any number other than those particularly named in plaintiff's complaint, and that would have been a complete answer to the application.

[4] As before stated, we are unable to determine from the petition what, if anything, was presented to the trial court on the return day of the contempt order. If the order was improper to be made upon ex parte application, as we think it was, the court had authority to vacate it as having been inadvertently made, and to dismiss the proceeding. Section 937, Code Civ. Proc. If facts were presented in answer to the order to show cause, furnishing reason why the court should refrain from further proceeding against the officers of the corporation, the order of dismissal would again be fully justified. For these reasons we think that this court should decline to issue the writ.

Peremptory writ is denied, with costs to respondent.

PORTER v. PORTER. (Civ. 2834.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 2, 1921.)

Divorce ⊂=37(14)—Facts insufficient to show "willful neglect of husband to provide wife the common necessaries of life."

Where, shortly after their marriage, the husband enlisted in the United States Army, the nation then being at war, and some months after enlistment arranged an allotment out of his army pay so that the wife received $30 per month, and it did not appear that the husband was able to pay anything more, there was no "willful neglect to provide for the wife the common necessaries of life" within Civ. Code, § 105, so as to warrant divorce.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action for divorce by L. Mae Porter against Ross O. Porter. From a judgment denying divorce, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. P. Johnson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

CONREY, P. J. Appeal by the plaintiff from judgment denying her application for a divorce from the defendant. There were two causes of action set out in the complaint, one being on account of willful desertion and the second on account of willful neglect. The parties were married on April 11, 1917, at Los Angeles, California. On April 9th defendant had enlisted in the United States Army. On the 13th he was required to report for duty, and was still absent in that service on May 6, 1918, when the complaint in this action was filed. Personal service of the summons and complaint was made upon the defendant in the county of San Diego. His default on nonappearance was duly entered. Nevertheless, an attorney appointed by the court appeared to represent defendant at the trial.

Appellant contends that the court erred in denying a decree of divorce "for the reason that desertion is purely a matter of intent, and our contention is that the intent to desert was clearly shown in his case." The evidence consists of the testimony of the plaintiff and of her mother, together with a letter of the defendant to the plaintiff dated April 7, 1918. The testimony entirely fails to show any abandonment of the plaintiff by the defendant at the time when he responded to the call for service in the army. The letter shows that at the time of writing defendant had decided that he would not again live with the plaintiff, but it likewise indicated that he had very recently arrived at that decision.

The evidence is equally insufficient to prove willful neglect of the husband in failing to provide for his wife the common necessaries of life, he having the ability to do so. Civ. Code, § 105. In November, 1917, the defendant arranged for an allotment to her out of his army pay, and from the time when that went into effect until the trial of this action, she was receiving that allotment, amounting to $30 per month. There is no evidence that defendant was able to pay anything more. Willful desertion or willful neglect must continue for one year before either is a ground for divorce. The plaintiff failed to establish a case on either of the grounds stated. The appeal is entirely without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

HANNA v. DE KOCH. (Civ. 3275.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 29, 1921.)

1. Venue ⊂=56—Petition for change of place of trial must be accompanied by written demand.

In addition to petition for change of place of trial and moving papers, a demand must be made in writing as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 396.

2. Venue ⊂=66—Affidavit of merits must state facts showing good defense.

Affidavits of merits filed with a petition for change of place of trial was not sufficient, where it was to the effect that appellant had stated "her" case to her counsel and that he had advised her that she had a good defense; a statement of "her" case not being "the" case under Code Civ. Proc. § 396.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by W. H. Hanna, doing business under the firm name and style of the Santa Barbara Realty Company, against Serena De Koch. From an order denying motion for change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Smith, of Santa Barbara, and J. Mack Love, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Balaam & Balaam, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion for a change of place of trial. The motion was denied upon the grounds that appellant had failed to demand, in writing, that the trial of the cause be had in the proper county, and that she had filed no sufficient affidavit of merits, both as required by Code of Civil Procedure, § 396.

[1] The appellant concedes that she presented no "demand" in terms, but she contends that demand was substantially made in other papers filed in the proceeding. She refers to her petition for change and to a certain notice that the matter would be heard at a stated time. We discover nothing in these papers to differentiate them from others of their kind, and to determine that their contents obviated the necessity for a demand would be to hold that no demand is necessary in any proceeding for change. A petition, or motion, in such a proceeding will always acquaint the other party with the fact that a change is desired, but that is not sufficient. The statute specifically requires that, in addition to the moving papers, a demand be made (Code Civ. Proc., § 396; Pennie v. Visher, 94 Cal. 323, 29 Pac. 711), and we cannot legislate the provision out of existence.

[2] The affidavit of merits was to the effect that appellant had stated her case to her counsel and that he had advised her that she had a good defense. Such affidavits have been held insufficient, times almost without number. People v. Larue, 66 Cal. 235, 5 Pac. 157; Martin v. Superior Court, 176 Cal. 289, 168 Pac. 135, L. R. A. 1918B, 313. A statement of her case is not a statement of the case, but only a statement of her defense.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MARSIGLIA. (Cr. 750.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 29, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⊂⊃1129(3)—Leading questions objected to must be pointed out in assignments of error.

Where, in assignments of error, accused asserts that the court erroneously permitted the prosecution to ask leading, suggestive, and impeaching questions, but the questions complained of are not pointed out, the appellate court is not required to consider such assignments.

2. Witnesses ⊂⊃380(5)—State's witness, unexpectedly failing to identify accused, could be questioned as to his testimony at preliminary examination.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, where witnesses for the prosecution failed at the trial to identify accused as the person who committed the crime, it was not error for the prosecuting attorney to read from the transcript of testimony given by such witnesses at the preliminary hearing, which identified accused, and to ask them if they so testified; no objection being made at the time on the ground that the transcript was not shown to the witnesses before they were questioned concerning it, nor that the prosecuting attorney did not indicate surprise at their failure to identify accused.

3. Witnesses ⊂⊃380(5)—Whether party surprised at testimony of one witness a question for trial court's discretion.

Whether a party is so surprised at the testimony of his own witness at the trial as to justify allowing the party to show prior inconsistent statements or testimony of the witness held, discretionary with the trial court.

4. Criminal law ⊂⊃1035(3)—Timely objection must be made to prejudicial remarks by court.

Upon objection to the admission of accused's written confession, the court's statement that it did not appear to him that the confession had been procured by force, threats, or promises held, not reviewable, where no objection was made at the time, for misconduct on the part of the court is not considered on appeal unless the party complaining promptly made assignment of misconduct thereon so that the court was given opportunity to prevent prejudice, especially where the remark, as here, was not such that any prejudicial influence therefrom could not have been removed if timely objection had been made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Gaspard M. Marsiglia was convicted of robbery and also of rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

Le Roy D. Barnett, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery and also of the crime of rape. The cases were consolidated and tried together. The appeal is taken from the judgment and order denying motion for new trial. On the night of February 17, 1920, it was charged that Marsiglia and his two codefendants, Mike B. Gonzales and Frank Macchiaroli, at the point of revolvers, held up and robbed Leon Esquerre and Marie Gracienne and committed the crime of rape against Marie Gracienne. On the trial Esquerre and Marie Gracienne testified to the facts constituting the offenses, and a written confession signed by all three of the defendants was introduced in evidence. The defendant Marsiglia alone appeals at this time.

[1] Appellant has made three assignments of error. In the first two it is asserted that the court erroneously permitted the prosecution to ask "leading, suggestive, and impeaching questions." The questions complained of are not pointed out, and under such a circumstance the record is not in such a condition as to justify a consideration of these assignments of error upon appeal. People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, 67 Pac. 770; People v. Cebulla, 137 Cal. 314, 70 Pac. 181; People v. Woon Tuck Wo, 120 Cal. 297, 52 Pac. 833.

However, from the discussion in appellant's brief and a careful perusal of the record we conclude that the rulings complained of were those permitting the prosecuting attorney to ask of certain witnesses for the prosecution questions concerning testimony given by them at the preliminary examination. This was done in connection with the witness Marie Gracienne and also the witness Esquerre. Section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"A witness may also be impeached by evidence that he has made, at other times, statements inconsistent with his present testimony; but before this can be done the statements must be related to him, with the circumstances of time, places, and persons present, and he must be asked whether he made such statements, and, if so, allowed to explain them. If the statements be in writing, they must be shown to the witness before any question is put to him concerning them."

Esquerre was called as a witness for the prosecution. He testified that he could not identify the defendant Macchiaroli as one of the men who committed the offenses charged. Whereupon the prosecuting attorney, over the objection that the question was "argumentive, leading, and suggestive" and "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not proper direct examination, leading and suggestive," and also tending "to impeach his own witness," was permitted to read from the transcript of the testimony of Esquerre given at the preliminary hearing in the same case as follows:

"Q. Now, what two took her out of the machine and across the street? A. Those two over there. Q. Referring to Gonzales and Marsiglia? A. Yes, sir."

And the witness was asked if he so testified. Other similar excerpts were read from the transcript which clearly contradicted the testimony of the witness then on the stand to the effect that he could not identify Marsiglia as having been present and having taken part in the commission of the robbery and rape.

[2, 3] None of the objections made by counsel were meritorious. It was not objected that the witness was not shown the transcript of the testimony given by him at the preliminary examination before being questioned concerning it, nor that the prosecuting attorney did not indicate surprise at the testimony of the witness in failing to identify Marsiglia. Had these matters been called to the attention of the trial court by proper objections, no doubt the prosecuting attorney would have been required to lay a more complete foundation before his impeaching questions would have been permitted. However, in so far as the preliminary question of surprise is concerned, that is a matter addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court. Zipperlen v. So. Pac. Co., 7 Cal. App. 206, 93 Pac. 1049. In this instance the complete change in the witness' testimony was properly regarded by the trial court as sufficient indication of the prosecuting attorney's surprise.

It is claimed by respondent that the questions addressed to the witness Marie Gracienne were merely to refresh her memory. But construing them favorably to the defendant, the most that can be said is that this witness was impeached by the prosecuting attorney who had called her in the same way and on the same point and under the same circumstances as was Esquerre.

[4] The third ground of appeal is based upon a statement of the trial court made in the presence of the jury. Appellant contends that the court invaded the province of the jury. The statement made by the trial court of which complaint is made is as follows:

"It does not appear to me that the alleged confession or the so-called statement was procured by force or by threats or by promises."

Objection to the admission of the written confession had been made and the quotation from the court occurs in the transcript at the point where the objection was about to be passed upon. The court's language to which exception is taken was not objected to at the time. It is well settled that misconduct on the part of the court will not be considered on appeal unless the party complaining promptly made assignment of misconduct thereon, so that the court might be given an opportunity to correct the irregularity and prevent prejudicial ruling. It cannot be said that the remark complained of in this case was of such character that any influence which it might have had upon the minds of the jurors could not have been removed if timely objection had been made by counsel for the defendant. Under such circumstances it is well settled that the assignment of misconduct cannot be given consideration on appeal. People v. Osborn, 12 Cal. App. 148, 106 Pac. 891; People v. Walker, 15 Cal. App. 400, 114 Pac. 1009; People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 140 Pac. 256.

ANGLO-AMERICAN LAND CO. v. HEINE et ux. (Civ. 3734.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. May 3, 1921.)

1. Evidence ⊂=595—In case of conflicting evidence, trial court may indulge in inference from evidence.

Where the evidence was conflicting, it was proper for the court, having accepted the evidence of one party as true, to indulge the legitimate inferences and deductions arising from such evidence in arriving at a proper understanding of the facts considered directly approved.

2. Appeal and error ⊂=1012(2)—Finding of trial court supported by evidence not disturbed as against weight of evidence.

Where there is evidence sufficient to support the fact findings of the trial court, the appellate court cannot disturb the judgment on the ground of insufficiency of evidence, though it may be of the opinion that the weight of the evidence is against the finding.

3. Mortgages ⊂=319(3)—Evidence held to establish satisfaction of mortgage by payment.

In an action on a deficiency judgment where the property which was subject to several incumbrances had been conveyed to plaintiff's assignor, evidence held to show that the conveyance was pursuant to an arrangement between the parties whereby the note secured by the mortgage was discharged and paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Anglo-American Land Company, a corporation, against Frederick F. Heine and wife. From a judgment for defendants in an action on a deficiency judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gerald C. Halsey, of San Francisco (Frederic T. Leo, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendants, husband and wife, the sum of $6,000, alleged to be due as a deficiency after sale of real property under a deed of trust given to secure a promissory note. The trial court held that the note had been paid, satisfied, and discharged, and gave judgment for the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals. Insufficiency of the evidence to support the above finding of the court, and errors in admitting evidence, are the grounds relied upon to secure a reversal of the judgment.

[1] In presenting the question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence to support the court's finding that the promissory note, on which was based the right of the plaintiff to recover, had been paid, satisfied, and discharged on May 28, 1914, counsel for the respective parties have each presented a careful analysis of the testimony. These discussions only serve to emphasize what clearly appears from the record; that there is an irreconcilable conflict in the testimony of the two real parties to the action. It was the province of the trial court, under such circumstances, to accept the evidence of one or the other as true, and, if satisfied therewith, to decide the issues in the light of such testimony. In doing so it was proper for the court to indulge the legitimate inference and deduction arising from the testimony in arriving at a proper understanding of the facts it considered directly proved. Maxson v. Llewellyn, 122 Cal. 195, 198, 54 Pac. 732.

[2] When there is evidence in the record which, if believed and accepted as true by the trial court, is sufficient to support its findings and judgment, the appellate court cannot disregard the lower court's decision and reverse the judgment on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence. And this is so even though the appellate court may be of the opinion that the weight of the evidence is against the finding. Lewis v. Covillaud, 21 Cal. 179, 190. The motives which may have impelled the parties to testify as they did, the circumstance that certain lines of defense may have been drawn very late in the case, and the probability, or improbability, of the facts established, were matters for the consideration of the trial court, and not for this court on appeal.

The relations between J. W. Wright, whom the court found to be the real party plaintiff in the action, and the defendant, Frederick F. Heine, began in 1913, when Heine, through Wright, acting as his agent, purchased an unimproved lot in the city of San Francisco. In dealing with the property and making arrangements for erecting a building thereon, Heine mortgaged the easterly half of the lot to one Murdoch for $18,000, and arranged with Wright to advance him certain additional sums of money, not exceeding $6,000, as a building loan on the same property. He and his wife thereupon executed the promissory note which forms the basis of this suit for the sum of $7,500 to the J. W. Wright & Sons Investment Company, and secured its payment by the execution and delivery of a deed of trust of the one-half of the real property. Heine erected a building on the half of the lot at a cost of $31,000. In May, 1914, he gave to the J. W. Wright & Co., Inc., an option for the entire property agreeing to sell it, free of all incumbrances, for $56,000. Within the time limited Heine and wife executed a deed to Walter J. Rowley, a clerk, who seems to have been working indiscriminately for Wright and the two companies bearing his name.

On September 1, 1917, alleging that only $500 of the principal of the $7,500 note had been paid, the substituted trustee under the deed of trust proceeded to sell the half of the property covered thereby to satisfy the indebtedness. At the trustee's sale, of which the defendants had no notice, Wright purchased the property for the sum of $1,000, subject to the Murdoch mortgage, and received the trustee's deed therefor. After crediting this $1,000 upon the note, Wright caused the J. W. Wright & Sons Investment Company, ostensibly the holders of the obligation, to transfer the note to this plaintiff, and thereupon commenced this action to recover from plaintiff $6,000, alleged to be due by reason of the facts we have related.

Defendants base their defense to the action upon their contention that the note had been fully paid, satisfied and discharged by Wright at the time of the agreement and transfer of the property by defendants to Rowley. Incidental to the main issue there arose a controversy as to the amount received on the note by the defendants from Wright. The contract under which the note was executed specified that, notwithstanding the fact that the note was drawn for $7,500, no more than $6,000 should be advanced by J. W. Wright & Co. It was, and is, admitted that only two amounts, aggregating $4,500 in cash, were actually paid by Wright during the erection of the building. Wright and the plaintiff sought to maintain in the court below that, in addition to the $4,500 cash advanced, Heine was indebted to Wright at the time of the execution of the note on another promissory note for $2,500, which was included in the new obligation, which increased Heine's indebtedness to $7,000. Heine unequivocally denied the execution or the existence of any such note, and Wright was unable to produce it. The plaintiff further alleges that, prior to the commencement of the present action, defendants had paid the sum of $500 on account of the principal of the $7,500 note. This allegation was positively denied, and the court found that it was not true. On the issue thus presented, the trial court found that at no time was there ever more than $4,500 due, owing, and unpaid on the note secured by the deed of trust.

[3] On the main issue raised by defendants' contention that their obligation to J. W. Wright & Sons was actually paid and discharged at the time of the transfer of the property to Rowley, and as a part of that transaction, the testimony was equally conflicting. By the terms of the three-day option given to J. W. Wright & Co., Inc., by the defendant Heine, the latter engaged to sell the entire property, free of all incumbrances, for $56,000 and agreed to pay Wright & Co., as their compensation, all over that sum that might be obtained. As a matter of fact, Wright bought the property at the price mentioned for one of his companies. Defendant Heine testified that it was agreed between Wright and himself, as a part of the transaction, that the $7,500 note executed by himself and wife was to be paid off immediately, and that he was to be relieved of any future financial responsibility in reference to the incumbrances on the property, of which there were three, including the Wright deed of trust securing that note.

While Wright strenuously denied that there was any such agreement, certain features of the transaction brought out by the evidence tend to support the defendants' contention and, no doubt, had the serious consideration of the trial court. When the deed passed from the defendants to Rowley under the agreement with Wright, it contained a stipulation that the conveyance was "subject to an indebtedness of $34,000." The indebtedness on the property at that time included the trust deed to Murdoch, $18,000; the trust deed to one Unna, $9,000, and the trust deed to Wright & Sons, now claimed by Wright to have amounted to $7,000 at that time, the total aggregating $34,000. The trial court found, however, that the defendants were only indebted to Wright, or to his companies, at that time in the sum of $4,500. Taking the determination of the trial court in that regard, the aggregate indebtedness on the property was but $31,500. This amount subtracted from the net selling price of $56,000, leaves remaining $24,500 due to the defendants. The significant fact appears that that is the exact sum for which Wright & Co. accounted to the defendants in closing and settling the transaction. We cannot but think this fact sheds much light upon the position of the parties, and tends strongly to corroborate the contention of the defendants, and to support the finding of the trial court to the effect that the note of the defendants was in fact paid and discharged.

Basing its argument on a portion of the testimony of defendant Frederick F. Heine to the effect that, under his agreement with Wright, he was to be released from future financial responsibility on the various incumbrances, the appellant contends that such agreement, even though it were made, did not release the joint debtor, defendant Agnes Heine, the wife. But there is other testimony of the respondent to the effect that the agreement was that the amount due on the note "was to be paid off immediately by Mr. Wright." When that was done, as was found by the trial court, the obligation of both debtors was extinguished.

The deed from the defendants to Rowley recited that the property was conveyed subject to an indebtedness of $34,000. Appellant contends that this aggregate amount was intended to include $7,000 due from the defendants. It attempts to argue that the court was, therefore, in error in admitting evidence to the effect that only $4,500 was due as a matter of fact on the promissory note here sued on, asserting that such evidence tends to vary the terms of a written agreement, the deed. We do not think the contention merits consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

LONGUY v. LA SOCIETÉ FRANCAISE DE BIENFAISANCE MUTUELLE.

(Civ. 3787.)

1. Hospitals ⟸7—Student nurse, volunteering to look after patient at hospital, held within the scope of her employment.

In an action against a hospital for the death of a child burned while being treated, while cared for by student nurse, who had volunteered to do the work for that night, where the head nurse had given permission for student to care for the child, held that such student was directly engaged within the scope of her employment at time of the injury.

2. Witnesses ⟸386—In an action against hospital for death of a patient resident physician's certificate of death held not admissible to impeach undertaker.

In an action against a hospital for the death of a child patient from burns alleged to have been received through neglect, the certificate of the hospital's resident physician that the child died of pneumonia was not admissible to discredit testimony of the undertaker as to condition of child's body from burns, on the ground that he, as well as the attending physician, had signed such certificate, required by law, for the undertaker merely certified to the interment and place of burial, and not the cause of death.

3. Appeal and error ⟸1058(1)—Evidence ⟸157(8), 383(4)—In an action for death of hospital patient from burning it was error not to admit a certified copy of the death record, but error was harmless in view of other evidence.

In an action against hospital for the death of a child from negligent burning where the defendant claimed the child died from pneumonia, the certificate of death of resident physician is prima facie evidence of the cause of death under Deering's Gen. Laws, p. 2006, St. 1915, p. 575, but failure to admit certified copy of death record resulted in no harm to defendant, since the testimony of the physician, who was a witness, was the best evidence.

4. Hospitals ⟸8—In action for death of patient burned by inhalator, evidence of inhalators used in other hospitals held incompetent.

In an action against hospital for damages for the death of a patient, accidentally burned from an inhalator for vaporizing eucalyptus oil while being treated for pneumonia, it was error to admit and refuse to strike evidence of the kind of inhalators used at two other institutions, admitted to show defendant's negligence, there being no testimony of the general custom as well as practice of well appointed and managed hospitals in the matter of inhalators.

5. Evidence ⟸110—Evidence of party's falsehood or fraud in attempting to procure witness to testify differently held admissible.

In an action against a hospital for damages for death of plaintiff's child from accidental burning, it was error to exclude proof that plaintiff attempted to procure defendant's resident physician to testify favorably as to death being caused from the burns, and not from pneumonia, since evidence of a party's falsehood or fraud in the preparation and presentation of the case is receivable.

6. Evidence ⟸544, 571(9)—Nurses held competent to state opinion whether death was caused by burning or disease.

In an action against hospital for the death of plaintiff's minor child from being burned while being treated for pneumonia, the exclusion of evidence of graduate nurses with long and varied experience as experts as to whether in their opinion the child would have died of disease at about the time she did die if not burned, and also of undergraduate nurses, was error, since they were competent, and the fact that some were undergraduates was merely a matter going to the weight of testimony.

7. Trial ⟸252(8)—In action against hospital, an instruction that student nurses were not allowed to work more than 8 hours held properly refused.

In an action against hospital for damages for death of a child pneumonia patient from burning by fire set by an inhalator, where the child was being cared for by student nurses voluntarily working overtime, an instruction that the law does not allow a female student employed in hospital to work more than 8 hours during any day was properly refused.

8. Appeal and error ⟸843(2)—Where case must be reversed for error pointed out, other assignments need not be considered.

Where a case must be reversed for error pointed out, it becomes unnecessary to consider the contention of the appellant that the verdict for damages is excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by Frank Longuy against the La Société Francaise De Bienfaisance Mutuelle for damages for death of a child. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Chickering & Gregory, and Evan Williams, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The defendant, a corporation commonly known as the French Hospital of San Francisco, appeals from a judgment after a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, rendered in an action brought by plaintiff to recover damages for the death of his infant child, caused, it is alleged, by being fatally burned while an inmate and under the care of the defendant. Liability of the defendant is predicated upon the alleged carelessness and negligence of one of the student nurses of the defendant placed in charge of the child by the hospital superintendent. Trial was by a jury, which rendered verdict in plaintiff's favor in the sum of $5,134.

The little girl, 2½ years old, and her mother, were members of a mutual association, paying certain monthly dues for the privilege of membership, which entitled them to surgical and medical treatment gratis at the French Hospital. During the influenza epidemic in October, 1918, the child was very ill with bronchial pneumonia, probably induced by influenza. She was taken to the hospital by the mother and remained there until her death, which occurred about two weeks later. During the latter part of the period oxygen was administered on two occasions to keep the baby alive, and she was in a cyanotic, or blue, condition. The mother remained with the child, occupying the private room with her in the hospital, until the morning of October 26th, when she returned to her home. Before leaving the hospital the plaintiff and his wife endeavored to secure the services of a trained nurse, but, due to the epidemic, such service was not to be had. Thereupon two student nurses, who were then in training at the hospital, volunteered to take care of the baby during the night, dividing the time between them. As the state law forbade them working more than 8 hours, they went to Miss Murphy, head nurse of the hospital, and asked her permission to take care of the child, stating that it was purely a voluntary act on their part, but as the child was very ill and needed watching, they were willing to take care of the patient during their extra hours. Miss Murphy stated she did not want them to work all day and all night too, and that the rules of the hospital forbade their working overtime, but that under the circumstances it would be all right for them to do so.

One of these nurses took care of the patient until midnight when the other relieved her. The child had great difficulty in breathing, and an awning was constructed over its bed, within which was placed a lighted alcohol inhalator, containing eucalyptus oil, the purpose of which was to diffuse a vapor which would relieve the respiration. About 3:30 a. m. the nurse then in charge left the room where the baby was lying for a few minutes. When she returned she found the bedclothes on fire. She lifted the child from the bed; the fire was extinguished, and a doctor was immediately summoned, who administered first aid.

There is an irreconcilable conflict in the testimony as to the extent and nature of the burns the child received. Doctors and nurses who saw the baby after the fire testified that the burns were, for the most part, slight, first degree burns, limited to the face, one knee, and the arms. The parents of the child and the undertaker who prepared the body for burial testified that the burns were very deep, extending over more than one-third of the body. The child died some 16 hours after the fire. Whether or not her death was due to the effect of the burns, or to bronchial pneumonia induced by influenza, is one of the issues of the case.

[1] It is first contended by the appellant that the act of the nurse in caring for the child on the night of the fire was purely voluntary and an act of mercy, outside of her regular duties and did not come within the scope of her employment by the defendant, and was something which the hospital in no way could have required her to do, and from which it in no way profited. On this ground it disclaims any responsibility in the premises. We think, however, that there was no mere unwarranted assumption by the nurse of a duty not assigned to her, but that she was directly engaged within the scope of her employment in caring for the patient and ward of appellant, and with the authorization on the part of appellant as to amount to an assignment. Consequently, appellant is liable for all actual damage resulting from the nurse's negligence in the course of such employment. Turner v. N. B. & M. R. R. Co., 34 Cal. 594, 599. The facts bring this case squarely within the construction of section 2338 of the Civil Code adopted by the Supreme Court in Johnson v. Monson (Sup.) 190 Pac. 635. The refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury contrary to this view was not error.

[2, 3] During the trial defendant offered in evidence a properly certified copy of the death certificate of the child, which the court refused to admit. The exhibit, among other things, contained the required medical certificate of death, signed by Dr. Juilly, resident physician of the hospital, that he attended the deceased, and that the cause of death was "bronchopneumonia, contributory influenza." Appellant contends that the certified copy should have been admitted, because it is by law made prima facie evidence in all courts of facts therein stated. Stats. 1915, p. 575, Act 4302, Deering's Gen. Laws. Among other reasons why the certificate should have been admitted, the defendant asserts, is that it tended to discredit the testimony of the witness Godeau, the undertaker who prepared the body of the child for burial. He testified that the burns of the infant were so serious as to expose the ribs, and covered about one-third of the body of the child. The statute provides that the undertaker, as well as the attending physician, shall sign the certificate, and shall file the same with the local registrar, and it is the contention of appellant that as Dr. Juilly had certified that the death was due to bronchopneumonia, Godeau either testified to an untruth when describing the gravity of the burns, or connived at an attempt by the attending physician to hide the real cause of death. In either case, argues the appellant, his credibility as a witness would have been destroyed. But the undertaker made no statement in the certificate as to the cause of death. He merely certified to the interment and the place of burial. As to him the certificate was properly excluded. Dr. Juilly was a witness at the trial. He testified that the child probably had influenza, and in substance and effect that her death was caused by bronchial pneumonia; that she did not suffer any shock from the burns, but would have died at about the time she did die. The failure to admit the certified copy of the death record in evidence to establish the cause of death, therefore, resulted in no harm to the appellant. At the most the certificate would only have been prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated. The best evidence was the testimony of the physician himself, the only inference from which was that the cause of death was as stated in the certificate.

[4] Certain rulings of the court on the admission and exclusion of evidence during the trial are specified as error by appellant. Respondent contended that appellant did not use ordinary care in the selection and use of an inhalator, in which eucalyptus oil was vaporized by means of an alcohol lamp. In support of his contention he called Dr. Margaret Bigby of the Children's Hospital, and Louis C. Levy, superintendent of Mt. Zion Hospital. Over the objection of the appellant, these witnesses were allowed to testify as to the kind of inhalators used at those institutions, neither of which was the kind used by the appellant, and neither of which was in common use in the community. Appellant objected to the introduction of the evidence in the first instance upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and did not tend to prove any issue in the case, and upon the further ground that what one particular hospital used or did not use did not tend to prove in any way safety in the use of any other appliance. After further cross-examination of the witnesses, appellant moved to strike out their testimony upon substantially the same grounds. The court denied the motion. We think the action of the trial court in admitting the evidence over the objection of the defendant, and refusing to strike it out, was error. Testimony as to the general custom and practice of well appointed and managed hospitals in the matter of the use of inhalators, would have been competent on the question of care and diligence exercised in the premises by the appellant. 6 Thompson on Negligence, § 7882; Burns v. Sennett & Miller, 99 Cal. 363, 373, 33 Pac. 916; Hennesey v. Bingham, 125 Cal. 627, 58 Pac. 200; Pederson v. Spreckles, 87 Fed. 938, 944, 31 C. C. A. 308. But such evidence, to be competent, must amount to something going to establish the general custom and practice in the business under investigation. Standard Oil Co. v. Swan, 89 Tenn. 434, 15 S. W. 1068, 10 L. R. A. 366; 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 419. Consequently the evidence in this case did not satisfy the rule. Neither of the witnesses testified as to the general practice, usage, or custom of hospitals in San Francisco or elsewhere, but only as to the conduct of the particular institution with which she and he were connected. Their evidence should have been excluded. Barnes v. Zettlemoyer, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 468, 62 S. W. 111, 112; Blanchette v. Holyoke St. Ry., 175 Mass. 51, 54, 55 N. E. 481.

[5] While the witness Dr. Juilly was testifying on direct examination he stated that a conversation took place at his office shortly before the trial at which the plaintiff, another person, and the doctor were the only persons present. Counsel for appellant asked the witness to state the conversation. The question was objected to by respondent's counsel, and the court asked the purpose of the question, whereupon counsel for appellant offered to show by the witness that an attempt was made during the conversation to have Dr. Juilly testify that in his opinion the burns caused the death of plaintiff's daughter, and that Dr. Juilly said he did not "intend to commit perjury for anybody." The court sustained the objection, and refused to permit appellant to make its further offer of proof along the same lines. Whether the alleged attempt on the part of plaintiff to procure Dr. Juilly to testify favorably in plaintiff's behalf took the form of threat, bribery, or solicitation does not appear, but we think the trial court should have at least permitted the further offer of proof, for evidence of a party's falsehood or fraud in the preparation and presentation of his case is receivable against him. People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 Pac. 697; Luhrs v. Kelly, 67 Cal. 289, 7 Pac. 696; People v. Wong Chuey, 117 Cal. 624, 49 Pac. 833.

[6] Appellant sought to elicit from the nurses at the hospital, who were familiar with the condition of Emma Longuy during the time she was in the hospital, whether or not in their opinion the child would have died from disease at or about the time she did die if she had not been burned. The court sustained the plaintiff's objection to the testimony. Two of these witnesses were graduate nurses, with long and varied experience. The other two were student nurses at the hospital. We think the court was in error in rejecting this testimony. There can be no doubt that one who is shown to be a graduate nurse, and to have been constantly engaged in the calling of a professional nurse for years, may properly be called upon as an expert to give evidence of the character of that sought to be elicited by appellant. Kimic v. San Jose Ry., 156 Cal. 379, 391, 104 Pac. 986; Barsi v. Simpson, 31 Cal. App. 612, 614, 161 Pac. 127. The fact that two of the witnesses had not yet graduated would be a matter for the jury to consider in determining what weight should be given to their testimony. One of the vitally important issues in the case was whether the little girl died as a result of the burns, or from bronchial pneumonia, from which she was suffering. Evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiff strongly tended to support the former theory, while the theory of the defense was that the child died as the result of the disease. In this view of the case the testimony sought to be elicited from the professional nurses who were familiar with the baby's condition became very material, and should have been admitted.

[7] Appellant requested the court to charge the jury that it is the law in this state that no female student nurse shall be employed in any hospital more than 8 hours during any day, and that the purpose of this law is for the protection of such female employee. We are unable to follow appellant in its argument, as to its competency and relevancy, and we think the instruction was properly refused.

[8] As the case must be reversed for the errors pointed out, it becomes unnecessary for us to consider the contention of the appellant that the verdict in this case was excessive.

Judgment is reversed.

In re ISER'S ESTATE.

BAKER et al. v. KELLER.

(Civ. 2202.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 30, 1921. Rehearing Denied May 28, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 27, 1921.)

1. Executors and administrators ⟹510(10)—Allowance of attorney's fees not error unless so disproportionate to value of services as to constitute abuse of discretion.

To constitute reversible error, an allowance of attorney's fees for services for an executor must be on its face so far out of proportion to the value thereof as to constitute a manifest abuse of judicial discretion.

2. Executors and administrators ⟹506(3)—Court not bound by opinions of professional witnesses as to value of attorney's services.

The court, in exercising its discretion in allowing attorney's fees for services in behalf of a decedent's estate, is not bound by the opinions of professional witnesses.

3. Executors and administrators ⟹506(3)—Evidence held insufficient to show fee fixed by court inadequate.

On appeal from an order allowing attorneys for an executor insufficient fees, evidence held insufficient to show the compensation awarded so grossly in adequate as to indicate the court transcended its legal discretion, in the absence of a showing that the court was prejudiced; the divergence of views between the attorney's expert witnesses and the court affording no proof of bias.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Conrad Iser, deceased. Proceeding by C. W. Baker and another against Adam Keller, executor, for allowance of attorney's fees for extraordinary services for John Gerber, coexecutor. From an order allowing a fee, plaintiffs appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Baker and R. Platnauer, both of Sacramento, for appellants.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber and C. E. McLaughlin, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal by C. W. Baker and Platnauer, attorneys for John Gerber, as one of the executors of the last will of Conrad Iser, deceased, from an order allowing said attorneys a fee "for extraordinary services" professionally rendered by them for said Gerber, as such executor.

It appears that Adam Keller, coexecutor with said Gerber of the last will of said Iser, deceased, brought an action in the superior court in and for the county of Sacramento, against said Gerber, as such executor, upon two claims against the estate of said deceased aggregating the sum of $10,380, of which the sum of $10,140 was for services for nursing the deceased during the last few years of his life, he being aged and an invalid during said years, and the sum of $240 was for "looking after and attending to the business and financial affairs of the decedent." The appellants were employed by Gerber to represent him, as the executor of the will of the deceased, in said action.

The trial of the action resulted in a judgment in favor Keller in the sum of $5,070, or $5,310 less than the amount for which he sued. A motion for a new trial was in due time made and the same was denied. An appeal from the judgment was prosecuted by appellants on behalf of said Gerber, as such executor, through the appellate and Supreme Courts, and the judgment was affirmed.

One of the appellants testified before the court in this proceeding respecting the amount of labor performed by them in the defense of the action and in prosecuting the appeal to a finality through the appellate and Supreme Courts. Thus it was made to appear that, prior to the trial of said action, many important and "intricate" legal questions were raised by them preliminarily to the actual trial, that the preparation necessary to a proper presentation of said questions required much time and labor, that said legal questions having been decided by the court against their position, many persons were thereafter interviewed with a view to their introduction as witnesses at the trial on behalf of defendant, that the trial of the action consumed four days, that they (appellants) succeeded in securing a judgment therein reducing the amount sued for to approximately one-half thereof, and that an appeal, with the necessary incidental labor thereof, was taken and prosecuted by appellants, with the result as above stated. The record of the action on appeal was also received in evidence.

In addition to the above testimony, two attorneys, members of the Sacramento bar, and of high personal and professional character, were called by the appellants as witnesses, and testified that, having heard the statement before the court of one of the appellants, setting forth in detail the amount of labor which had been performed by them in the case, in their opinion the value of the services rendered by appellants in said action was from $1,250 to $1,500. There was no other testimony than this as to the value of the services of appellants offered or received before the court in this proceeding.

[1] The question which we are required to determine upon this appeal upon the record as made herein, and of which the above is in substance a recapitulation, is whether, in making the order from which this appeal is prosecuted, the court below abused its discretion. In other words, to justify us in holding that the court below erred to the prejudice of appellants in its allowance of attorneys' fees for professional services rendered by appellants in the action referred to, we must be prepared to say that such allowance is, upon its face, so far out of proportion to the value of the services rendered as to constitute the making of the order of allowance a clear or manifest abuse of judicial discretion. After a painstaking consideration of the question thus propounded, we have not been able to satisfy ourselves that it can justly be held that the order complained of involved an abuse of the discretion with which trial courts are invested in disposing of such matters as the one now before us. If the application for the allowance of attorneys' fees had been directly made before and the evidence directly heard by us, we might have ordered the payment of a fee in excess of that allowed. But we are here reviewing an order in the making of which, as is declared by the Supreme Court in Freese v. Pennie, 110 Cal. 467, 42 Pac. 978, the trial court is clothed with a "large discretion," which is always regulated or controlled by a showing directly made before the court to which it is committed.

[2] It has repeatedly been held that the trial court, in exercising its discretion in the matter of the allowance of attorneys' fees for professional services rendered in behalf of estates of deceased persons, is not bound by the opinions of professional witnesses as to the value of such services. In Estate of Dorland, 63 Cal. 281, the court said:

"The [trial] court was authorized to compare its own judgment as to such value with the opinions of witnesses and make such allowance as should be just."

In Spenser v. Collins, 156 Cal. 298, 306, 307, 104 Pac. 320, 323, 20 Ann. Cas. 49, the court said:

"The position of the appellants is, apparently, that before a court can find the value of professional services it must have before it the testimony of experts to the effect that certain services are of a certain value. But this is not the law. The testimony of experts is, of course, admissible to prove the value of attorneys' services. Forsyth v. Doolittle, 120 U. S. 73, 7 Sup. Ct. 408; Louisville v. Wallace, 136 Ill. 87, 26 N. E. 493. But the opinions of the experts in such cases are not binding upon the jury, who may apply to the testimony 'their own experience and knowledge * * * of such services.' Head v. Hargrave, 105 U. S. 45; Forsyth v. Doolittle, 120 U. S. 73, 7 Sup. Ct. 408; Estate of Dorland, 63 Cal. 281; Schlesinger v. Dunne, 36 Misc. 529, 73 N. Y. Supp. 1014. * * * If the jury may form a judgment as to the value of services in opposition to the opinions of experts, it necessarily follows that the testimony of experts is not essential. And so it has been held in cases tried before a jury (Bourke v. Whiting, 19 Colo. 1, 34 Pac. 172; Gibbons v. Missouri Pac. R. R. Co., 40 Mo. App. 146), as well as with respect to issues determined by a court or referee (Noftzger v. Moffett, 63 Kan. 354, 65 Pac. 670; Dempsey v. Schawacker, 140 Mo. 680, 38 S. W. 954, 41 S. W. 1100). If this doctrine is applicable to jury trials, there is much more reason for applying the doctrine in cases tried before a court. The value of attorney's services is a matter with which a judge must necessarily be familiar. When the court is informed of the extent and nature of such services, its own experience furnishes it with every element necessary to fix their value."

In Head v. Hargrave, 105 U. S. 45, 26 L. Ed. 1028 (erroneously cited in respondent's brief as in the 150 U. S. 45). was an action to recover the sum of $2,000, alleged to be due the plaintiffs from defendants for professional services as attorneys. The action was tried by jury, who gave plaintiffs a verdict for $1,800. There were several attorneys who testified at the trial and gave their opinions as to the value of the services rendered by plaintiffs for defendants. The opinions of these witnesses upon the question of the value of the services were widely divergent, the highest estimate being $5,440 and the lowest $1,000. The trial court in effect instructed the jury that, in determining the question before them their judgment was to be controlled by the opinions of the attorneys testifying upon the question of the value of the services rendered by plaintiffs, thus foreclosing the right of the jury to exercise their own "knowledge or ideas" upon the value of such services. Upon appeal, the case was reversed because of the giving of said instruction, the higher court declaring that, while the jury in such a case, as in all cases, should be confined, in determining such an issue, to a consideration alone of the evidence adduced before them, at the same time they were not to be precluded from exercising their own judgment of the facts upon which the opinions of the experts were founded. In other words, it was therein, in effect, held that, while such expert testimony is admissible in the trial of such an issue, it was within the legal province of the jury to set up and act upon their own judgment, even in opposition to the opinions of the experts, upon the question of what the evidence showed would be the reasonable value of the services rendered.

The rule stated in the authorities referred to above has been so frequently applied in the cases and so definitely settled that further citation is unnecessary. Many of the cases are named in the briefs, both of the respondent and the appellants.

In the instant case, as we have seen, the facts relative to the nature and the extent of the services rendered by the appellants for the estate of the deceased, Iser, were given in detail before the court, and the latter, equally with the attorneys who gave their opinions as to the value of the services performed by appellants, had available to it an opportunity to consider and weigh those facts by means of the usual tests whereby the weight of testimony can alone well be determined and so form its own judgment upon the question of the value of such services as so shown. The court had the right, as the authorities conclusively establish, to form a judgment regarding the matter at variance with the opinions of the expert witnesses. Indeed, it was within its province to reject entirely the opinions of the experts as a determining factor of the issue before it, not arbitrarily, of course, but in the exercise of the ample discretion with which it is invested in disposing of such questions. And here it is proper to observe that it is not to be assumed that the court, in fixing the value of appellants' services at a figure below those which the said attorneys were of the opinion were reasonable for the amount and the character of the services performed, intended to cast any reflection upon the integrity or question the good faith of the attorneys in the expression of their judgments as to such value. We assume, rather, that the court merely concluded, after due reflection upon the evidence addressed to the question of the nature and extent of the services performed, that the opinions of the lawyers were based upon a misconceived notion of the value of the services shown to have been rendered. In fact, with the knowledge which we know the trial judge must possess of the recognized enviable professional attainments and the known high personal character of said attorneys, we cannot and will not permit ourselves for a moment to encourage the belief that the judgment of the court below upon the value of the services was intended to carry with it the slightest imputation against the sincerity and honesty of the opinions ventured in this proceeding by the gentleman in question.

[3] As before stated, however, it is plain to our minds that, while this court has just reason to express the highest regard for the learning and the untiring industry of the appellants, and each of them, and are not ourselves prepared to say whether they were or were not actually paid enough for their labor, we cannot justly declare, upon the record before us, that the compensation awarded is so grossly inadequate, when compared to the services performed, as shown to and understood by the court below, as to justify us in holding that, in fixing the same, said court transcended the bounds of a sound or reasonable legal discretion in the matter. There is no showing, nor was there any attempt to show, that the court or the judge thereof, in arriving at the conclusion as to the value of said services, was influenced or motivated by bias or prejudice against the appellants; nor, it is clear from what has been said above, are we justified in declaring that the wide divergence of views as to the value of appellants' services between the experts and the court, as the views of the latter are evidenced by its finding of value, affords proof of such bias or prejudice.

We conceive it to be our duty to affirm the order, and it is so ordered.

We concur: BURNETT, J.; PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem.

52 Cal. App. 396

WILLIAMS v. COSTA et al. (Civ. 2225.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 30, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses ⊂130—No valid appropriation of water where land was not public land for purposes of entry for appropriation and diversion.

Title to certain riparian lands having passed from the government to defendants in 1875, there could be no valid appropriation by plaintiff in 1879; the land embracing the place of her diversion of the waters and for a considerable distance down the course of the ditch not being public land on which one might enter to make an appropriation and diversion of the water.

2. Waters and water courses ⊂130—Lower riparian owner may not acquire prescriptive rights against upper.

While the right to take water from a stream as against riparian owners may be acquired by prescription, no such right may be acquired either by prescription or by appropriation by a lower as against an upper riparian owner in the same stream.

3. Waters and water courses ⊂40—All riparian owners equally entitled.

The general rule is that all riparian owners are equally entitled to a reasonable use of the waters flowing along or through their lands.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sierra County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Catherine J. Williams against Manuel Costa and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Nilon & Nilon, of Nevada City (A. E. Cheney, of Reno, Nev., of counsel), for appellants.

Jerome L. Van Derwerker, of Reno, Nev., and W. I. Redding, of Downieville, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This is an action to determine conflicting claims to the waters of Purdy creek, sometimes known as Long Valley creek, in Sierra county, Cal. Plaintiff also claims damages on account of defendants' alleged wrongful diversion of these waters. The trial court made its findings and rendered its decree giving to plaintiff the right to the use of two-fifths, and to defendant Catherine L. Lemmon three-fifths, of the waters of said creek, enjoining all the defendants from interfering with the right of plaintiff to the use of said two-fifths of said waters, awarding plaintiff damages against defendant Costa for $1,654, and allowing plaintiff her costs and disbursements taxed at $377.05 against all of the defendants. The appeal comes to this court upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The facts relative to this litigation as found by the court are as follows:

"That the plaintiff now is and for more than 42 years last past she and her grantors and predecessors in interest have been the owners of all that certain ranch situated in Long Valley, county of Sierra, state of Cal., and more particularly described as follows: The W. ½ of N. E. ¼ of section 13; all that portion of the N. W. ¼ of the S. E. ¼ of said section 13, which lies north of the division fence between the Williams and Purdy ranches, and all that portion of the N. E. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of said section 13, which lies north of the division fence between said Williams and Purdy ranches, in township 21 north of range 17 east, M. D. B. & M., and known as the Williams ranch; that Purdy creek is a natural water course with well-defined bed and banks, having its source on the western slope of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, in Ball's Canyon, in the county of Sierra, state of California, and flowing through said Ball's Canyon, to, upon and across the lands of plaintiff and the said defendant, Cathrine L. Lemmon; that during the winter and spring months a large and irregular amount of water flows down said stream; that the period of high water in said creek usually ends about the first of May when the quantity of water flowing in said stream greatly diminishes, and that the lowest stages are usually in August and September; that the said W. ½ of N. E. ¼ and all that portion of the N. W. ¼ of the S. E. ¼ which lies north of the division fence between the Williams and Purdy ranches, of section 13, in township 21 north of range 17 east, M. D. B. & M., aggregating not to exceed 100 acres, border on the said Purdy creek and are riparian thereto, and are the only lands in said Williams ranch riparian thereto; that plaintiff now is and continuously for more than 30 years last past she and her grantors and predecessors in interest have been entitled to the beneficial use of two-fifths of the waters of said Purdy creek for the irrigation of the said lands comprising said Williams ranch and for domestic, culinary and household purposes and watering live stock thereon; that continuously during all of said time, except since on or about the 8th day of July, 1916, the plaintiff and her grantors and predecessors in interest have used said two-fifths of the waters of said Purdy creek for said beneficial uses at and upon said Williams ranch, and in the irrigation of 88 acres of the said lands; that said two-fifths of the waters of said Purdy creek were appropriated by the grantors and predecessors in interest of plaintiff, by diverting the same from said Purdy creek by means of a certain ditch known as the Williams Ditch and having its head dam on said Purdy creek in the S. E. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of section 13, township 21 north, range 17 east, M. D. B. & M., and conveying said waters to and upon said Williams ranch through said ditch and two other ditches known as the Williams East Ditch and the Williams West Ditch; that all of the waters of said Purdy creek are not necessary for the irrigation of the lands comprising said Williams ranch and for domestic, culinary and household purposes and watering live stock thereon; that two-fifths of the waters of said stream, but no greater amount, are necessary for said purpose.

"That on or about the 8th day of July, 1916, said defendant, Manuel Costa, diverted all of the waters of said Purdy creek, to the extent of the capacity of the flume crossing said creek, during the irrigating season, against the will and without the consent of the plaintiff, and continues so to divert the same during the whole of the irrigating seasons of the years 1917 and 1918, except about four miner's inches thereof, which he allowed to flow, during a portion of said time, into said Williams Ditch; and that during much of said time there was more than 50 miner's inches of water flowing in said Purdy creek; that neither of said defendants, A. Jensen, Russell Jensen nor Catherine L. Lemmon, counseled, aided, abetted, ordered or directed said defendant, Manuel Costa, to so divert the waters of said stream; that the lands comprising said Williams ranch are fertile and have been rendered very productive by plaintiff and her grantors and predecessors in interest, by irrigating the same with the waters of said Purdy creek by means of said ditches and the overflow, seepage and percolation of the waters of said creek; and that continuously for more than 30 years last past and until the year 1917, plaintiff and her grantors and predecessors in interest raised large crops of hay thereon; that the damage to plaintiff's hay crop in the year 1917 was the sum of $450 caused by the said diversion of the said waters of Purdy creek by said defendant, Manuel Costa; that the damage to plaintiff's hay crop in the year 1918 was the sum of $1,204 caused by the said diversion of the said waters of Purdy creek by said defendant, Manuel Costa; that there was no damage to plaintiff's hay crop in the year 1916, and she was not damaged by being deprived of water for domestic purposes, or for watering her garden, or fruit trees, or by being required to purchase feed for her stock, or in feeding or caring for the same, or by being required to procure pasturage therefor, or for injury or damage for inconvenience or loss or expense caused by said diversion of said waters of said Purdy creek by said defendant, Manuel Costa; that the defendant Catherine L. Lemmon is the owner of the legal title of the lands and premises described in defendants' cross-complaint, filed in this action on the 10th day of August, 1918, except those portions of the N. W. ¼ of the S. E. ¼and N. E. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of section 13, township 21 north, range 17 east, M. D. B. & M., above expressly found to be owned by the plaintiff; that all of said lands are not upon or along the banks of said Purdy creek and are not riparian thereto; that the only portion of said lands which border on said Purdy creek and are riparian thereto are the following, viz.: The N. E. ¼ of the N. W. ¼ of section 24, and the S. E. ¼ of S. W. ¼; S. W. ¼ of S. E. ¼ and all that portion of the N. W. ¼ of S. E. ¼ of section 13 which lies south of the division fence between the Williams and Purdy ranches, aggregating not to exceed 145 acres riparian to said stream.

"That said defendant, Catherine L. Lemmon, is the owner of the right to the use of three-fifths of the waters of said Purdy creek, and of the right to divert the same from said stream to and upon the lands owned by her and described in the cross-complaint of defendants filed herein on the 10th day of August, 1918; that the defendants, or each of them, are not and they, or their grantors or predecessors in interest, or each or any of them, have not been for more than 10 years last past, or for many years last past, or since December, 1862, the owners of the prior right during the irrigation season of each year, or from April 1st to November 1st, of each year, entitled to the use of 200 miners inches, or to the equivalent of 200 miners inches measured under a 4-inch pressure, or any other quantity, except as hereinafter stated, of the waters of said Purdy creek for the irrigation of their said lands or for stock or domestic purposes, and did not divert from said stream, or use for the irrigation of said lands, or the crops growing thereon, or for stock or domestic purposes, or under a claim of the exclusive right so to do, or openly, notoriously, continuously, or uninterruptedly, or adverse or hostile to everybody, or especially to all claims or rights of the plaintiff, said miners inches of the waters of said Purdy creek, except when three-fifths of the waters of said stream equalled said 200 miners inches; and that 200 miners inches of the waters of said stream were not necessary for the proper irrigation of said lands and the crops growing thereon and for stock and domestic purposes.

"That all of said lands of plaintiff and defendant, Catherine L. Lemmon, require irrigation in order to produce crops thereon; that the defendants and their grantors and predecessors in interest have paid all taxes, state, county and municipal, which have been assessed upon the lands and the water rights appurtenant thereto and described in their said cross-complaint; that the irrigation of the lands comprising said Williams ranch by the plaintiff and her grantors and predecessors in interest was not subsequent to the irrigation of the lands of the defendants by the grantors and predecessors in interest of the defendants, and any use made of the waters of Purdy creek by the plaintiff, or by her grantors or predecessors in interest, was and is not subject to the appropriation and use of the waters of said stream by the grantors or predecessors in interest of the defendants, or each or any of them, and is not inferior to the right of the defendants, or each or any of them, to divert or use the same upon their lands for irrigation, or for stock or domestic purposes; that as to the defendants John Doe, Jane Doe, Richard Roe and Sarah Roe, said action should be dismissed.

"As conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, the court finds: That the plaintiff is the owner of the right to the use of two-fifths of the waters of said Purdy creek, and of the right to divert the same from said stream at the head of the Williams Ditch thereon, in the S. E. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of section 13, township 21 north, range 17 east, M. D. B. & M., and to convey the same to and upon said Williams ranch through said Williams Ditch and said two other ditches known as the Williams East Ditch and the Williams West Ditch, and that she is entitled to have said amount of said water flow down said stream to the head of said Williams Ditch; that said defendant, Catherine L. Lemmon, is the owner of the right to the use of three-fifths of the waters of said Purdy creek, and of the right to divert the same from said stream to and upon the lands owned by her and described in the cross-complaint of defendants filed herein on the 10th day of August, 1918; that the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment for damages against said defendant, Manuel Costa, in the sum of $1,654; that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction against said defendants and each and all of them, their agents, servants and employees, restraining and enjoining said defendants and each and all of them, their agents, servants and employees, from in any manner interfering with the right of the plaintiff to the use of two-fifths of the waters of said Purdy creek, and from diverting from said creek more than three-fifths of the waters thereof, or from in any manner preventing two-fifths of the waters of said stream from flowing down said creek to the head of said Williams Ditch; that plaintiff have and recover from said defendants her costs and disbursements herein."

Various objections to the judgment are made by appellants, and many interesting questions relating to water rights are discussed in their briefs; but only a few of them require specific notice.

[1] It is to be observed that in the complaint reliance is had upon appropriation and also the status of a riparian owner. These appeared in separate counts, but there was no finding that plaintiff was entitled to the use of the water by reason of the location of her land upon the natural water course, but the judgment is based entirely upon appropriation by means of the Williams Ditch. This excludes the idea that respondent had any other appropriation. This ditch was constructed in 1879; therefore the finding is equivalent to a determination that plaintiff's right had its origin in an appropriation made in 1879. It is true that the complaint alleged that an appropriation was made 55 years before the action was begun, that is, in 1861; but the trial court rejected this theory and fixed the time of the appropriation and localized it as before stated. However, the evidence is clear that prior to 1879 the government's title to appellants' lands had become vested in their predecessors in interest who were beneficially using practically all the water of Purdy creek both as appropriators and riparian proprietors. This use began in 1862 and continued through subsequent years. Indeed, in 1875, Solomon Purdy, a predecessor in interest of appellants, posted and recorded a notice of appropriation of 200 inches of the waters of Purdy creek, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and publicly declared his uninterrupted possession and use of the waters for 12 years previously. This was followed by the construction of a ditch and flume, or measuring box, having a capacity of 200 inches, and an actual diversion and use of the water for beneficial purposes. The regularity of said appropriation and said beneficial use are both undisputed, and hence we pursue this branch of the inquiry no further. It would necessarily follow that respondent by her appropriation in 1879 could gain no water right prior in time or superior in rank to the rights already vested in appellants. But the court's finding in effect is that respondent's said attempted appropriation must supersede and nullify the vested interest of appellants, there being no claim that anything like 200 inches will be left for them if respondent is awarded two-fifths of the flow.

In answer to this view respondent says:

"If respondent had made her original appropriation of the waters of Purdy creek through the so-called west ditch, which it is admitted was not constructed until 1879, there might be some merit in appellant's claim; but we have seen that Mrs. Williams and her husband, Enyart, made their original appropriation in 1861, and that respondent continued to use the waters of said stream, in the irrigation of the Williams ranch, to the time of the commencement of this action, except when prevented by the appellants."

It may be admitted that there is some evidence to support said claim of respondent, but we are dealing with the findings of the court, which are based upon the theory that respondent's right originated in 1879. If it may be claimed that some general language is used in said findings pointing to the position that respondent's title may be supported by some earlier proceeding, the answer is that it is too vague and indefinite to support the judgment and, besides, it is limited and controlled by the particular determination to which we have referred.

Moreover, there could be no valid appropriation by respondent in 1879. The land embracing the place of diversion and for a considerable distance down the course of the ditch was not public land upon which one might enter to make an appropriation and diversion of the water, the title having passed from the government to appellants, as we have seen, in 1875. In section 221 of Weil on Water Rights (3d Ed.), it is said:

"Despite any difference under the Colorado and California doctrines as to rights in water, both agree to-day that an appropriator must have lawful access to the stream before he can exercise water rights. * * * An appropriation cannot be initiated unlawfully by a trespass upon private land, and no rights can be obtained thereby against the landowners whose land is trespassed upon, in any jurisdiction."

And in section 222 it is declared:

"The general principle was early established in California that the law of possessory rights (that is the law of appropriation) applied only to vacant, unoccupied public domain, and must infringe nothing to which private rights had already attached at the time of the appropriation."

[2] Again respondent is a lower riparian owner (at least as to a part of the water claimed), and as said by this court in Pyramid Land & Stock Co. (a corporation) v. Scott, 197 Pac. 398:

"It is settled law in California that, while the right to take water from a stream, as against riparian owners, may be acquired by prescription (Gallaher v. Montecito Valley Water Company, 101 Cal. 245, 35 Pac. 770; Bothgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 144, 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158; Arroyo D. and W. Co. v. Baldwin, 155 Cal. 280, 285, 100 Pac. 874), no such right may be acquired either by prescription or by appropriation by a lower as against an upper riparian owner in the same stream."

From an examination of the whole record, we do not conclude that respondent is entitled to no use of any of the water that flows in said Purdy creek, but we are satisfied that the particular findings and judgment herein cannot be upheld. It is admitted, indeed, by appellants, that respondent has at least a co-ordinate right to four inches of water which has flowed to the Williams premises for household and domestic purposes and the watering of live stock, but it is claimed that her right to the use of the water for other purposes is subordinate to that of appellants.

[3] The determination of this question may properly be left to another trial, but we deem the suggestion not inappropriate that whatever rights plaintiff may have to the use of the water would seem to be measured and controlled by the law applicable to lower and upper riparian owners. Stated generally, the rule is that—"All the riparian owners are equally entitled to a reasonable use of the waters flowing along or through their lands."

In Weil's work, supra, in section 739, it is said:

"The water in the stream belongs to no one—it is not, and cannot be, while flowing in its natural course, the subject of ownership by any one. But each riparian owner has a right to the use of his own land, and since all riparian proprietors, by their natural situation in contact with the stream, have an equal right of access to the water they have an equal right of use for their own lands, which no one of them may unreasonably violate. * * * The rights of the riparian proprietors are correlative as contrasted with the exclusive right obtained by appropriation."

The subject, however, has been so often discussed by the courts of this state that further consideration herein would be futile.

It may be remarked, though, that considered as a practical question it must be manifest that the right of the lower riparian owner is somewhat subordinate to that of the upper, since the latter's use of the water may so diminish the flow of the stream as to prevent the former from receiving a supply commensurate with his wants.

But, as before suggested, the principles that govern riparian rights have been so thoroughly settled in this state that the parties to the action will be fully advised as to what facts they must present if a new trial is had upon this theory.

We think the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem.; HART, J.

52 Cal. App. 428

BOARDMAN v. CRITTENDEN. (Civ. 3714.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 2, 1921.)

1. Attorney and client ⊜123(2)—Experienced client could deal with attorney without receiving other legal advice.

Where an attorney's client was an experienced business man, accustomed to drawing contracts and attending to many details of his business commonly intrusted only to attorneys, it was not an indispensable necessity to a contract between such client and his attorney, whereby the client transferred securities in settlement of the attorney's claim for fraud upon him in inducing an investment, that the client receive advice from another attorney.

2. Attorney and client ⊜123(1)—Principles relative to dealings between attorney and client do not apply, where attorney assumes hostile attitude of pressing creditor.

Though it is true that in a transaction between attorney and client the burden is on the attorney to prove the transaction was fair, and that he made a reasonable use of the confidence reposed in him and gave honest advice to his client concerning himself, such principles are applicable only to cases in which the client was dealing with the attorney under the influence of the confidence which he had reposed in him, and do not apply to a case where the attorney assumes openly the hostile attitude of an urgent and pressing creditor, and where the parties are held at arm's length.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by Wilbur F. Boardman against William C. Crittenden. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley of Oakland, and Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Stanley Moore and Wm. A. Nunlist, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him in an action in which he sought to rescind a certain agreement entered into between him and the defendant, and to have restored to him certain instruments, and to have other instruments canceled. Said instruments were delivered by plaintiff to defendant in pursuance of the terms of said agreement herein sought to be rescinded. The ground relied upon for rescission of said contract is that the defendant induced the plaintiff to make the agreement in question by means of duress, menace, fraud, and undue influence. The case was tried without a jury, and the findings and judgment were in favor of defendant.

Briefly, the facts show that the plaintiff and defendant had known each other since about 1908. Plaintiff was a business man, engaged in numerous enterprises, among which was the promotion and building of gas plants on the Pacific coast. Defendant was an attorney at law, and some 20 years younger than plaintiff. During the first few years of the acquaintance, defendant was engaged to attend to a few business matters for the plaintiff, but none of these seem to have been of much importance. Mr. Boardman, the plaintiff, had many diversified business interests, and they were conducted by corporations in which the W. F. Boardman Company held large amounts of stock. Mr. Boardman was the principal stockholder in the W. F. Boardman Company. In 1911 the Boardman Company owned all the stock in the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, a corporation. The principal asset of this last-mentioned company was a gas plant near Medford, Or., which plant had originally been constructed by the Boardman Company. In March, 1911, Mr. Boardman proposed to Mr. Crittenden, the defendant, that a new corporation be organized, and that all of the stock and bonds of the Rogue River Company be transferred to the newly organized company, which was to be known as the Oregon Gas & Electric Company. Payment was to be made to the Boardman Company in stock and bonds of the new company, and in the transaction the value to be given to the Boardman Company in exchange for its holdings in the Rogue River Company was agreed to be $175,000. At the time Mr. Boardman submitted this proposition, he made certain statements to Mr. Crittenden regarding the character of the gas plant, its manner of construction, its actual cost, operating facilities, and future earning power. The particular representation out of which the real controversy arose was that the plant had been constructed by the Boardman Company at an actual cost of $126,000, without any commissions, discounts, or engineering fees of any kind, and that all the materials used in the construction of said plant had been estimated at actual cost to the Boardman Company, which was in a position to secure such materials at a lower figure than contractors generally.

According to the findings, Mr. Boardman stated that, because no engineering fees or commissions or expenses of supervision, etc., had been included in the estimated cost of the plant, the Boardman Company should receive a $50,000 profit on the construction of the plant, and its selling price to the new company should be fixed, therefore, at $175,000. It was also represented to Mr. Crittenden that it was necessary to procure a certain amount of capital for operating expenses and future extensions of the plant, and it was suggested that Mr. Crittenden invest in the securities of the new company. The new company was organized, Mr. Crittenden attending to the legal details, and thereafter, in reliance upon Mr. Boardman's representations as to the construction cost of the plant, Mr. Crittenden invested about $50,000 in the bonds of the Oregon Gas & Electric Company. These bonds, of the par value of $1,000, were sold at $900, and there was a certain amount of stock given as a bonus with the bonds. Later, by reason of assessments levied upon the stock, Mr. Crittenden's investment was increased until it was something over $67,000.

From the time of the formation of the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, in 1911, until the execution of the contract out of which this action arose (January 16, 1916), Mr. Crittenden was the secretary of the said company and was its attorney. He was also the attorney, in various matters, for other corporations in which either Mr. Boardman or the Boardman Company held controlling interests, and in some matters, during that period of time, he represented Mr. Boardman personally. The testimony and the correspondence between the parties show that a close business and social relation came to exist between them. Mr. Crittenden testified that it was not until some time in December, 1915, that he came to understand fully that Mr. Boardman had misrepresented to him the cost of the gas plant, which, at the trial of this action, he claimed was something between $67,000 and $80,000. At the time he realized that misrepresentations had been made to him, he was representing the Boardman Company as its attorney in certain litigation then pending in the Supreme Court of this state, entitled Boardman v. Petch, and in that case the question of the actual cost of his gas plant was one of the subjects of inquiry. It appears that it was through his examination of the documents and files in this case against Petch, and through his conversations with the defendant Petch, that he became aware of the alleged misrepresentations. Upon this discovery, he determined to bring an action against Mr. Boardman for damages sustained by reason of the false representations, and also to bring suits for accounting and for other relief the details of which are immaterial here.

On Saturday, January 15, 1916, Mr. Crittenden telephoned Mr. Boardman, who was then in Los Angeles. He told Mr. Boardman that he desired to discuss some business matter with him and that he would come to Los Angeles for that purpose. Mr. Boardman stated that he was leaving that night for his home in Berkeley, and it was agreed that a meeting should be had on Sunday morning, at Mr. Boardman's office in San Francisco. Mr. Boardman went to his office to keep the appointment, but, upon discovering that he had forgotten his keys, telephoned to Mr. Crittenden and arranged to come to Crittenden's office. Upon his arrival there Crittenden immediately, according to the testimony of both parties, stated in effect, that all business and social relations between them were at an end; that he (Crittenden) was through with Boardman, and intended to act only for himself and protect himself; that he would deal with Mr. Boardman, not as his attorney, but as a coinvestor in Oregon Gas & Electric Company. The negotiations between the parties continued all day and late into the evening, and were finally consummated upon the following morning by the execution of the contract and delivery of the instruments now sought to be avoided.

There is a sharp conflict in the testimony as to the details of the interview and negotiations culminating in the contract. Mr. Crittenden and his associate, Mr. Nunlist, who was later called into the conference, and other witnesses testified in a manner which amply supports the findings. It is true the testimony of Mr. Boardman and his business associate, Mr. Eckert, who was also called into the negotiations, as well as that of other witnesses produced by the plaintiff, contradict the testimony of defendant's witnesses; but this conflict in the testimony makes it necessary for us to accept the findings upon all disputed matters. Therefore, although we have carefully read the voluminous record, the findings are set forth herein as a statement of the disputed facts. It was found:

"That there was no relationship of attorney and client existing between the plaintiff and the defendant upon January 16 or January 17, 1916 (the dates when the agreement was negotiated and concluded), with respect to the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, or the stock and bonds held by either the plaintiff or the defendant therein; that the relationship existing between the plaintiff and the defendant on said dates with respect to the Oregon Gas & Electric Company was that of coinvestors only; that the defendant had acted as the attorney for the plaintiff and the W. F. Boardman Company in some specific matters during the time of their acquaintance, and on said January 16 and January 17, 1916, all of said matters had not been finally terminated and closed, but that the services therein had been substantially rendered some time previous thereto, and that at no time was the defendant the general attorney for the plaintiff, except during a portion of the year 1914, nor authorized to represent the plaintiff, excepting with respect to matters forming the specific subject of his employments; that at no time was the defendant employed as an attorney at law by the plaintiff to represent the plaintiff with respect to his interests in, or connection with, the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, either as a stockholder therein, or otherwise; and that the defendant never acted as a general legal adviser, either sole or otherwise, of the plaintiff."

The facts regarding the representations of Boardman to Crittenden are also found as recited hereinbefore, and it is found:

"That the defendant reasonably believed the said statements and representations of the said plaintiff. * * * That he was then ignorant of the falsity of said statements as to the cost of said plant and the condition thereof. That in entering into the transaction proposed by the plaintiff * * * he relied upon the truth of said statements, * * * and that but for them, and his belief in them, and in each of them, he would not have entered into this transaction. That acting in reliance upon the truth of the said representations, and of each of them, the defendant in the said month of March, 1911, agreed with the said W. F. Boardman, in effect, that the plaintiff, or the said W. F. Boardman Company, or both of them, would sell to a corporation to be formed the said property of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, or all of their interest in that said property, at a price which would be equal to the cost of the construction of the said property, plus a profit of $50,000, and take in payment therefor bonds of the new company at $900 each and 15 shares of stock with each bond as a bonus, and the said defendant would purchase 55 of the bonds of the new company on the same terms, and pay for the said bonds the sum of $49,500 cash. * * *

"That on January 16, 1916, the defendant stated to the plaintiff as follows: That all matters between them were at an end, and that he (the defendant) was 'through' with the plaintiff; that he had been requested by a certain banker to see the plaintiff before filing suit against the plaintiff, and to give the plaintiff an opportunity of settlement; that he (the defendant) had been informed and believed that the cost of the construction of the Rogue River Valley plant * * * was not the sum of $125,000, or any other sum in excess of approximately $80,000; that defendant then and there further stated that the plaintiff had, prior to and at the time of the investment by the defendant in the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, represented that the construction cost of said plant was $125,000, exclusive of commissions, discounts, and engineering fees, and that said plant was a well-constructed plant, and that said representations were, and each of them was false; and defendant further stated that, at the time of the making of said representations by plaintiff, said plant was not in good condition, was not well constructed, but was poorly and improperly constructed; and defendant further stated that the true and actual cost of said plant was known to said plaintiff at the time of the making of said representations by him as aforesaid; and defendant then and there further stated that the true and actual cost of said plant was deliberately and intentionally misrepresented to the defendant by the plaintiff, with the purpose of fraudulently inducing the defendant to invest his money in the Oregon Gas & Electric Company and to join in paying a purchase price of $175,000 for said Rogue River Valley plant; that defendant then and there further stated to plaintiff that he intended to bring suit against plaintiff on account of said misrepresentations and that he (the defendant) desired the plaintiff to read over the complaints which he (the defendant) had already prepared; and that he (the defendant) believed the plaintiff had been guilty of looting and mismanagement of the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, and that he (the defendant) proposed to see to it that the plaintiff was put out of the presidency and the management of said company; * * * that the defendant then handed to plaintiff the three complaints received in evidence; * * * that the plaintiff read over one of said complaints in its entirety and glanced through the other two; that thereafter plaintiff offered to pay the defendant the amount of the latter's investment and interest for the stock and bonds in the Oregon Gas & Electric Company owned by the defendant, providing the defendant would accept certain other securities in payment therefor; * * * that defendant believed that all of the allegations contained in said last-mentioned complaints were true, and that he would be able to make legal proof of the same, at the time he handed said complaints to the plaintiff to read, and that at that time the defendant intended to file said complaints and prosecute the same."

The court found:

"That the defendant stated he would not accept the securities offered by plaintiff in payment for the stock and bonds held by the defendant in the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, and acquired by the defendant as a result of the representations made to him by the plaintiff. That thereafter the plaintiff asked the defendant if the defendant had any objection to his (the plaintiff's) consulting with George H. Eckert, and that the defendant at once stated that he had no objection to such consultation, and that the defendant himself called up said George H. Eckert by telephone, and that the plaintiff thereupon asked said Eckert to come immediately to the defendant's office in San Francisco.

"That upon the arrival of said George H. Eckert, and after his refusal to answer questions relating to the construction cost of said Rogue River Valley plant, said George H. Eckert and the plaintiff retired to a room in the offices of Crittenden & Simmons, and remained in conference there, with no one else present, for a period of more than an hour; that said Eckert was the secretary of the W. F. Boardman Company, and was and has been associated with said plaintiff in various business enterprises for a number of years.

"That at the conclusion of said conference between the plaintiff and said George H. Eckert the plaintiff announced that he was willing to purchase the defendant's stock and bonds in the Oregon Gas & Electric Company by canceling the defendant's promissory note in favor of plaintiff, amounting to $20,000, by delivering to the defendant the promissory note of the Midland Land & Irrigation Company in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $30,000, and by executing his promissory note for the balance, payable in two years, and bearing interest at 5 per cent.; that after some discussion between the plaintiff and the defendant as to whether the time for the payment of said last-mentioned note should be one or two years, or whether the interest should be 5 or 6 per cent., it was agreed between them that the time for payment thereof should be two years, and the interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum; that thereupon the plaintiff himself suggested that such agreement should be immediately put in writing and executed, and that thereafter, and at the plaintiff's request, the said agreement was put in writing and executed by the plaintiff and defendant, and also an agreement was likewise put in writing at the plaintiff's request, whereby the defendant and William A. Nunlist, on behalf of themselves and their associates, agreed not to participate in litigation against the plaintiff with respect to the Oregon Gas & Electric Company; and that after the execution of said agreements the plaintiff himself suggested that a further meeting should be had at 9 a. m. on January 17, 1916, for the purpose of finally consummating the transaction, and making delivery of the securities mentioned therein, and stated that in the meantime he (the plaintiff) would have the bookkeeper of the W. F. Boardman Company ascertain the exact amount of the defendant's investment, plus 6 per cent."

The court further found:

"That plaintiff voluntarily entered into the agreements with the defendant of January 16 and 17, 1916; that there was no fraud or duress exercised upon the plaintiff by the defendant upon either January 16 or January 17, 1916, or with respect to the agreements and transactions had between them upon those dates, or either thereof, and that the defendant did not advise, or attempt to advise, the plaintiff upon said dates, or either of them, either as an attorney at law or otherwise; that neither the written contract executed between the plaintiff and the defendant on January 16, 1916, nor any of the agreements or transactions entered into or carried out by the plaintiff and defendant upon January 16 or January 17, 1916, were consented to, or in any way entered into, or carried out by the plaintiff wholly, or in any way, due to any fraudulent misrepresentations on the part of the defendant, or other than as the voluntary act of the plaintiff; that no fraudulent misrepresentations were made to the plaintiff by the defendant, either on January 16 or January 17, 1916; * * * that there was no menace exercised over the plaintiff by the defendant on January 16, 1916, and January 17, 1916, or either thereof, and there was no undue influence exercised over the plaintiff by the defendant upon said dates, or either of them, and that the agreements and documents executed by the plaintiff on January 16 and January 17, 1916, were executed by the plaintiff without being overcome by, and without having been subjected to, any menace, duress, or undue influence; that on January 17, 1916, in order to carry out the agreement executed by the plaintiff and the defendant on January 16, 1916, and in order to adjust certain other matters necessitated thereby, particularly the amount of the defendant's investment plus 6 per cent. plaintiff voluntarily, and without being subjected to duress, fraud, or undue influence, delivered to the defendant the documents, papers, and personal property described in plaintiff's complaint; * * * that plaintiff was familiar with the construction cost of the Rogue River Valley gas plant at the time of the sale of the capital stock of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company to the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, and the defendant was ignorant of the construction cost of said Rogue River Valley gas plant at that time, and that the plaintiff was aware on January 16 and January 17, 1916, of the facts in regard to said sale of the capital stock of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, and was then familiar with, and had knowledge of, the construction cost of said Rogue River Valley gas plant; that no statements were fraudulently made by the defendant upon January 16, 1916, and January 17, 1916, or either thereof; that the defendant believed each and every statement and representation made by him during the course of the conversation between himself and the plaintiff upon January 16 and January 17, 1916, and that the written agreement executed by the plaintiff on January 16, 1916, was not signed by the plaintiff as a result of any misrepresentations made to the plaintiff by the defendant, nor because of any belief in the plaintiff that the defendant knew more of the facts in regard to the sale of the capital stock of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company and the construction cost of its plant than did the plaintiff himself.

"That the statement and representation made by the plaintiff to the defendant in March, 1911, and at the time the plaintiff induced the defendant to invest in the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, that the construction cost of the Rogue River Valley gas and electric plant, exclusive of interest, commissions, and engineering fees, was the sum of $125,000, was false; that the construction cost of said plant at that time was not to exceed $100,000; that at the time the plaintiff induced the defendant to invest in said Oregon Gas & Electric Company, no statement was made by the plaintiff to the defendant as to any moneys paid by the W. F. Boardman Company to J. R. Anderson, and no statement was made by the plaintiff to the defendant with respect to any refund or credit in favor of the W. F. Boardman Company by or from the Stacoy Manufacturing Company; that said plant of said Rogue River Valley Gas Company was not a well-equipped plant at the time when said representations were made to the defendant by the plaintiff in March, 1911, and that at the time of the making of said representations and statements by the plaintiff to the defendant in March, 1911, the plaintiff misstated the construction cost of said plant and its equipment and condition, with the intent and purpose of thereby inducing the defendant to invest in said Oregon Gas & Electric Company; * * * that the transactions and agreements of January 16 and January 17, 1916, between the plaintiff and the defendant were fair, just, and equitable."

[1] This lengthy statement of the facts found by the trial court seemed necessary because of their complexity; but the legal question involved is conceded by the appellant to be but single. As stated by appellant's counsel, if, under the facts here, the attorney could repudiate his relationship to his former client, and could thereupon deal "at arm's length" with him, without insisting, or at least suggesting to said client, that he secure another attorney to represent or advise him in the transaction, then the judgment should be affirmed. Our discussion of that question is expressly limited to the peculiar facts of the present case. It conclusively appears that Mr. Boardman was a most capable business man, accustomed to handling his affairs and making decisions. He did not request or suggest legal advice, according to the testimony of the witnesses for the defendant; also, according to such testimony, he was accustomed to drawing contracts and attending to many details of his business which are commonly entrusted only to attorneys. He did not rely upon Mr. Crittenden, for he himself states that Mr. Crittenden told him at the beginning of the interview that he was "through with him." He also testified that he mistrusted Crittenden, and expected most anything from him during the interview. Upon such a showing, we cannot hold that there was an indispensable necessity that he receive advice from another attorney. It was said in the case of Kidd v. Williams, 132 Ala. 140, at page 144, 31 South. 458, at page 459, 56 L. R. A. 879, at page 881 thereof:

"If the client is competent and capable, and with full knowledge of the transaction he proposes to settle with his attorney, acts deliberately, and voluntarily settles his account for services with his attorney, there would seem to be no indispensable necessity for independent advice on the subject. This would certainly be true, when shown that there had been no fraud, deceit, or unconscionable advantage practiced by the attorney on the client, which would rebut the presumption of a violation of confidence reposed, as much so as independent advice would do. All that is necessary is for the client to be placed in such a position as would enable him 'to form an entirely free and unfettered judgment, independent altogether of any sort of control.' If this does not appear, it would be necessary to show that the client had independent advice, in order to remove the presumption of unfairness. But when this presumption is otherwise removed, a rule that would, in addition, require independent advice would seem to be arbitrary and unnecessary. 'It is only when confidence is abused that courts of conscience interfere,' and this essential fact in such cases may be shown by any competent evidence. Independent advice is simply a means of proof to establish the fairness of the settlement, and that it was voluntarily entered into free from undue influence. This is made clear under the decisions of this court."

The abundant evidence in the record as to Mr. Boardman's business ability and keen mentality, as well as of his large experience in complicated and varied business enterprises, makes peculiarly applicable the further language of the opinion in the last-cited case:

"Of course, the satisfaction necessary for a court of equity to have, in order to sustain or set aside a settlement of the kind, would vary according to the circumstances of, and the evidence presented in, each cause. The age and experience or inexperience of the client, his mental and physical strength, or the lack of it, and general capacity to know, appreciate, and understand the matter of a settlement with his attorney, should always be considered."

The briefs contain lengthy discussions of the finding with reference to the business relation between Boardman and Crittenden; the specific contention of appellant being that, in so far as Mr. Crittenden was attorney for companies in which Mr. Boardman was a stockholder, he was, in reality, Mr. Boardman's attorney, and was under the same obligation toward Mr. Boardman that would arise out of the fiduciary relationship toward the corporations. We do not find it necessary to decide this question here, because, if we concede appellant's position—that the relationship of attorney and client existed between Boardman and Crittenden with reference to the Oregon Gas & Electric Company—to be correct, nevertheless, under the facts here, we should be compelled to affirm the judgment.

[2] While it is true that in a transaction between attorney and client the onus is upon the attorney to prove the transaction was fair, and that he made a reasonable use of the confidence reposed in him and that he gave honest advice to his client concerning himself, these principles are applicable only to cases in which the client was dealing with the attorney under the influence of the confidence which he had reposed in him, and does not apply to a case where the attorney assumes openly the hostile attitude of an urgent and pressing creditor, and where the parties are held at arm's length. Johnson v. Fesemeyer, 3 De G. & J. 13, 22, 44 Reprint, 1174. The last-cited case has been followed in this state in the case of Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 523, et seq., 105 Pac. 981. In that case it was said:

"The rule is well established that the relation of attorney and client is confidential in character and that any contract entered into between them while the relation continues, whereby the attorney obtains an advantage from the client, is presumed to have been made by the client under the undue influence of the attorney. Kisling v. Shaw, 33 Cal. 440, 91 Am. Dec. 644; Civ. Code, § 2235; 1 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, §§ 310, 311; 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 390. In the section cited, Mr. Pomeroy says: 'The presumption always arises against the validity of a purchase or sale between the client and attorney made during the existence of the relation. The attorney must remove that presumption by showing affirmatively the most perfect good faith, the absence of undue influence, a fair price, knowledge, intention, and freedom of action by the client, and also that he gave his client full information and disinterested advice. * * * If all these circumstances are proved, the contract will stand; if not, it will be defeated or set aside.' The presumption does not apply to a transaction in which the attorney openly assumes a hostile attitude to his client. Johnson v. Fesemeyer, 3 De G. & J. 22. Nor is it applicable to a contract by which the relation is originally created and the compensation of the attorney fixed. The confidential relation does not exist until such contract is made and in agreeing upon its terms the parties deal at arm's length. Elmore v. Johnson, 143 Ill. 513, 36 Am. St. Rep. 401, 32 N. E. 413."

In the case of Black v. Riley, 20 Cal. App. 199, 128 Pac. 764, this rule of law was again recognized, the court saying:

"The court refused to give an instruction requested by defendant, as follows: 'You are instructed that an attorney, dealing with a person about to become a client as to his contract for payment for services, occupies no different position than any other two persons contracting for payment of services. No presumption of undue influence applies to a transaction where an attorney is in a hostile attitude to his client, nor in case of the contract by which the relation of attorney and client is originally created and the compensation of the attorney fixed.' The court was justified in so doing. While the first and last propositions stated are correct statements of the law, it is not true that 'no presumption of undue influence applies to a transaction where an attorney is in a hostile attitude to his client,' and the authority cited by appellant in support of such proposition does not sustain him. It is said in Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 105 Pac. 981, that 'the presumption does not apply to a transaction in which the attorney openly assumes a hostile attitude to his client.' This is a very different proposition from the one that 'no presumption of undue influence applies to a transaction where an attorney is in a hostile attitude to his client.' Whenever an attorney, for his own benefit, deals with his client, in regard to property that is the subject of his employment, he is in a hostile attitude to his client, but is still bound to the exercise of the utmost good faith toward his client in such transaction, and the burden is upon him to rebut the presumption of undue influence. It is only when he openly assumes a hostile attitude that his transactions with his client will be free from the presumption of undue influence on the part of the attorney."

It is admitted by the appellant that in the transaction here the attorney assumed an attitude which was openly and vigorously hostile to the client, and that it was so expressly stated and not left to inference. It also appears that Mr. Boardman did not trust the defendant and did not rely upon him, and that Mr. Boardman was in every way a person fully competent to manage his own affairs and to decide upon his course of conduct. He had independent advice from his associate, Eckert, and spent considerable time in a private conference with Eckert before reaching his decision and concluding the agreement to purchase Crittenden's holdings. He suggested the settlement, insisted upon its immediate consummation and negotiated at some length about the details thereof. He also went to his home Sunday evening and was away from Mr. Crittenden during that night and until about noon the next day, when he voluntarily executed and consummated the agreement. It was found by the court that the actuating motive of Mr. Boardman was his knowledge of his own misrepresentations, and that the contract between the parties was fair, just, and equitable.

The judgment is affirmed.

52 Cal. App. 469

COTTON-MACAULEY CO. v. DESHIELDS, County Auditor (LUTEN, Intervener). (Civ. 2298.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 3, 1921.)

1. Mandamus ⟸176—Intervener not entitled to affirmative judgment against defendant.

In an action for writ of mandate to compel a county auditor to issue warrants, where the intervener, who had served stop notice on the auditor, did not ask any affirmative relief against the auditor, he cannot, in such proceedings, be granted any rights against the auditor, who was contesting the proceeding.

2. Mandamus ⟸187(8)—Defendant against whom intervener requested no relief entitled to dismiss his appeal.

Where a writ of mandate was rendered against county auditor, and both the auditor and the intervener who had served stop notice, appealed, held that, as no relief was requested by the intervener against the auditor, and as he could issue warrants at his own risk, the auditor was entitled to dismiss his appeal from the judgment.

3. Bridges ⟸20(4)—Payment after stop notice is at officer's risk.

Where defendant, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183, 1184, served stop notice to prevent the county auditor from issuing warrants to plaintiff for payment for the construction of a bridge, the auditor, in issuing warrants regardless of the notice, acts on his own responsibility, and, if the notice be held good and plaintiff found not entitled to payment, the auditor is liable.

4. Mandamus ⟸187(8)—Whether clerk of trial court should be restrained from issuing writ unnecessary for decision on dismissal of appeal.

Where the application of the county auditor to dismiss his appeal from a judgment directing the issuance of a writ of mandate to compel the delivery of warrants to plaintiff was, on motion of the auditor, dismissed, the intervener, who had served stop notices in the action, is not, in proceedings for dismissal, entitled to have a determination of the question whether the clerk of the lower court should be forbidden to issue a writ of mandate until determination of the intervener's appeal, for the matter was not raised by any petition or application, and ample time would be given, before remittitur sent down, for such application to be made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Petition by the Cotton-Macauley Company, a copartnership, for a writ of mandate against George M. Deshields, Auditor of the County of Tehama, State of California, in which Daniel B. Luten intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant and intervener appeal. Appeal of the Auditor dismissed.

M. J. Cheatham, of Red Bluff, for appellant Deshields.

V. L. Hatfield and W. H. Hatfield, both of Sacramento, and James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, for appellant Luten.

A. E. Bolton and Arthur W. Bolton, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PLUMMER, Presiding Justice pro tem. On the 3d day of December, 1920, a judgment was entered in the superior court of Tehama county for the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate, to be directed to the defendant Deshields, auditor of the county of Tehama, commanding him to forthwith draw and deliver to plaintiff a warrant for the payment of a claim against said county, in favor of the plaintiff, theretofore allowed by the board of supervisors, for building a certain bridge in said county. On the same day, the defendant Deshields and the intervener, Daniel B. Luten, who had been allowed to intervene in said action, claiming said moneys as due him from plaintiff, and who had served a stop notice on the defendant Deshields under the provisions of sections 1183 and 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, served and filed their notice of appeal from the judgment and order of said court entered as above stated. Pursuant to the Constitution of this state, the hearing and determination of said appeal has been transferred to this court. The matter is now before this court upon motion of the defendant Deshields to dismiss the appeal so far as it relates to himself. This motion is contested by the intervener, who is also an appellant.

[1] An examination of the record discloses the fact that the intervener in his complaint in intervention asks for no relief against the appellant Deshields; his contention therein being that the Cotton-Macauley Company should take nothing by reason of its action. Not having made the appellant Deshields a party defendant in his complaint in intervention, it is apparent that no judgment can be entered in this court in favor of the intervener, as against the defendant Deshields as auditor of the county of Tehama, adjudging and determining the right of the intervener to any part of the funds in the treasury of the county of Tehama, irrespective of any judgment that may be entered as between the plaintiff respondent and the intervener appellant.

[2, 3] The right of an appellant to have his appeal dismissed has been passed upon and confirmed in the following cases: Estate of Wells, 148 Cal. 659, 84 Pac. 37; Guardianship of Degnan, 132 Cal. 260, 64 Pac. 485.

The case of the People v. Perris Irrigation District, 132 Cal. 289, 64 Pac. 399, 773, is not in conflict with the authorities just cited. In that case the motion was made by a nonappealing defendant to dismiss the appeal of intervening bondholders.

If the appellant Deshields were moving to dismiss the appeal of the intervener appellant, then and in that case the same right or principle would be involved, and if the intervener's appeal be well taken, the motion, of course, would be denied.

In the case at bar the defendant and appellant Deshields, against whom the intervener asks no relief, is moving, not to dismiss the intervener's appeal, as was the case in People v. Perris Irrigation District, supra, but to dismiss his own appeal and to discontinue the further prosecution thereof.

That the defendant Deshields will increase or decrease his liability to the other parties to this action by reason of his motion to dismiss is not material to this case. It does not appear from the pleadings that he came into court and asked, by way of interpleader or otherwise, that the right of the contending parties to the funds over which he had control be determined. Hence the extent or measure of liability to either of the parties are matters not to be considered.

The attention of the court is also called to the case of Slayden v. O'Dea, reported in 189 Pac. 1066, upon which the right of the plaintiff in this action was decided in the court below, and it is urged that the ruling in that case is not applicable here by reason of the fact that the words "public road or highway" do not appear in section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, whereas the word "bridge" does, and therefore that the stop notice provided for by section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure is applicable to the case at bar, and was not in the Slayden-O'Dea Case.

We do not see what bearing this contention can have upon the right of the appellant Deshields to have his appeal dismissed. If this court should ultimately decide that the intervener's contention in this respect is true, and reverse the decision of the trial court in its holding that the plaintiff was entitled to a writ of mandate, it could enter no judgment in favor of the intervener as against the defendant and appellant Deshields, for the reasons heretofore stated.

As we examine the pleadings and judgment in the record before us, there appears nothing to prevent the appellant Deshields issuing a warrant in favor of the plaintiff at any time, notwithstanding the appeals now pending in this court. It is simply a matter of whether the auditor does or does not wish to assume such responsibility. There being nothing to prevent the auditor at the present time from issuing such warrant, we cannot very well see how any action of this court on the motion of appellant Deshields to have his appeal dismissed will in any way imperil the rights of the intervener. It the stop notices referred to as given by the intervener are ultimately held good, the intervener has his remedy, as payment made by any officer having proper notice thereof would be at his peril.

[4] Request is made in the intervener's brief that this court issue its order forbidding the clerk of the trial court to issue a writ of mandate herein until the appeal of the intervener is determined. As this matter is not before us upon any petition or application as to which the plaintiff would necessarily have a right to be heard and make reply, and as ample time will be given before this decision can become final and a remittitur sent down, for such application to be made and hearing had, if right to such an order exists, we do not deem it necessary to consider that question upon the present motion, and therefore express no opinion as to the existence or nonexistence of such right, or make any order in relation thereto.

Being of the opinion that the appellant Deshields is entitled to have his appeal herein dismissed, it is so ordered.

We concur: BURNETT, J.; HART, J.

NATHAN v. O'DONNELL et al. (Civ. 3757.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 29, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 27, 1921.)

1. Assignments ⇐119—Plaintiff suing bank under assignments for refusal to honor checks not intermeddler in making the amount good.

Where the department commander of certain war veterans appointed the chairman of a committee to arrange transportation for state delegates to the national meeting of the organization, and the chairman collected from the delegates an amount of money to cover the cost of their transportation, and deposited the amount in his personal checking account, which was garnisheed, so that the bank refused to honor his checks to the railroad for the transportation, threatening to cancel the tickets, and the department commander gave his personal check to the bank to cover the chairman's checks to the railroad, in so doing the department commander was not an intermeddler without right to recover from the bank under assignments from the chairman and the delegates who had paid moneys to the chairman.

2. Banks and banking ⇐131—Bank depositor without title to moneys collected by him and deposited in his account to subject them to garnishment.

The chairman of a committee to arrange transportation for state delegates of certain war veterans to their national meeting had no title to funds collected by him from the delegates to cover their transportation and deposited by him in his personal checking account sufficient to subject such funds to garnishment or attachment against him.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Milton A. Nathan against H. M. O'Donnell and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Aitken, Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine and John T. Williams, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Milton Nathan and John D. Rutledge, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover a certain sum of money held under attachment. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendants appeal.

The facts are as follows: In August, 1918, plaintiff, as the California department commander of the United Spanish War Veterans, appointed one John H. Simmons chairman of a committee for the purpose of arranging transportation for the California delegates to the national meeting of that organization to be held in Baltimore, Md. As such chairman Simmons collected from seven delegates the sum of $538.67 to cover the cost of railroad and Pullman tickets to be purchased by him entitling these delegates to transportation from San Francisco to Baltimore. The money so collected was deposited by Simmons in his personal account with the Bank of California National Association in San Francisco. Immediately thereafter Simmons purchased the tickets from the Southern Pacific Company, giving in payment thereof seven checks drawn upon said bank, the aggregate amount of which was the precise sum he had collected, viz. $538.67. Two days thereafter, and before these checks were presented to the bank for payment, defendant O'Donnell commenced an action against Simmons, in which an attachment was issued, pursuant to which defendant Finn, as sheriff, garnisheed all sums in the Bank of California standing in the name of Simmons. Thereafter the checks were presented by the railroad company for payment, but by reason of the garnishment the bank refused to honor the same. The railroad company thereupon notified Simmons that the tickets would be canceled. These facts were immediately reported by Simmons to plaintiff, who, to remedy this urgent situation, voluntarily drew a check on his personal account with the First National Bank in favor of the Bank of California for $538.67, and sent it to the latter, with the statement that the remittance was made for the express purpose of having the bank meet and honor the above-mentioned checks drawn by Simmons in favor of the railroad company, and this arrangement was carried out. Plaintiff thereafter took assignments from Simmons and from each of the persons who had paid Simmons for transportation of their interest in such sums, and thereupon instituted this action against the bank to recover the amount. The bank paid the sum in dispute under order of the court to the Savings Union Bank to be held by it as a savings account subject to the order of the court; the Bank of California was discharged from further liability, and Thomas F. Finn, as sheriff, was substituted in its place and stead as defendant.

[1] In support of their appeal from the judgment in plaintiff's favor defendants have furnished us with an elaborate argument to the effect that plaintiff never acquired an equitable assignment to the fund in question, or ever acquired any rights thereto under the principles of subrogation, their claim being that he is a mere stranger and intermeddler, who has no interest in the fund whatever. We do not so consider him. Plaintiff having appointed Simmons to collect the funds, he undoubtedly concluded that he was under a moral obligation to relieve the situation. Under such circumstances he cannot be said to be an intermeddler. 37 Cyc. 371.

[2] Irrespective of this question, however, from a mere reading of the facts it is manifestly apparent that Simmons had no title whatever to the fund that was sought to be subjected to the attachment. Whatever relation he bore to the parties who had intrusted him with the funds for the indicated purpose, whether as trustee, bailee, or agent, is a matter of no consequence, for certain it is that he had no such title in the fund as would subject it to attachment proceedings instituted by strangers to the arrangement. The transaction shows that his position was little different, if any, from that of a mere messenger intrusted with funds to make a particular purchase.

The fact that the money so collected was by him deposited in his bank as a matter of convenience in no manner alters the situation, for the money did not belong to him when attached.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte KASTER. (Cr. 556.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 2, 1921.)

1. Habeas corpus ⟸30(2)—Lies only when complaint against accused wholly fails to state cause of action.

When the complaint wholly fails to state a cause of action, the writ of habeas corpus will lie, but the proceeding may not be made to subserve the office of a demurrer; and, if the facts alleged squint at a substantive statement of the offense, no matter how defectively or inartificially they may be stated, or however confused and beclouded they may be rendered through intermingling them with immaterial or unnecessary averments, the writ will not lie.

2. Habeas corpus ⟸30(2)—Complaint held to give justice jurisdiction.

In habeas corpus by one convicted in justice's court of violating the Vehicle Act, held that the complaint against accused charged an offense known to the law under section 22, subd. "A" of the act so as to give the justice's court jurisdiction under Pen. Code, § 1425, although there was not inserted in the complaint the name of the township wherein it is claimed the offense was committed, as the statute does not limit the trial of violations of the statute to the township where the offense was committed.

3. Criminal law ⟸90(4)—Jurisdiction in criminal cases runs throughout the entire county.

In the absence of express statutory limitation, the general jurisdiction of a justice's court runs to the entire county in criminal cases, and is not confined to the township wherein the court is situated.

4. Habeas corpus ⟸3—Objection to form of complaint not available in habeas corpus.

Even if good pleading under the Vehicle Act required the insertion in the complaint of the name of the township where the offense under the act was committed, yet this objection could not avail accused, when made for the first time in the Court of Appeals in habeas corpus proceeding, as the objection should have been made in some appropriate form before the trial.

5. Habeas corpus ⟸30(1)—Defect in process not ground for discharge after trial and conviction.

After trial and conviction, any defect in the process of bringing accused before the court for trial, such as written notice and accused's promise to appear or a warrant for accused's arrest, is not ground for his discharge on habeas corpus for, after final judgment, the jurisdiction of the court cannot be questioned by inquiry as to the manner in which he was brought before it.

6. Habeas corpus ⟸4—Admissibility or weight of evidence not reviewable.

The question of the sufficiency or admissibility of the evidence on accused's trial cannot be reviewed on his application for habeas corpus, being determinable on appeal.

In the matter of the application of Edward M. Kaster for writ of habeas corpus. Writ dismissed.

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Hugh B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., and Clifford Russell, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondent.

ANDERSON, Presiding Judge pro tem. Petitioner was convicted in the justice's court of American township of Sacramento county by a jury of a misdemeanor arising under the "Vehicle Act" (Laws 1915, p. 397), in that the defendant did "unlawfully drive and operate an automobile upon the public highway at an excessive rate of speed, to wit, in excess of 35 miles per hour," etc. The defendant was thereupon sentenced to be confined in the Sacramento county jail for a period of 60 days with no alternative.

Petitioner contends that the justice's court did not have jurisdiction of the person of defendant. In order to understand the contentions made by petitioner it will be necessary to set forth a brief statement of the evidence.

From the evidence it appears that in the month of September, 1920, the defendant was driving an automobile, known as a Deusenberg racing car, along a paved highway, which highway traversed the territory embraced within two adjoining townships, known as "American" and "Center," in the county of Sacramento. In the course of his travel petitioner passed through American township, and at a certain point therein, while passing several buildings, the constable of American township made an effort to stop petitioner, but was unsuccessful, defendant continuing on into Center township, wherein he was arrested by a traffic officer, who gave the defendant the notice provided in subdivision "C" of section 22 of the Vehicle Act, which notice directed petitioner to appear before the magistrate of American township, and which the defendant promised in writing to do. (No proof was offered to show that petitioner demanded to be taken before the "most accessible magistrate," as provided in subdivision "C" of said act.)

Thereafter the complaint herein was sworn to by said traffic officer in said American township, charging petitioner, as aforesaid, with violating the Vehicle Act in the county of Sacramento, without designating the township in which the violation was committed. The transcript does not show that a warrant of arrest was issued thereupon. Upon the hearing of the petition herein it was admitted that the verdict of the jury had been affirmed upon appeal by the superior court in and for the county of Sacramento, and petitioner also admitted at the hearing herein, and an examination of the transcript of the evidence shows, that the verdict was sustained by the evidence upon the charge that the Vehicle Act was violated by petitioner within the said American township, as charged in the complaint.

Before the trial of said cause the defendant, petitioner herein, moved the said justice's court to "quash the complaint," as follows:

"Comes now the defendant in the above-named proceeding, and moves the court to quash or dismiss the complaint in said proceeding upon the ground that the above-entitled justice's court and the magistrate thereof has no jurisdiction of the alleged offense charged in said complaint, in this, that said alleged offense was not committed in the above-entitled township, but said alleged offense was committed in Center township, Sacramento county, state of California, and that the traffic officer should have notified this defendant to appear before the justice or magistrate of said Center township, whereas in fact said traffic officer apprehended this defendant in said Center township, and served a notice upon this defendant to appear before the justice or magistrate of the above-entitled township, which justice or magistrate and township is outside of the township where said alleged offense was given, and outside the township where defendant was apprehended, and outside the township in which said notice was served upon defendant."

The motion was thereafter heard upon affidavits and counter affidavits, and duly denied by the court, and thereupon and thereafter the defendant was duly arraigned and entered a plea of "not guilty," whereupon a trial by jury was regularly had, resulting in a verdict of "guilty," as aforesaid.

The main contentions advanced by petitioner are: First, that the complaint fails to state a cause of action by reason of the omission therefrom to state the township in which the offense was committed; and, secondly, that by reason of the traffic officer having served notice upon petitioner to appear before a magistrate outside of the township in which the notice was served, and the appearance of petitioner in said township in response to said notice so served, petitioner could not be prosecuted for an offense committed in said township, and which was outside the township in which the notice was served. Both contentions are so intermingled that they may properly be considered together.

[1] Upon the first point urged it may be said that the law is clear that when the complaint wholly fails to state a cause of action the writ of habeas corpus will lie (Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 53 Pac. 706; Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 228; Ex parte Sullivan, 17 Cal. App. 278, 119 Pac. 526); but "* * * the proceeding may not be made to subserve the office of a demurrer; and if the facts alleged squint at a substantive statement of the offense, no matter how defectively or inartifically they may be stated, or however confused and beclouded they may be rendered through intermingling them with immaterial or unnecessary averments, the writ will not lie. (Ex parte Whitaker, 43 Ala. 323; Matter of Prime, 1 Barb. 340)." Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 330, 331, 53 Pac. 706. To same effect, Ex parte Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 89 Pac. 605; In re Avdalas, 10 Cal. App. 507, 102 Pac. 674. In the case last cited Mr. Justice Hart exhaustively reviews the question and distinguishes the authorities.

Viewing thecomplaint in the light of the foregoing authorities, we must hold that the complaint, "charges an offense known to the law." Subdivision "A," § 22, Vehicle Act.

The offense having been committed in Sacramento county, and being punishable by fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months, or both, the justice's court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the offense. Section 1425, Pen. Code.

If anything further need be added to complete the jurisdiction, it is supplied by the fact that the defendant was charged with the commission of the offense in American township, the complaint was laid in said township, the trial was had in said township, and the defendant was present with his counsel and participated in the trial of said offense in said township; and it is admitted that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the charge made in the complaint against the petitioner.

[2, 3] In answer to the first point made, it should be said that we are unable to find anything in the statute making it mandatory to insert in the complaint the name of the township wherein it is claimed the offense was committed, nor do we find language in the statute limiting the trial of violations of the statute to the respective township wherein the offense is committed. In the absence of such express statutory limitation, the general jurisdiction of a justice's court runs to the entire county in criminal cases.

[4] Even if good pleading under the statute required the insertion of the name of the township wherein it is claimed the offense was committed, yet objection could not avail petitioner when made for the first time in this court in this character of proceeding; objection should have been made in some appropriate form before the trial.

Upon the contention made by petitioner that he was not convicted by due process of law for the reason that every form of law was not complied with, it is sufficient to say that, so far as the record reveals, after the petitioner appeared before the magistrate of American township in response to the notice given, the notice had served its purpose, and the defendant had fully complied with his written promise to appear. In order to compel his attendance further it was necessary to serve a warrant of arrest upon defendant, founded upon a proper complaint. It seems that this was not done. This not having been done, and it not appearing that a waiver by the defendant was made, it would appear that he was no longer held under the process of the court. In this situation he was not under duress, under restraint, nor in custody. Thus being free of the restraint of the law at this time, he entered a plea of "not guilty," announced that he was ready for trial and demanded a jury trial.

[5] But aside from the action of the defendant and his counsel, as herein recited, in proceeding to trial, we think the defendant cannot be released from the judgment by reason of any defect in the process of bringing him before the court for trial. We think no greater effect, if as much, can be given to the written notice and promise to appear than could be given to a warrant of arrest, and it has been held that even a void warrant cannot operate to discharge a prisoner after trial and conviction.

"The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and however irregular the proceedings taken to obtain jurisdiction of the person, its judgment is final and conclusive. * * * The fact that the process has not been served by the proper person, or at the proper place or time, or that the warrant or order upon which a prisoner has been arrested is void, and the arrest unlawful, will not render the judgment void and subject to a collateral attack. Ex parte McGill, 6 Tex. App. 498; Dorente v. Sullivan, 7 Cal. 279; Peck v. Strauss, 33 Cal. 685; Owens v. Gotzian, 4 Dill. 438; Ex parte Kellogg, 6 Vt. 511; Freeman on Judgments, § 126. After final judgment of conviction, the jurisdiction of the court cannot be questioned by an inquiry into the manner in which the accused was brought before it; and this is true, even though the prisoner has been kidnapped and forcibly brought before the court from a foreign jurisdiction. People v. Rowe, 4 Park. Cr. 253; United States v. Lawrence, 13 Blatchf. 306; Ex parte Scott, 4 Barn. & C. 446; State v. Smith, 1 Bail. 283; State v. Brewster, 7 Vt. 118; State v. Ross, 41 Iowa, 467. In the last-named case it was said: 'The liability of the parties arresting them [the defendants] without legal warrant for false imprisonment or otherwise, and their violation of the Penal Statutes of Missouri, may be ever so clear, and yet the prisoners not be entitled to their discharge.' See, also, Mahon v. Justice, 127 U. S. 700, where the cases bearing upon this question are thoroughly reviewed by Mr. Justice Field." Ex parte Ah Men, 77 Cal. 201, 202, 19 Pac. 380, 381, 11 Am. St. Rep. 263. To the same effect are People v. Pratt, 78 Cal. 345, 20 Pac. 731; Ex parte Clark, 85 Cal. 204, 24 Pac. 726; People v. Staples, 91 Cal. 23, 27 Pac. 523; Crocker on Sheriffs [3d Ed.] p. 35.

[6] Petitioner also complains that evidence of the offense committed in Center township was also introduced at the trial, but with this contention we have nothing to do, as the reviewing court, on appeal, must determine this, for the question of the sufficiency or admissiblity of the evidence cannot be reviewed on habeas corpus. Ex parte KASTER.

(Supreme Court of California. May 11, 1921.)

In Bank.

In the matter of the application of Edward M. Kaster for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner heretofore sought his discharge on habeas corpus on account of the matters alleged in his petition filed herein, at the hands of the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District. After a hearing that court, on May 2, 1921, discharged the writ, and remanded the petitioner. The court in so doing filed a written opinion. In re Kaster on Habeas Corpus, No. 556, filed May 2, 1921, 198 Pac. 1029. All points available to petitioner on habeas corpus are considered in that opinion, which, to our minds, correctly states the law in regard thereto.

The application for a writ is denied.

CHAMBERS, State Controller, v. GIBB. (S. F. 9488.)

1. Taxation ⟹862—Transfer in contemplation of death held taxable under statute at time of transfer.

A transfer of community property by a husband to his wife, made in contemplation of death, is taxable under the Inheritance Tax Act 1913, which gave an exemption of $24,000, though the transfer did not take effect in possession, and the tax was not payable until the death of the transferor, at which time the inheritance tax act of May 23, 1917, allowing an exemption of half the property transferred, had been enacted, since the repealing clause of the act of 1917 (section 25), provided that the repeal should not affect any right which the state might have at the time the act took effect to claim a tax on any property under the provisions of the repealed acts.

2. Taxation ⟹861—Exemption in subsequent statute held not applicable to transfer before its enactment taking effect thereafter.

Inheritance Tax Act 1917, § 1, subd. 2, providing that in the case of transfer of community property from a husband to a wife, within the meaning of section 2, subds. 3 or 5 of that act, one-half of the property so transferred shall be exempt, refers only to transfers taxable under that act, and not to a transfer made before the act took effect, but which was taxable on the death of the transferor thereafter.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Proceedings by John S. Chambers, as Controller of the State of California, against Sarah Oliver Gibb, to have fixed the inheritance tax to be paid by the defendant. From judgment fixing the tax, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank E. Powers, of San Francisco, for appellant.

H. C. Lucas and A. W. Brouillet, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an appeal from an order and judgment fixing the inheritance tax to be paid by the defendant. On September, 15, 1913, James Gibb transferred to his wife, Sarah Oliver Gibb, the defendant, certain real estate in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California. The real estate was community property, and the transfer was made in contemplation of death. No consideration was paid for the transfer, and the husband reserved a life estate to himself, giving him the right to the full enjoyment and possession of the same, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof for and during the term of his natural life. The conveyance was intended to take effect in possession and enjoyment upon his death. At the time of the transfer the inheritance tax act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1066) was in effect. By that statute community property, transferred in contemplation of death or devised or bequeathed to the wife, was taxable with an exemption to her of $24,000. This inheritance tax act was repealed by the inheritance tax act approved May 23, 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 880). Thereafter on July 2, 1919, James Gibb died. It is conceded that the estate transferred was taxable to its full value, less an exemption of $24,000 under the statute of 1913.

[1] Appellant, however, contends: First, that the statute of 1913 was repealed, and that for that reason no tax at all was payable upon said property so transferred; and, second, that if this point is not well taken, at least the exemption of one-half of the community property granted in the statute of 1917 is applicable. It has been repeatedly held by this court that the inheritance tax law in effect at the time of the transfer is the one which controls (Hunt v. Wicht, 174 Cal. 205, 162 Pac. 639, L. R. A. 1917C, 961; Estate of Felton, 176 Cal. 663, 669, 169 Pac. 392; Estate of Gurnsey, 177 Cal. 211, 170 Pac. 402; Estate of Murphy, 190 Pac. 46). The tax is imposed upon the transfer, and relates back to the time of transfer, but is not payable until the time of death. The repealing clause of the act of 1917 contained the following saving clause:

"Sec. 25. * * * provided, however, that such repeal shall in no wise affect any suit, prosecution or proceeding pending at the time this act shall take effect, or any right which the state of California may have at the time of the taking effect of this act, to claim a tax upon any property under the provisions of the act or acts hereby repealed. * * *"

It is difficult to understand how the saving clause contained in the act of 1917 could have been more definite as to the taxation of the transfer in question. Under the law of 1913 the transfer was taxable. The tax was payable at death. This right to collect a tax at the death of the donor was specifically reserved in the proviso to the repealing section of the act of 1917.

[2] Section 1, subdivision 2, of the act of 1917 provides that in the case of a transfer of community property from husband to wife within the meaning of subdivisions 3 or 5 of section 2 of this act, one-half of the community property so transferred shall not be subject to the provisions of this act. This provision in regard to the exemption of one-half of the community property from the tax is specifically made with reference to the transfer taxable under that act. In other words, it was prospective in character, and by its terms had no relation to a transfer made before the enactment of the statute, which was taxable under the terms of the prior statute. The statute should not be given a retrospective effect unless the language demands such a construction. Matter of Van Kleeck, 121 N. Y. 701, 25 N. E. 50; Matter of Seaman, 147 N. Y. 69, 41 N. E. 401; Matter of Miller, 110 N. Y. 216, 18 N. E. 139. The right to the tax having been definitely fixed by the law of 1913, the Legislature would have no power by subsequent act to remit the tax. Estate of Martin, 153 Cal. 225, 94 Pac. 1053.

Judgment affirmed.

TRAIL et al. v. FIRTH et al. (L. A. 6434.)

1. Limitation of actions ⊜13, 175—Promises of defendant held not waiver of limitations not estoppel to set up limitations.

Where purchaser of land discovered falsity of representations that water was sufficient to irrigate the land, the fact that sellers, after the discovery, promised and agreed to furnish sufficient water the next year, and each year thereafter made the same promise, did not under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, extend the period of limitations on a cause of action for damages for deceit by reason of the original representations; such subsequent representations not constituting a waiver of the statute, nor estopping the sellers from setting up the statute.

2. Equity ⊜67—"Laches" and "limitations" distinguished.

There is a decided difference between the defense of laches and that of the statute of limitations, laches being a defense which may be interposed to a suit in equity whereby the plaintiff will be refused equitable relief because of his delay in bringing his suit, although the suit is commenced within the statutory period of limitation, and an action not brought within the statutory period is barred unless the case falls within some exception which the statute itself makes, or because of waiver or estoppel it is not open to the defendant to make the defense.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by John W. Trail and another against Emil Firth and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Sheldon Borden and George H. Moore, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the defendants in an action to recover damages for alleged fraudulent representations made by the defendants to the plaintiffs. With other defenses which need not be stated, the defendants interposed that of the statute of limitations. If the complaint shows on its face a barred cause of action, the judgment for the defendants must necessarily be sustained. That it does show a barred cause of action is beyond reasonable question.

[1] The alleged misrepresentations were made, according to the complaint, in 1913 as the inducement for the plaintiffs to purchase certain land from the defendants, and consisted in representations that sufficient water was obtainable to irrigate the land. It is also alleged that the purchase was made, and that the plaintiffs went into possession, prepared the land for irrigation, and then in 1914 found that the water was not obtainable. Of necessity, the falsity of the representations was then discovered. That such discovery was then made is in fact conceded. The present action was not brought until 1919, five years later, while the period of limitation prescribed by the statute for actions for fraud is three years from the discovery of the fraud. Section 338, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc.

To escape from the situation so presented, the plaintiffs rely upon certain further allegations of the complaint to the effect that upon failing to obtain sufficient water in 1914, the plaintiffs complained to the defendants, and the latter promised and agreed to furnish the water the next year, and that each year thereafter the same insufficiency of water developed, the same complaint was made, and the same promise given. But these facts, if they existed, were wholly insufficient to extend the period of limitation on a cause of action for damages for deceit by reason of the original representations. They are neither a waiver of the statute, nor would they estop the defendants from setting up the defense of the statute, and, unless there was either a waiver or an estoppel, it was open to the defendants to make the defense.

[2] The plaintiffs rely in support of their position upon authorities holding that facts such as those under discussion negative the defense of laches. But there is a most decided difference between the defense of laches and that of the statute of limitations. Laches is a defense which may be interposed to a suit in equity, whereby the plaintiff will be refused equitable relief because of his delay in bringing his suit, although the suit is commenced within the statutory period of limitation. But it would, indeed, be somewhat remarkable that the absence of this defense—for laches is a matter of defense—should have the affirmative effect of extending the period which a statute prescribes for the bringing of the action. Laches or no laches, an action not brought within the statutory period is barred, unless the case falls within some exception which the statute itself makes, or because of waiver or estoppel it is not open to the defendant to make the defense. The present action was not brought within the statutory period, it does not come within any exception provided by the statute, it was open to the defendants to make the defense, and they made it. The judgment in their favor was therefore correct.

We would add that while we have discussed the case upon the sufficiency of the allegations of the complaint, the case is not one of insufficiencies in a complaint which are not found in the evidence. The evidence, or rather the evidence plus the facts which plaintiffs' counsel offered to prove, went no further than the allegations of the complaint.

Judgment affirmed.

PACIFIC COAST S. S. CO. v. RICHARDSON, State Treasurer. (S. F. 9375.)

1. Taxation ⊜40(8)—Unequal assessment is excessive assessment.

An assessment of a corporation's franchise for taxation which is grossly disproportionate as compared with other assessments is an excessive assessment, as the final object of the assessment is to distribute the tax ratably, and an unequal assessment results in an excessive portion of the tax falling on one parcel.

2. Taxation ⊜376(1)—That assessment is excessive if without fraud does not make it invalid.

That an assessment of a corporate franchise is excessive or even grossly so does not itself make the assessment invalid, in the absence of fraud in the sense of a conscious failure to exercise that fair and impartial judgment which the law requires.

3. Taxation ⊜543(6)—Allegation held not to support finding that assessment was based on computation not authorized by law.

In a suit to recover back a so-called franchise tax paid under protest, an allegation that the board of equalization in making the assessment did not pursue a method authorized by law, in that it disregarded certain facts shown by the franchise tax return, which should have been considered, does not support a finding that the assessment was based upon a computation not authorized by law, as there is no method prescribed for ascertaining the total net value of the assets for the purpose of determining the value of the so-called franchise.

4. Taxation ⊜490—Conclusion as to value of corporation's assets can be attacked only for fraud or mistake.

The conclusion of the board of equalization as to the total net value of a corporation's assets for the purpose of determining the value of its so-called franchise can be attacked only for fraud or mistake.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Coast Steamship Company against Friend W. Richardson, as treasurer of the State of California. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guerena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellant.

Geo. W. Towle, of San Francisco, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an action to recover the amount paid under protest by the plaintiff, a California corporation, to the state as the so-called "franchise" tax assessed against the plaintiff for the year 1917. The ground on which a recovery is sought is the alleged invalidity of the assessment on which the tax was based. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the lower court, and the state appeals.

A question which immediately presents itself upon the record is, Are the findings of the trial court sufficient to sustain the judgment in favor of the plaintiff? The sole finding of grounds by reason of which the alleged invalidity of the assessment appears is this:

"The court hereby finds that the assessment of plaintiff's corporate franchise by the State Board of Equalization as of the first Monday in March, 1917, was grossly excessive; was grossly unequal as compared with the assessment by the said board of all other like franchises as of the first Monday in March, 1917, and that the assessment by the said board of plaintiff's said franchise as of the first Monday in March, 1917, was based upon a computation that was not authorized by law."

It will be noted that the grounds so found are three, to wit: (1) That the assessment was grossly excessive; (2) that it was grossly unequal as compared with the assessments of other like franchises; and (3) that it was based upon a computation not authorized by law.

[1, 2] The first and second grounds are in reality the same. An assessment grossly disproportionate as compared with other assessments is an excessive assessment, since the final object of the assessment is to distribute the tax ratably on the various parcels of property subject to it, and an unequal assessment on one parcel as compared with others means that an excessive portion of the tax falls on that parcel. But the fact that an assessment is excessive, even though grossly so, does not itself make the assessment invalid. This is the rule generally followed in other jurisdictions, and has been declared by at least three decisions of this court, namely Los Angeles v. Western, etc., Co., 161 Cal. 204, 118 Pac. 720; Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164, 121 Pac. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277; Miller & Lux v. Richardson, 187 Pac. 411. In the first of these cases, the finding of the trial court was, as here, that the assessment "was grossly excessive," and it was held, nevertheless, that it was insufficient as a ground for invalidating the assessment. In the last of the cases mentioned, the point is disposed of thus (187 Pac. 416):

"The plaintiff complains bitterly of the assessments as excessive and arbitrary. But this is a matter that cannot be gone into by the courts, provided the method pursued in making the assessment is that prescribed by law, except where there is fraud or mistake. If the method pursued is not that prescribed by law, or, what is much the same thing, if the thing ostensibly valued and required by law to be valued is not really the thing valued, as in this case if the thing valued as franchise be not franchise as meant by the Constitution, the matter can be gone into by the courts and the taxpayer relieved of the assessment. Coulter v. Weir, 127 Fed. 897, 62 C. C. A. 429; Louisville, etc., Co. v. Bosworth (D. C.) 230 Fed. 191; Hager v. American Surety Co., supra. But in the present case, as we have held, the method pursued of assessing the plaintiff's franchise on the basis of valuing its corporate excess was the correct one, and the thing assessed as franchise was the thing which was required to be so assessed by law as expressed in the Constitution. This being the case, the discretion of the assessing officials as to the valuation to be fixed is final, in the absence of fraud or mistake. In the present case neither fraud nor mistake is alleged. It is alleged that the assessments are excessive and arbitrary. The character of the assessment in this respect may be cogent evidence of fraud, but of itself does not constitute fraud. In order that there be fraud, there must exist, on the part of the assessing official, a conscious failure to exercise that fair and impartial judgment which the law requires of him. This is both the general rule and the settled law of this state."

It must be held, then, that the judgment is without support as to the first two grounds.

[3, 4] As to the third ground found, that the assessment "was based upon a computation not authorized by law," it is exceedingly doubtful if the finding is anything more than a conclusion of law. It is not found what method of computation was or was not pursued, and so far as the finding shows, the method pursued may have been one which in the opinion of the trial court was not authorized in law, when in truth it was. But passing this, and assuming that the finding states a sufficient ground for invalidating the assessment, it is wholly without support, either in the pleadings or in the evidence. There is no allegation in the pleadings nor is there a particle of evidence as to the method pursued by the board of equalization. All that is alleged is that the board did not pursue a method authorized by law in that it disregarded certain facts shown to it by the plaintiff's franchise tax return. It is unnecessary to state these facts. Suffice it to say that some of them were undoubtedly entitled to consideration as factors entering into the total net value of the plaintiff's assets, and, if not considered in that connection, should have been in all fairness. But their bearing in that respect would be only on the good faith of the board, and as to that, as we have said, there is no finding other than the insufficient one that the valuation fixed was grossly excessive. The point in connection with the allegation that the board followed an unauthorized method in determining the assessment is that the disregarding of these facts, if they were disregarded, something as to which there is no evidence, would not involve a departure from the method prescribed by law for the making of the assessment. There is no method prescribed for ascertaining the total net value of the assets of a corporation such as the plaintiff for the purpose of determining the value of its so-called "franchise," and the conclusion of the board as to such total net value can be attacked only for fraud or mistake. This in effect was likewise held in Miller & Lux v. Richardson. The allegation therefore that the board disregarded the facts mentioned, although some of those facts were material in determining value, is not the equivalent of an allegation that the method prescribed by law was not pursued.

As to the evidence, it was confined to a showing that the facts mentioned did in truth exist. There was not even an attempt to show that the method prescribed by law was not followed. This would not have been shown even if it had been made to appear that the facts mentioned had been disregarded by the board, but in justice to the board we think we should say that no attempt was made to show that they were disregarded, and that the allegation of the complaint in that respect was flatly denied by the answer.

The case, then, may be summed up by saying that of the three grounds found to exist for invalidating the assessment, the first two, which are both to the effect that the assessment was grossly excessive, are not sufficient as legal grounds, and that the third, to the effect that the method prescribed by law was not followed, is not supported either by the pleadings or by the evidence.

Judgment reversed.

In re WATTS' ESTATE. (Sac. 3138.)

1. Wills ⊂=489(4)—Declarations of testators as to intent held properly excluded.

In a suit for partial distribution of the estate of a testatrix where the will gave the remainder of the estate "to my heirs," evidence of declarations by testatrix at the time the will was drawn to show that the quoted words were intended to refer only to her own kin held properly excluded in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1318, 1340.

2. Wills ⊂=489(2)—Oral declarations to interpret will cannot be given except in cases of latent ambiguity.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1318, providing that testator's intention must be ascertained from the words of the will in view of the circumstances under which it was made, and of section 1340, relating to the correction of mistakes, evidence of oral declarations to aid in the interpretation of a will cannot be given at all except in cases of latent ambiguity.

3. Wills ⊂=489(2)—Oral declarations of testator not admissible to show intent even when uncertainty or imperfect description exists.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1318, providing that testator's intention must be ascertained from the words of the will in view of circumstances under which made, and of section 1340, relating to the correction of mistakes, when uncertainty or imperfect description appears in the will oral declarations of testator are not admissible to show intent with respect thereto.

4. Evidence ⊂=69—Allowances for support of widow under statute presumed to be so used by her.

An allowance for a widow's support under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1464 and 1466, will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to have been all used by her for the purpose for which she received it and that none of it remains as part of her estate at her death.

5. Husband and wife ⊂=274(4)—Evidence sustaining finding that widow's estate was community property.

In a suit for partial distribution of a widow's estate, evidence held to require a finding that notes purchased by her from other heirs were paid out of the proceeds of the community estate inherited by her from her deceased husband and not out of her separate property, so that it was not error to refuse to set aside a stipulation that all the property of which she died seized was property distributed to her from her husband's estate.

6. Wills ⊂=525—Claim as to proportions in partial distribution in widow's estate at variance with statute held not tenable.

In a suit to partially distribute the estate of a deceased widow to whom had been distributed three-fourths of the community property owned by her and her deceased husband, under a will in effect providing for distribution to her heirs as if she had died intestate, a claim for distribution in proportions different from those prescribed by Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8, held not tenable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Proceeding for partial distribution of the estate of Lydia M. Watts, deceased. From a decree of partial distribution, Ella Gray, A. V. Watts, and others appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and D. Hadsell, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Bond & Deirup and Samuel J. Nunn, all of Chico, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from a decree of partial distribution.

The decedent was the widow of one Nelson Watts, who died intestate in June, 1900, leaving a large estate consisting entirely of community property. There were no children of the marriage, and neither husband nor wife left issue surviving. Upon the final settlement of the estate of Nelson Watts, three-fourths of the property remaining for distribution was assigned to Lydia M. Watts as his widow, and one-fourth thereof to A. V. Watts and others as brothers and sisters of Nelson Watts, or their descendants. Lydia M. Watts died on August 5, 1916. By her will she gave the residue of her property by the following clause:

"I hereby give, devise and bequeath all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate wheresoever situate to my heirs and to be distributed to them according to law."

Her estate was appraised at $356,344.65. Ella Gray and the other persons who were the next of kin of Lydia M. Watts petitioned the court for partial distribution of $81,000 of the estate. The superior court decided that the words "my heirs" in the will meant the next of kin of Lydia M. Watts alone and did not include the next of kin of Nelson Watts. On appeal to the Supreme Court the order was reversed, and it was held that the effect of the above-quoted provision was to give the property to the persons who would have inherited it under the statute of descent, had she died intestate, and therefore that it should go in equal parts, one-half to the relatives of Nelson Watts and one-half to the relatives of Lydia M. Watts, as provided in subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code. The decision was made on September 24, 1918. Est. of Watts, 179 Cal. 20, 175 Pac. 415.

After that decision each of the contending sets of claimants filed a petition for distribution of a part of the estate. The Nelson Watts claimants asked distribution to them of one-half of $30,000 in money and one-half of 3,960 acres of land. The petition of the Lydia M. Watts claimants asked distribution to themselves of $45,000 in money out of the estate, claiming to be entitled to it all. After the filing of these petitions a large part of the real property was sold and amended petitions were filed asking distribution of the proceeds, with the other money on hand, and of the remaining land. After a trial of these conflicting claims the court below made findings declaring that money on hand amounting to $267,506.56 belonging to the estate and something over 1,600 acres of land remaining unsold was ready for distribution, and thereupon it entered a decree sustaining the contention of the Nelson Watts claimants and distributing said property accordingly, one-half to each set of claimants, setting out particularly the share of each person interested. From this decree the Lydia M. Watts claimants appeal.

[1] 1. Upon the trial the appellants offered to prove certain declarations made by the testatrix, Lydia M. Watts, at the time the will was drawn to the person who drew it, concerning her intention. This evidence was offered to show that by the words "to my heirs" in the above residuary clause she intended to refer only to her own kin; that her desire was for them to have the entire residue. This evidence was excluded and the ruling is assigned as error.

We think the ruling was correct. Section 1318 of the Civil Code provides as follows:

"In case of uncertainty arising upon the face of a will, as to the application of any of its provisions, the testator's intention is to be ascertained from the words of the will, taking into view the circumstances under which it was made, exclusive of his oral declarations."

And section 1340 provides that—

"When, applying a will, it is found that there is an imperfect description, or that no person or property exactly answers the description, mistakes and omissions must be corrected, if the error appears from the context of the will or from extrinsic evidence; but evidence of the declarations of the testator as to his intentions cannot be received."

[2, 3] It will be seen from these provisions, first, that evidence of oral declarations to aid in the interpretation of a will cannot be given at all except in cases of latent ambiguity, which does not appear here, and, second, that even when uncertainty or imperfect description so appears, oral declarations of the testatrix are not admissible to show her intent with respect thereto. This is the uniform rule of this court. Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 627, 41 Pac. 772, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97; Estate of Young, 123 Cal. 344, 55 Pac. 1011; Estate of Tompkins, 132 Cal. 176, 64 Pac. 268; Estate of Blake, 157 Cal. 469, 108 Pac. 287; Estate of Willson, 171 Cal. 456, 153 Pac. 927. The same rule is stated by all the text-writers. 1 Redf. on Wills, p. 496; 1 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) top p. 412, *p. 379; Wharton on Ev. § 992; 4 Wigmore on Ev. § 2471; 3 Jones on Ev. § 480. Furthermore, the decision on the former appeal is to the same effect with regard to the meaning of these particular words, the court saying (179 Cal. 23, 175 Pac. 417):

"We must determine her intent from the language of her will, and where that language is clear and unambiguous, it 'must be interpreted according to its ordinary meaning and legal import, and the intention of the testator ascertained thereby.'"

The decision also establishes the proposition that in view of the express provisions of the Civil Code, in section 1327, relating to technical words in a will, and in section 1334, defining the meaning of the word "heirs" when used in a will, there is no uncertainty on that subject arising on the face of this will. The rule excluding oral declarations is therefore strictly applicable to this case and the court properly excluded the evidence thereof.

It is suggested that the decision of the Supreme Court on the former appeal is not applicable to the question of the admissibility of evidence of oral declarations, because at the trial there under review no such evidence was offered; also, that the proof of the existence of the two opposing sets of claimants showed a latent ambiguity, upon which evidence of extrinsic facts was admissible. The Code sections quoted and the decisions we have cited dispose of the first suggested point without aid from our previous decision. Upon the former trial the extrinsic facts which it is now claimed produce a latent ambiguity were fully shown, as appears in the previous opinion. These facts were that the property to be distributed was community property of the marriage between Lydia M. Watts and Nelson Watts; that neither of them left children or lineal descendants surviving; and that both left collateral relatives entitled to inherit from them as such, respectively. To that extent the former decision is strictly applicable here and is decisive to the effect that no latent ambiguity arose from the existence of said facts.

2. Upon the hearing in the trial court of the petition for partial distribution under review on the former appeal, the parties filed a stipulation to the effect that all the property of which Nelson Watts died seized was community property of said Nelson Watts and Lydia M. Watts, his wife; that upon the final settlement of his estate on July 5, 1901, three-fourths thereof was distributed to her and one-fourth to his relatives; that all the property of which she died seized is property so distributed to her as aforesaid and the rents, issues, and profits thereof; and that said stipulation might be used upon any subsequent petition for distribution of said estate or any part thereof.

Upon the hearing of the petitions now under review the appellants offered to prove that Lydia M. Watts, as administratrix of her husband's estate, had, on the final settlement thereof, received from the estate $4,100 as commissions for her services; that during the administration she received from the estate a family allowance amounting to about $4,550; that within two months after the final settlement of said estate she purchased from the next of kin of Nelson Watts their one-fourth interest in certain mortgages and notes belonging to said estate which had been distributed to them by the decree of distribution; and that during the administration of said estate there was set apart to her as a homestead two lots in Chico, which she still owned at her death. Objections to said offer on the ground that the appellants were bound by said stipulation were sustained by the court. Thereupon appellants, upon notice and affidavits, moved the court to be relieved from the effect of such stipulation, on the ground that the same was made through inadvertence and in ignorance of the facts which they then offered to prove. Counter affidavits were filed, and the court denied the motion.

The showing of inadvertence and excusable neglect in signing the stipulation was not strong. But conceding that it was sufficient in that respect, we think the motion was properly denied for other reasons.

[4, 5] The two petitions then on hearing were each for partial distribution and asked only for distribution of a specific sum of money and specific parcels of land. The appellants did not even attempt to allege or to show that the money received for commissions and family allowance, or the proceeds thereof, constituted any part of the money of which distribution was asked. The family allowance was received by her in 1900 and 1901, 15 years before her death. As the statute allows it for her support during the progress of the settlement of her husband's estate on the ground that it is necessary for that purpose (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1464, 1466), it is to be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that it was all used by her for the purpose for which she received it and that none of it remained as part of her estate at her death in 1916. The lots set off to her as a homestead are not included in the real property of which distribution was asked or made and they remain on hand as part of her undistributed estate. The question whether or not those lots are now to be classed as her separate estate is not now involved and may not appropriately be decided. The evidence offered in regard to the purchase of the one-fourth interest of the relatives of Nelson Watts in the mortgage notes shows that on August 2, 1901, she did buy said interest and paid therefor the sum of $12,891. Appellants claim that this alone raised a presumption that the payments were made to them by her out of her separate estate, and that this presumption is so conclusive that the court was without discretion to refuse to set aside the stipulation if it was inadvertently made in ignorance of that fact. There was, however, before the court at that time many other facts which almost conclusively rebut any presumption of that kind. The stipulation was to the effect that there was no separate property of either husband or wife in existence at the time of the death of Nelson Watts. There was no attempt to show that his widow had engaged in any independent business of her own after his death, or had received any property as her separate estate, except the family allowance and commissions. The inference is almost conclusive that she had no funds with which to buy said mortgage notes except what she received from the estate of her husband, aside from the commissions. It appeared that the annual rents of said estate at the time of his death were from $15,000 to $20,000. Of this she would be entitled to three-fourths. It also appears that he left notes amounting to over $60,000 in value, of which the interest she so purchased was a part. Furthermore, there is some evidence indicating that the subsequent purchase of these notes was in reality a partition thereof. The assignments thereof were all dated August 2, 1901, and were all recorded on September 24, 1901. On the same day there were recorded assignments by said widow to the next of kin of Nelson Watts of her three-fourths interest in certain other mortgage notes belonging to said estate, which assignments were dated July 24, 1901, in consideration of which she received from them $1,898.43. It may further be observed that if they transferred their interest in notes not secured by mortgage, as was not improbable, in the same transaction, the assignment of the notes could not be matters of record. There was no attempt to prove that the commissions were used to pay for the notes purchased by her from the other heirs. All the circumstances taken together furnish almost conclusive proof that instead of there being a purchase there was a mere partition of their interests in the notes. In any event, there was ample proof to show that whatever money she paid to them was more probably paid out of the proceeds of the community estate than out of her separate property, inasmuch as it is not claimed that she had separate property before the death of her husband. For these reasons we think that on the merits of the proposition the court was justified in refusing to enter upon the inquiry which must inevitably have resulted in proving that the stipulation so far as it affected the case then before the court was true.

[6] 3. The remaining point of the appellants is stated in their opening brief as follows:

Since it appears that "Lydia M. Watts received only three-fourths of the common property at the time of the distribution of the estate of her predeceased spouse Nelson Watts, the other one-fourth going to the blood relatives, then in any event appellants are entitled to one-half of the common property which would be two-thirds of the three-fourths distributed to her. Therefore, appellants are clearly entitled to two-thirds of the estate distributed instead of the one-half which the lower court awarded."

We are unable to follow the somewhat abstruse reasoning by which this conclusion is reached. The Code plainly declares that upon the death of a widow leaving no issue and leaving estate which was common property of herself and her deceased spouse while such spouse was living, if there were no children of the former spouse nor any father or mother of either living at the time of the widow's death, such estate shall go in equal shares, one half "to the brothers and sisters of such decedent and to the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation, and the other half goes * * * to the brothers and sisters of such deceased spouse and to the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation." Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8. By the will of Lydia M. Watts, as has been seen, her property was to go to her heirs. In the former decision in this estate it was expressly held that this meant that it should go to her heirs as they were defined in subdivision 8 aforesaid in the same manner as if she had died intestate. We have no disposition now to revise that opinion and hold that it goes in some other proportions, especially in view of the precise language of the Code just quoted. We perceive no ground upon which to found the conclusion that the fact that she received only three-fourths of the common property at the distribution of her husband's estate made that three-fourths anything else than common property of the previous community, or pointed to a course of descent different from that specified in subdivision 8 aforesaid. The point appears to be without merit in itself and no authority is cited which approaches to a support of it.

The decree of distribution is affirmed.

An incorporated society of pioneers, whose objects included not only the cultivation of social intercourse among its members, but also the collection and preservation of data and articles of historical interest, and whose membership might embrace a large and indefinite portion of the public, is a charitable corporation, which is one organized for the purpose, among other things, of promoting the welfare of mankind at large, or of a community, or of some class from a part of it indefinite as to number of individuals, and therefore a bequest to such corporation, in a will executed less than 30 days before the death of testator, is void under Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Victor Dol, deceased. From a decree ordering the payment of a bequest to the Los Angeles County Pioneer Society, Frank P. Flint and another, as executors and the residuary legatees, appeal. Reversed.

See, also, 187 Pac. 428.

Frank P. Flint and Donald Barker, in pro. per.

Flint & Mackay and Donald Barker, all of Los Angeles (Wm. H. Neblett, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants Oberly and Ingram.

Will D. Gould, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The executors of the will and the residuary legatees appeal from a decree distributing and ordering paid a bequest of $2,000 made by the will of the decedent to the respondent, an incorporated society, known as "Los Angeles County Pioneer Society."

The will was executed less than 30 days prior to the death of the testator. If the respondent is a "charitable or benevolent" corporation, the bequest is void under the provisions of section 1313 of the Civil Code, declaring that—

"No estate, real or personal, shall be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses, except the same be done by will duly executed at least thirty days before the decease of the testator."

If this point is good, the other points made by appellant need not be considered.

The articles of incorporation of the respondent state the purposes for which it was formed, as follows:

"That the purpose for which this corporation is formed is to cultivate social intercourse and friendship among its members, to collect and preserve data touching the early history of Los Angeles county and state of California, to collect and preserve articles, specimens and material things illustrative or demonstrative of the customs, modes and habits of the aforesaid times in said state; to perpetuate the memory of those who, by their labors and heroism, contributed to make the history of said county and state; and in furtherance of said purpose to receive, purchase, sell, hold, convey, lease, rent and maintain all kinds of property, both real and personal, to build clubhouses, and to do any and all acts necessary and convenient for the promotion of said purpose; and to exist as a social corporation under the provisions of the laws of the state of California, covering such corporations, and not for pecuniary profit."

The corporation has no capital stock, and it is stated in the bill of exceptions that the paragraph above quoted is the only part of its articles material to be considered upon the issues presented in the case.

We are of the opinion that the respondent is a charitable and benevolent corporation. If its only object were to cultivate social intercourse and friendship among its members, it would be for the benefit of the members alone, and it would not come within that class. But it is apparent from a reading of the part of the articles above quoted that this was but a minor part of its purposes. A charitable corporation is one organized for the purpose, among other things, of promoting the welfare of mankind at large, or of a community, or of some class forming a part of it indefinite as to numbers and individuals. It is impossible to enumerate specifically all purposes which characterize such corporations as charitable. "The difficulty is inherent in the subject-matter itself. With the progress of civilization new needs are developed, new vices spring up, new forms of human activity manifest themselves, any or all of which, for their advancement or suppression, may become the proper objects of an eleemosynary trust." People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 138, 45 Pac. 271, 35 L. R. A. 269. In Estate of Winchester, 133 Cal. 271, 65 Pac. 475, 54 L. R. A. 281, the status of a society known as the Santa Barbara Natural History Society was under consideration. It was an unincorporated society "having for its object to advance the study and promote knowledge of the various branches of natural history, by holding meetings, providing for lectures, and establishing a museum of natural history specimens." It was held to be a charitable society. Its purposes are not materially different from those of the respondent. The case seems to be decisive of the case at bar. The collection and preservation of data touching the early history of the state and the collection and preservation of articles, specimens, and material things illustrative of the customs, modes, and habits of the early times in California and the perpetuation of the memory of those who contributed to make the history of the state are obviously purposes tending to the benefit of the public at large, by furnishing means of information and knowledge of the history of the state. A case almost exactly parallel to the present one is Molly Varnum Chapter, D. A. R., v. Lowell, 204 Mass. 487, 90 N. E. 893, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 707. The plaintiff corporation in that case was organized—

"for the purpose of perpetuating the memory of the men and women who achieved American independence, of acquiring and protecting historical spots, encouraging historical research and the publication of its results, preserving documents and relics and individual records of revolutionary soldiers and patriots, and promoting the celebration of patriotic anniversaries, or cherishing, maintaining and extending the institutions of American freedom, and fostering true patriotism and love of country."

It was held to be a charitable corporation. The court said:

"If the sole object * * * had been the gratuitous collection and publication of facts connected with our revolutionary history, this certainly would have been educational and of great value to the community. * * * The foundation upon which such an institution rests would be in aid of letters and charitable by intendment of law."

It was also said that the encouragement and promotion of historical research and the publication of results in the form of books, pamphlets or periodicals without profit "is within the statutory category," and that property held for that purpose was exempt from taxation as a charitable and benevolent institution under the exemption statute of that state. There is no material distinction between these cases and that here presented.

It may be urged that the articles contain no provision whereby any person not a member thereof may receive any benefit from the carrying out of its corporate purposes. This may be true as to the cultivation of social intercourse and friendship among its members, although as there is no limit as to the number of members, or as to conditions of admission, the membership may embrace a large and indefinite portion of the public. But a reading of the article on the subject shows that the carrying out of the purposes defined will in the main benefit the general public as much as the members.

In view of the foregoing authorities and upon general principles it seems clear that the respondent corporation was a charitable and benevolent corporation within the meaning of section 1313 of the Civil Code, and, the bequest having been made within 30 days prior to the death of the testator, it is void under the provisions of that section.

The order is reversed.

H. HACKFELD & CO., Limited, v. CASTLE et al. (S. F. 8884.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1921. Rehearing Denied July 5, 1921.)

1. Sales ⊂⊃83—Question as to whether buyer or seller should furnish transportation held one of intention; "f. o. b" defined.

The question of whether the buyer or the seller of Hawaiian honey should secure the necessary transportation held one of intention of the parties as to what they contemplated, and the expression "f. o. b." throws no light upon the question; such expression merely making it the seller's duty to load at his own expense.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, F. O. B.]

2. Sales ⊂⊃172—Shipping route provided for by contract held material.

A contract provision calling for shipment of Hawaiian honey by a certain route held one material to the contract, so that it could not be performed according to its terms except by shipment by such route, and the continued existence of such route was, in absence of warranty that it would continue in existence, a condition of the contract, so that the parties would be excused in case before breach performance became impossible by reason of the prescribed route ceasing to exist.

3. Sales ⊂⊃83—Option as to shipping route construed.

A contract of sale prescribing a certain shipping route, or at buyer's option another route in case the first route was discontinued, meant that the contract was conditional upon the first route remaining open, but that in case it were discontinued the buyers might waive the condition if the goods could go forward by the other route; and was not merely an option between routes.

4. Sales ⊂⊃177—Discontinuation of shipping route on account of war excuses buyer from acceptance.

Assuming that it was the duty of the buyers of Hawaiian honey to secure transportation, that duty was conditional upon the necessary instrumentality continuing in existence, and where, owing to war, the route specified in the contract was discontinued, the buyer was justified in refusal to accept the honey.

5. Sales ⊂⊃180(1)—Acceptance of part of goods purchased held not to waive contract requirements as to transportation.

The fact that a buyer of Hawaiian honey accepted a part of the purchase shipped by another route than that provided for by contract held no waiver by the purchaser of contract requirements as to subsequent shipments.

Action by H. Hackfeld & Co., Limited, against Walter M. Castle, Albert E. Castle, and Arthur H. Castle, doing business under the firm name and style of Castle Bros. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Andros & Hengstler, Louis T. Hengstler, and Golden W. Bell, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter Perry Johnson and Nathan H. Frank, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. The plaintiff, an exporting firm of the Hawaiian Islands, sold to the defendants, a jobbing firm of San Francisco, the output of honey of a certain Hawaiian brand, for the season of 1914. The output amounted to 1,946 cases, of which 800 were delivered and paid for. The defendants refused to accept the remaining 1,146 cases, and the plaintiff sold them at public auction for the account of the defendants for a figure less than the contract price and brought the present action for the difference. Judgment went against the plaintiff, and it appeals.

At the time the contract of sale was made, March, 1914, a regular line of steamers was running between Honolulu and the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, there connecting with the railroad across the isthmus and by means of the railroad with vessels on the Atlantic side sailing between the isthmus and Atlantic ports. By means of this line, shipments could be made in regular course from Honolulu direct to European ports, including that of Hamburg. Such being the means of shipment from Honolulu to Hamburg, the contract between the parties provided that the price was net f. o. b. Honolulu, payable on sight draft with shipping documents attached, and provided also:

"Goods to be shipped direct shipment from Honolulu via Tehuantepec to Hamburg (or at our [buyers'] option, via Panama Canal, in case the Tehuantepec route is discontinued)."

Upon the provision just quoted the cause turns. Before the time arrived for the shipment of the honey, the Tehuantepec route was discontinued because of unsettled political conditions in Mexico, and was not reopened. The Panama Canal was not yet open, and was not opened until the middle of August, 1914. In the meantime, the recent World War had broken out, the port of Hamburg had been blockaded, and shipment to that port by any route had become a practical impossibility. In this situation, and because of it, the defendants refused to accept the honey, and the final question in the case is, were they justified in so doing?

The question is largely discussed before us as if it were to be determined according as it was the duty of the seller or the duty of the buyers under the contract to secure the necessary transportation. The contention on behalf of the plaintiff is that under f. o. b. contracts it is the rule, in case of shipments by sea as distinguished from shipments by rail, that it is the duty of the buyer to secure the transportation, and that since the defendants in this case failed to do so they are responsible. On behalf of the defendants, on the other hand, it is asserted that the prevailing American, as distinguished from the English, rule is that under an f. o. b. contract it is the business of the seller to secure transportation, and in support of their contention counsel cite a number of decisions by courts of this country so holding as to shipments by rail. We doubt if either of these contentions is strictly correct; that is, if it can be truly said either that there is one rule for shipments by sea and another for shipments by rail, or that there is one rule followed in America for the most part and another followed in Great Britain.

[1] The question is one as to the intention of the parties, as to what they contemplated. The expression "f. o. b." in and of itself throws no light upon it. The expression merely makes it the duty of the seller to load at his own expense. But whether the means of conveyance on which the goods are to be loaded are to be furnished by him or by the buyer is not indicated by the requirement. It would seem that in the absence of any express provision on the point (and usually there is none), what the parties contemplated must be determined by what was reasonable under the particular circumstances of each case. When the buyer is not at the point of shipment, and when between that point and the point of destination there is a regular and customary method of transportation with fixed rates and uniform conditions, so that it is practically immaterial to the buyer whether he or the seller arrange for the transportation, and there is no difficulty and no substantial burden in arranging for it, the fact that the seller is on the ground and it is convenient for him to arrange for it, when it is not convenient for the buyer, would seem to make it reasonable that the seller should attend to the matter. This is generally the situation in the case of shipments by rail. It is, however, not the situation, as a rule, in the case of shipments by sea. For one thing, there is usually no uniformity of freight rates, so that the buyer, who, of course, must pay the freight under an f. o. b. contract, is immediately concerned with what arrangement may be made for transportation. On the other hand, the arrangement is a matter of indifference to the seller. Under these circumstances it would seem to be reasonable to conclude that the parties contemplated that, since the buyer is the party interested, he should attend to arranging for the transportation, either directly or by instructions to the seller. Of the decisions cited to us by counsel, most of those in this country were concerned with shipments by rail, and most of those in England with shipments by sea, and the above is, we believe the probable explanation of whatever differences may exist between them. But if this view be correct, it follows that where the conditions of transportation by sea are substantially the same as those of transportation by rail, as where the contract of sale contemplates transportation by a regular line of steamers with fixed rates and uniform conditions, and the seller is at the point of shipment and the buyer is not, it might well be concluded that the parties contemplated that the matter of arranging for transportation would be attended to by the seller. The present case closely approximates at least that situation. But we need not determine finally whether it was the duty of the seller or of the buyers in the case before us to secure the transportation. We are of the opinion that, even accepting the view that it was the duty of the buyers, it yet does not follow that they were not justified in refusing to accept the goods when shipment by the prescribed route became impossible.

[2] That the contract called for shipment via Tehuantepec hardly admits of question. There is a suggestion by plaintiff's counsel that the provision we have quoted was in the nature merely of shipping instructions by the buyers to the seller, and was not intended as truly a part of the contract between them. But the mere presence of the provision in the writing which constitutes the contract would alone indicate prima facie that the provision was a part of the contract itself, and when, in addition to this, we consider the circumstances under which the contract was made there can be no doubt upon the point. Neither can there be any doubt upon the further point that the provision was one inserted for the benefit and protection of the buyers. It seems that prior to the making of the contract the plaintiff had given the defendants a firm option on the honey, and that, while holding this option and before accepting it and closing the contract, the defendants contracted with a Hamburg firm for a resale of the honey to it; the contract specifying that the honey should go forward via Tehuantepec. These facts were known to the plaintiff when the defendants closed the contract with it, and there is but one possible inference from them, and that is that the provision under consideration was inserted in the contract in order to insure to the defendants that the honey would be shipped to Hamburg via Tehuantepec as their contract with the Hamburg firm required.

The provision calling for shipment via Tehuantepec was, then one material to the contract, so that the contract could not be performed according to its terms except by shipment by that route. This means that that route was a necessary instrumentality for the performance of the contract. Its continued existence was therefore, in the absence of any warranty by either party that it would continue in existence, a condition of the contract, within the rule thus stated by Prof. Williston (3 Williston on Contracts, § 1948):

"Not only where a specific thing is itself to be sold or transferred, but wherever a contract requires for its performance the existence of a specific thing, the fortuitous destruction of that thing, or such impairment of it as makes it unavailable, excuses the promisor unless he has clearly assumed the risk of its continued existence. A contract to manufacture goods in a particular factory is discharged by the destruction of the factory (Stewart v. Stone, 127 N. Y. 500); a contract to do work on a specific building is discharged by the destruction of that building (Keeling v. Schastey, 18 Cal. App. 764); a contract to carry goods by a particular ship is discharged by the loss of the ship (Furness, etc., Co. v. Randall, 124 Md. 101), or by such an injury to it as prevents its use within the time permitted by the contract (Nicholl v. Ashton [1901] 2 K. B. 126); and a contract to serve or to employ another on a particular ship is subject to the same defense (The Dawn, 2 Ware, 121). A contract to move a building is excused by its destruction (Jones-Gray Const. Co. v. Stephens, 167 Ky. 765); a contract to furnish water from a spring by the failure of the spring (Ward v. Vance, 93 Pa. 499); a contract to drive logs down a stream by a fall in the water in the stream, owing to which performance becomes impossible (Clarksville Land Co. v. Harriman, 68 N. H. 374)."

A case substantially parallel to the present is that of The Tornado, 108 U. S. 342, 2 Sup. Ct. 746, 27 L. Ed. 747. There the owners of certain cotton and the owners of a certain ship had contracted for the carriage of the cotton by the ship from New Orleans to Liverpool. Before the ship commenced her voyage she was injured by fire so that she was rendered unseaworthy and incapable of earning freight unless repaired at a cost which would exceed her value when repaired. It was held that both parties to the contract for carriage were excused, the court saying (108 U. S. 351, 2 Sup. Ct. 752, 27 L. Ed. 747):

"In Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 Best & Smith, 826, it is laid down as a rule that 'in contracts in which the performance depends on the continued existence of a given person or thing, a condition is implied that the impossibility of performance arising from the perishing of the person or thing shall excuse the performance.' The reason given for the rule is that without 'any express stipulation that the destruction of the person or thing shall excuse the performance,' 'that excuse is by law implied, because from the nature of the contract it is apparent that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the particular person or chattel.' The rule was there applied to excuse the owner of a music hall which had been burned from fulfilling a contract to let the use of it. The principle was extended further in Appleby v. Myers, L. R. 2 C. P. 651. There the plaintiffs contracted to erect certain machinery on the defendant's premises at specific prices for particular portions, and to keep it in repair for two years, the price to be paid upon completion of the whole. After some portions of the work had been finished, and others were in the course of completion, the premises, with all the machinery and materials thereon, were destroyed by an accidental fire. It was held that both parties were excused from the further performance of the contract, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to sue in respect of those portions of work which had been completed, whether the materials used had become the property of the defendant or not."

See, also, for other cases involving the same principle and closely parallel to the present on the facts, Furness, etc., Co. v. Randall, 124 Md. 101, 91 Atl. 797; Scottish, etc., Co. v. Souter, [1917] 1 K. B. 222; Horlock v. Beal, [1916] 1 A. C. 486; Nickoll v. Ashton, [1901] 2 K. B. 126; Lovering v. Buck, etc., Co., 54 Pa. 291.

In the leading English case of Taylor v. Caldwell, mentioned in the quotation just made from The Tornado, Lord Blackburn states the underlying principle as follows:

"There seems no doubt that where there is a positive contract to do a thing, not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although in consequence of unforeseen accidents the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burthensome or even impossible. The law is so laid down in 1 Roll. Abr. 450, Condition (G), and in the note (2) to Walton v. Waterhouse, 2 Wms. Saund. 421a (6th Ed.), and is recognized as the general rule by all the judges in the much-discussed case of Hall v. Wright, E. B. & E. 746. But this rule is only applicable when the contract is positive and absolute, and not subject to any condition either express or implied; and there are authorities which, as we think, establish the principle that where, from the nature of the contract, it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless when the time for the fulfillment of the contract arrived some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract, they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done, there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor."

This language is directly applicable to the present case. The parties here must from the beginning have known that the contract could not be fulfilled unless the Tehuantepec route continued to exist, so that when entering into the contract they must have contemplated its continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done. There was no express or implied warranty by either party that it would continue to exist, and the contract is therefore to be construed as subject to an implied condition that the parties be excused in case, before breach, performance became impossible by reason of the prescribed route ceasing to exist.

The only substantial difference between these cases and the present is that in them it did not appear that the parties contemplated, when the contract was made, the contingency which subsequently arose, namely, the loss of the instrumentality by which alone the contract could be performed, while in the present case it does appear that the parties did contemplate it. This appears from the provision that at the buyers' option the honey might go by Panama in case the Tehuantepec route were discontinued. But the effect of this difference is only to strengthen the implication that the contract was conditional upon the Tehuantepec route remaining open. It was only at the buyers' option that the honey could go forward otherwise than by Tehuantepec, even if that route were closed and performance thereby made impossible. The reasonable implication is that if the buyers did not choose to exercise this option (and they did not), the condition inserted for their benefit that the honey should go by Tehuantepec would operate and they would be excused because of noncompliance with it. Otherwise the option would be valueless.

[3] In this connection we would note a contention made by plaintiffs' counsel as to the construction of the option provision. It is that the option given the buyers in case the Tehuantepec route was closed was one of choosing the Panama route in preference to any other; in other words, was merely an option between routes. The answer to this, however, is that the granting of such an option would amount to nothing. The plaintiff's fundamental contention is that the defendants were obligated to accept the honey, whether the Tehuantepec route was open or not. If this be true, the buyers necessarily would have the right, in case the Tehuantepec route were closed, to select any route they pleased, so that, without any express grant of an option to that effect, they could select the Panama route. It must be taken that the express grant of an option meant something and was intended to do more than give the buyers a right they would plainly have without it. The reasonable construction of the whole provision would seem to be that the contract was conditional upon the Tehuantepec route remaining open, but that in case it were discontinued the buyers might, at their option, waive the condition if the goods could go forward via Panama.

[4] It is no answer to the proposition that the contract required the honey to go via Tehuantepec, and that therefore the continued existence of that route was a condition of the contract, to say that it was the duty of the buyers to secure the transportation necessary according to the contract, and that they cannot rely upon their own failure to secure transportation as any reason why they should not carry out the contract. We may assume that it was the duty of the buyers to secure the transportation, but that duty, like their other obligations under the contract, was conditional upon the necessary instrumentality continuing in existence. If this be not so, the provision of the contract, plainly inserted for their benefit, that the honey go forward via Tehuantepec, means nothing. The provision that it should go forward is at once negatived as to the buyers by the fact that they are under an unconditional obligation to provide for its so going forward, so that, whether the honey move by the prescribed route or not, they are responsible. In other words, such a construction of the contract would wholly frustrate the object for which unmistakably the provision under discussion was inserted—the protection of the buyers. Furthermore, the fact that the provision was inserted for that purpose strongly supports the view that the parties contemplated that the seller would attend to the matter of transportation. It is rather difficult to see why the buyers should insist upon a provision that the honey be shipped via Tehuantepec if it were contemplated that they themselves should attend to the matter of transportation, so that whether the transportation arranged for was via Tehuantepec or some other route would be entirely in their own hands. But even if it does not appear that it was the seller who was to arrange for transportation, the facts that the contract required the goods to go via Tehuantepec unless at the buyers' option they went via Panama in case the Tehuantepec route were closed, and that this requirement was for the benefit of buyers plainly indicate that the whole contract was conditional, so far, at least, as the buyers were concerned, upon its being possible to ship the honey by that route. As it turned out, this was not possible, and the buyers were therefore justified in their refusal to accept the honey.

[5] There are some further points of minor character advanced on behalf of the plaintiff, but of these there is but one which either is not disposed of by what has already been said or is of such importance as to justify discussion. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the parties themselves, by their dealings with respect to the 800 cases which were delivered and paid for, have construed the contract as one obligating the defendants unconditionally to accept the honey. These cases were shipped after the Tehuantepec route was closed, and were shipped to the defendants at San Francisco because they could not be shipped via Tehuantepec, and were accepted by the defendants at San Francisco. But the trial court found, and its finding is not attacked, that the shipment was made only after the defendants had been notified that a portion of the honey was ready, and had taken up with their Hamburg buyer the question of routing the honey via San Francisco and the Panama Railroad, and had secured his consent to such routing, and that upon securing such consent the defendants notified the plaintiff to that effect and authorized the shipment via San Francisco on a through bill of lading to Hamburg. The shipment was not, in fact, made on a through bill of lading, but was consigned to the plaintiff itself on a local bill of lading. But the trial court also found in this connection that the defendants did not accept the shipment and pay for it until they had been assured by the steamship company, which had a line from San Francisco to Panama as well as one from Honolulu to San Francisco, that it would take up the local bill of lading and issue in place of it a through bill from Honolulu to Hamburg via Panama. All of this occurred before the outbreak of the war and when shipment to Hamburg was possible. When the transaction is considered as an entirety, it is evident that there is nothing in it inconsistent with a position on the part of the defendants that they had the right to insist on shipment via Tehuantepec unless they chose, in accordance with their option, to have the shipment by Panama. There being nothing inconsistent with that position, the transaction cannot be taken as one whereby a contrary construction was put upon the contract. Much less can it be said to be a waiver by the defendants of any requirement of the contract as to subsequent shipments.

Judgment affirmed.

PRYOR et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 9637.)

1. Master and servant ⊂=367—Members of contracting firm, pumping sand from well, held "independent contractors," and not "employés," within Compensation Act.

Members of a contracting firm conducting a sand-pumping business as an incident to their well-boring business, who furnished their own appliances and paid their own expenses, and who were not subject to control while doing their work, for which they received a specified price per foot for boring and a per diem compensation for pumping sand, held "independent contractors," and not "employés" within the Workmen's Compensation Act while pumping sand from a well completed under a prior contract, though they were subject to discharge at any time and were willing to follow directions of the owner's representative.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé; Independent Contractor.]

2. Evidence ⊂=471(30), 568(1)—Statement of compensation claimaint that he was employé mere conclusion, and of no weight.

Statements of a claimant under the Workmen's Compensation Act and an associate engaged with him in pumping out sand from a well that they considered themselves employés of the well owner were mere legal conclusions, and of no weight, in view of evidence showing that they were working under an independent contractor.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Thurman Crane, employee, opposed by John F. Pryor, employer, and the Globe Indemnity Company, insurer. Award of compensation by Industrial Accident Commission and Employer and Indemnity Company bring certiorari. Award annulled.

Howard L. Phillips and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

LENNON, J. Certiorari to review a decree of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Thurman Crane, the applicant below, for an injury sustained while pumping sand from a well on a ranch belonging to John F. Pryor. The award is resisted upon the ground that the injured man was working under an independent contract, and not as an employee of petitioner John F. Pryor.

The said Thurman Crane and his two brothers-in-law, Warren and Albert Martin, were engaged in the business of well-boring, and possessed two complete outfits for use in that work. They also engaged in the business of pumping sand from wells. The usual price charged for the boring of wells was $2.50 per foot; expenses were deducted, and the three shared equally the profits of the business. They had completed a contract for the boring and sinking of a well for petitioner John F. Pryor, and were at work elsewhere when Pryor's well filled with sand. Thereupon Pryor arranged with Warren Martin, the business man of the firm, that the two Martin brothers and Crane should return and pump out the sand; Pryor agreeing to pay $25 per day on condition that the three start work on the following day, which was Sunday. They took their pumping apparatus to the well and were at work there when Crane was struck by the handle of a windlass.

[1] Applying the accepted tests to the relationship of the parties at the time the injury was sustained, we are convinced that the work was pursuant to independent contract. It is conceded that when boring the well the firm was engaged in the performance of an independent contract. There is undisputed evidence that sand-pumping was in the same general line of work as well-boring; that in about one-third of the cases where contracts for the boring and sinking of wells had been completely performed the firm was recalled for the purpose of pumping out the sand which had subsequently filled in; and that considerable equipment, such as sand pipes, windlasses, and other apparatus, was required in this work. Both the contract for the boring of Pryor's well and the agreement for the removing of the sand were oral, Warren Martin arranging the terms on behalf of the firm, and in both instances the contracting firm furnished its own equipment. In short, the business of sand-pumping was conducted as an incident of the well-boring business, and it was carried on in practically the same manner.

The method of payment was the only item wherein the arrangements for the boring of the well differed from those for the sand-pumping. In neither branch of their business did the men contract for payment by the job. Boring was paid for by the foot, but clearly this could not be adopted as the basis for the charge for sand-pumping. There was uncontradicted testimony that the difficulty of estimating the length of time it would take to sand-pump a well was the reason for charging by the day; the amount depending somewhat on the number of men at work. Owing to the conditions, it was impracticable to set a price for the work as a whole, or a time for its completion; but the fact that no definite price was agreed upon for the completed work and that the work was performed by the day would not, in and of itself, render the contract one of employment. Flickenger v. Ind. Acc. Com., 181 Cal. 425, 184 Pac. 851, 8 A. L. R. 468. Nor was it material that the firm performing the pumping work might have been discharged at any time. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721; Donlon Bros. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715.

It is important that, as in the case of Flickenger v. Ind. Acc. Com., supra, the men were engaged to accomplish a particular result, in the performance of which they were not subject to the immediate authoritative control of those for whom the work was being done and that they were expected to furnish their own appliances and pay their own expenses. In applying the test of control we must differentiate between an order and a suggestion. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra; Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Brush, 176 Cal. 448, 168 Pac. 890. It appears that the men were not subject to the actual control or direction of any one while performing their work. According to the testimony, Mr. Pryor's representative "butted in," and the men were "willing to try" his suggestions. Had the men been subject to actual control, it would have been obligatory for them to follow directions. The men were not laborers, nor did they work as such. They carried on an extensive business, employing their own workmen. Warren Martin, who arranged for most of the work, in this case made all of the financial arrangements, and the claimant for compensation was not even cognizant of the terms of the contract until after the accident. The firm was engaged in this case, and the injured man was never personally employed by, nor did he ever personally make any contract with, Pryor or Pryor's representative.

[2] The statements of Crane and Warren Martin that they considered themselves employees are mere legal conclusions, and of no weight, in view of the uncontradicted evidence of facts which demonstrate that they were working under independent contract. Winslow v. Glendale Light & Power Co., 164 Cal. 688, 130 Pac. 427.

The determination that the injured man was working under an independent contract eliminates any discussion of the additional point of petitioners, namely, that if the contract were one of employment it was casual employment and therefore not within the terms of the Compensation Act. Stats. 1917, pp. 831, 835.

The award is annulled.

186 Cal. 42

KAYE v. METZ et al. (L. A. 6439.)

1. Limitation of actions ⊂=66(4) — Action by trustee in bankruptcy against stockholders held not barred.

An action by the trustee of a bankrupt corporation to recover unpaid purchase price of stock held not barred by the two-year statute (Code Civ. Code. § 339), on the theory that the cause of action accrued as soon as the corporation was adjudged bankrupt, where the call for the enforcement of which the action was begun was made by the trustee under direction of the court less than two years prior to filing of complaint.

2. Bankruptcy ⊂=250(1)—Call for unpaid stock subscription held not invalid.

Where a bankruptcy court in pursuance of petition ordered the trustee to call in the entire unpaid subscription if necessary for the payment of corporate debts, the objection that the call was invalid, because the trustee did not make the assessment in the manner provided by Civ. Code, §§ 331–349, providing for assessments upon corporate stock and for collection by sale of the stock or action at law was untenable; the provisions for sale being useless in a case of a bankrupt corporation.

3. Bankruptcy ⊂=250(1)—In trustee's action for unpaid stock subscription, stockholders held liable for whole amount unpaid.

In a bankruptcy trustee's action to recover unpaid stock subscriptions, a judgment rendered against each stockholder for the whole amount unpaid upon his stock was proper as against objection that the judgment against each stockholder should have been for no more than his ratable proportion of the total indebtedness.

4. Bankruptcy ⊂=305—Judgment in trustee's action held not to charge interest on unpaid stock subscriptions.

In a bankruptcy trustee's action to recover unpaid stock subscriptions, a judgment determining the amount of interest which had accrued on the debts and giving judgment against certain stockholders for no more than the amount of their unpaid subscriptions, and in no case more than the debts and accrued interest thereon, held not objectionable as charging interest on the amount of the stockholders' unpaid subscriptions.

5. Bankruptcy ⊂=154 — Stockholders' claims cannot be set off against amounts unpaid on stock subscriptions.

In a bankruptcy trustee's action to recover unpaid stock subscriptions, the court did not err in refusing to offset claims of respective stockholders as creditors of the corporation against the amounts unpaid on their respective holdings, the unpaid amounts being assets of the corporation, and as such constituting a trust fund to be applied to payment of its debts in general, since by allowing such a set-off a creditor stockholder would obtain a preference.

6. Set-off and counterclaim ⊂=46(1) — Debts must be mutual.

In order to warrant a set-off the debts must be mutual, and the principle of mutuality requires that the debts should not only be due to and from the same person, but in the same capacity.

7. Corporations ⊂=232(3)—Rule as to valuation of property taken in payment for stock as affecting fraud as to creditors stated.

Where fully paid up stock has been issued in consideration of a transfer of certain property to the corporation, the rule is that, where the corporation and stockholders have agreed on a given valuation for the property transferred, such value is conclusive unless fraudulent in purpose or effect, but, if the parties set a valuation in excess of what they knew or believed to be its true value, this is a constructive fraud upon the creditors, and the stock will be deemed paid only to the extent of the actual value of the property.

8. Bankruptcy ⊂=303(3)—Finding as to value of property transferred in payment of stock held supported by evidence.

A finding in a bankruptcy trustee's action to recover unpaid stock subscriptions that certain property transferred in consideration for the issuance of such stock was worth no more than one-quarter of the par value, and that such fact was known by the parties, and hence constituted payment for such stock only to that extent, held supported by evidence.

9. Evidence ⊂=352(5), 383(6)—Books kept by assistant secretary showing issuance of stock held admissible and prima facie evidence.

The fact that books of a corporation showing the issuance of stock were kept by the assistant secretary, and the entries made by him rather than the secretary was immaterial and such books were competent and prima facie evidence of the facts shown by the entries therein.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by W. W. Kaye, as trustee of the J. M. S. Oil Company, bankrupt, against T. J. Metz, J. W. Jameson, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Black & Black, D. S. Hammack, and Alfred L. Black, all of Los Angeles, E. W. Owen, C. L. Claflin and Anderson & Borton, all of Bakersfield, and Black, Hammack & Black, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Stutsman & Stutsman, Flint & Mackay, and Flint & Jutten, all of Los Angeles, and W. W. Kaye, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action by W. W. Kaye, as trustee in bankruptcy of the J. M. S. Oil Company, a bankrupt corporation, against alleged stockholders of said corporation to recover of each the balance alleged to be unpaid to the corporation for the stock thereof belonging to him. The court found in favor of the plaintiff and gave judgment accordingly. The appeal is from the judgment. We take up the points presented in the order in which they appear in the appellants' brief.

[1] 1. The appellants contend that the action is barred by section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the two-year statute of limitations. Appellants' theory is that the cause of action accrued and the period of limitation began to run as soon as the corporation was adjudged a bankrupt, if not before. The adjudication occurred more than two years before the action was begun.

This proposition is settled against the appellants by the decision in Union Savings Bank v. Leiter, 145 Cal. 696, 79 Pac. 441. In that case the bank had been adjudged insolvent under the bankrupt act of 1878, as amended in 1887 and 1895 (Stats. 1895, p. 172), and, as provided in that act, the directors proceeded to settle its affairs. The proceeding under the act was, in effect, a proceeding in insolvency, and the result was that ordinary actions could not thereafter be maintained against the bank, except as provided in the act. It was in legal effect the same as an adjudication in bankruptcy. People v. Superior Court, 100 Cal. 105, 34 Pac. 492; Long v. Superior Court, 102 Cal. 457, 36 Pac. 807; Crane v. Pacific Bank, 106 Cal. 69, 39 Pac. 215, 27 L. R. A. 562; Argues v. Union Savings Bank, 133 Cal. 139, 65 Pac. 307. The directors, in pursuance of their duties under the act, made a call for payment upon the stock subscriptions for the purpose of obtaining funds to pay the corporate debts. Upon the failure of Leiter to pay the amount called the action was begun. It was held (145 Cal. 705, 79 Pac. 441) that the statute of limitations did not begin to run against such action at the time of the adjudication that the bank was insolvent, nor until such time as the directors, acting as trustees in liquidation under the act, had duly made a call for payment by stockholders upon their subscription liability, and that the action was not barred until two years from the time of making such call. This case cannot be distinguished from the case at bar. In the present case the call for the enforcement of which this action was begun was made by the trustee in bankruptcy under the direction of the court less than two years prior to the filing of the complaint. Consequently it is not barred.

[2] 2. The next objection is that the call was invalid because the trustee did not make the assessment in the manner provided by sections 331 to 349 of the Civil Code, providing for assessments upon corporate stock and for the collection thereof by sale of the stock, or, at the option of the directors, by an ordinary action at law. It has been held that these provisions of the Code are so far a part of the contract of subscription that the corporate directors in the ordinary course of its business cannot enforce the payment of the price, except by proceedings in the mode prescribed by those sections, unless the subscription contract itself dispenses therewith. Los Angeles Athletic Club v. Spires, 166 Cal. 173, 135 Pac. 298. This rule, however, has no application to a suit in the nature of a creditors' bill to reach the unpaid subscription as assets of the corporation for the payment of its debts. The Code provisions contemplate that the directors may create a lien upon the stock for the amount of the assessment and enforce payment by a sale of the stock, or by a suit. The provisions for a sale would, of course, be wholly useless in the case of bankrupt corporation, or one having no property subject to execution. The enforcement of a call by suit would be no greater burden upon the stockholders when begun by a trustee in bankruptcy than if begun by the corporation itself. Consequently it is held that—

"When the corporation is insolvent, and the directors neglect or refuse to make a call, courts of equity will disregard the formality of a call and will order the unpaid subscriptions to be paid to a receiver for the benefit of the corporate creditors." Welch v. Sargent, 127 Cal. 83, 59 Pac. 319; 1 Cook on Corp. §§ 108, 207; In re Minnehaha, etc., Ass'n, 53 Minn. 423, 55 N. W. 598; Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 591, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158; Daggett v. Southwest Packing Co., 155 Cal. 765, 103 Pac. 204; Edwards v. Schillinger, 245 Ill. 244, 91 N. E. 1048, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 895, 137 Am. St. Rep. 308.

In the present case the bankruptcy court, in pursuance of a petition filed therein, ordered the trustee to call in the entire unpaid assessment if necessary for the payment of the debts. This order was made upon a contest in the bankruptcy court. We think the objection is without merit.

[3] 3. Appellants also claim that judgment should have been rendered against each stockholder for no more than his ratable proportion of the total indebtedness instead of the whole amount unpaid upon his stock. Hunt v. Sharkey, 20 Cal. App. 690, 130 Pac. 21, is relied upon in support of this proposition. In that case the trustee in bankruptcy, under the order of the court, had sold the corporate assets at public auction, including the agreements of the several stockholders to buy and pay for their stock. The total subscriptions unpaid amounted to $30,050, and the plaintiff purchased all of them for $650. The debts of the corporation were less than half of the aforesaid balances. The plaintiff sued Sharkey for the entire balance due on his subscription. A judgment of nonsuit in the court below was affirmed on the ground that it was neither alleged nor proven that any assessment or call had ever been made upon the stockholders, either by the proper court or under its direction. The remark in the opinion that an assessment in such a case should be for an amount against each stockholder that would "ratably distribute the liability of the bankrupt estate among the subscribers to the stock" was, of course, wholly unnecessary to the decision, since no assessment had been made. The real point decided was that the bankruptcy court could not by such sale subject the stockholder to a liability for his full subscription by selling the same outright to a purchaser at public auction and allow the purchaser to sue for the whole sum regardless of the amount realized by the sale to the benefit of creditors. The case is not authority on the point here presented, and the remark above quoted is contrary to the authorities.

"Corporate creditors compelling stockholders to pay their subscriptions are under no obligation to see that the payments made by the stockholders are proportionately equal. A court of chancery will compel subscribers to pay in full the amount of their unpaid subscriptions if the corporate indebtedness make it necessary, leaving them to seek contribution from the other stockholders." 1 Cook on Corp. § 211.

"The mere fact, however, that the whole amount of the balance due upon the complainant's stock may not ultimately be wanted, to pay the debts of the corporation, if all the other solvent stockholders should pay their ratable proportions of what still remains due upon their stock, does not necessarily render it inequitable that the receiver should compel the several stockholders to pay the balances due from them respectively, in the first instance. For, if any balance should remain in the hands of the receiver, after satisfying the debts of the corporation and the necessary expenses of executing the trust, it will be distributed among the several stockholders who shall have paid in full for their stock, so as to produce perfect equality among them. And it might do great injustice to the creditors of an insolvent corporation, to compel them to wait for the whole amount of their respective debts, until it could be ascertained, by a protracted litigation with all of the stockholders, how much each of such stockholders was liable and able to pay." Pentz v. Hawley, 1 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 123.

It is also held that a creditor suing in equity may pursue one stockholder alone. Edwards v. Schillinger, 245 Ill. 244, 91 N. E. 1048, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 895, 137 Am. St. Rep. 308. In giving its judgment the court below provided, so far as possible, for a just distribution of the liability by requiring that the plaintiff should collect from the defendants in the aggregate a sum not to exceed the total amount of indebtedness and interest of the bankrupt corporation. The objection is not well taken.

[4] 4. The objection of appellants that the court erred in allowing interest on the amount adjudged against J. W. Jameson and I. M. Jameson is based on a misunderstanding of the terms of the judgment. The court found that the corporate debts amounted to $31,307.82 on January 28, 1913, the date of the adjudication in bankruptcy. The judgment was rendered on July 9, 1918. It declares that interest amounting to $14,129.38 had then accrued on said debts, making a total of $45,437.20. J. W. Jameson owned 96,800 shares of the stock, on which three-fourths of the par value was unpaid, amounting to $72,600. I. M. Jameson owned 52,150 shares, on which $39,112.50 was unpaid. The judgment did not charge any interest on either of these amounts. J. W. Jameson, it will be noted, owed more on his stock than the total amount of the debts and interest. The judgment against him was only for that amount, to wit, $45,437.20. A similar judgment was given against Smith, another stockholder, who owed more than the total debts and interest. I. M. Jameson owed only $39,112.50 on her stock, which was less than the debts and interest. The judgment against her was for $31,307.82 (being the amount of the debts without interest), together with interest thereon from January 28, 1913, but in no event to exceed $39,112.50, the amount unpaid on her stock. The other defendants owed less than the principal of the debts, and the judgment against them was for the unpaid amount without mention of interest on the debts. The appellants are in no way injured by this method of stating the amounts adjudged against them, and it is not true that they were charged interest on the amount of their unpaid subscriptions.

[5] 5. The court did not err in refusing to offset the claims of the respective stockholders as creditors of the corporation against the amounts unpaid on their respective holdings. The unpaid amounts were assets of the corporation, and as such they constituted a trust fund to be applied to the payment of its debts in general. Sawyer v. Hoag, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 622, 21 L. Ed. 731; Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 152, 26 L. Ed. 968; Scammon v. Kimball, 92 U. S. 366, 23 L. Ed. 483; Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 60, 23 L. Ed. 220. It is always possible in the liquidation of an insolvent estate, in contemplation of law, that the assets may not be sufficient to pay the debts. If a creditor stockholder were allowed to set off his debt against his unpaid stock liability, he would receive payment in full of his debt, while other creditors would receive a pro rata share only, if the assets would not pay the debts in full, and even their pro rata shares would be less because of the set-off.

[6] A creditor stockholder would thus obtain a preference. In order to warrant a set-off, "the debts must be mutual, and the principle of mutuality requires that the debts should not only be due to and from the same person, but in the same capacity." 19 Cyc. 894. The trustee in bankruptcy held these stock liabilities, as above stated, as trust funds for the benefit of creditors. They are not held by him in the same capacity as would be the case if the corporation was not insolvent and had itself sued the stockholder for his subscription, hence a set-off is not permitted. This is expressly decided in the four cases last above cited.

[7] 6. The J. M. S. Oil Company was organized on April 30, 1910, with a capital stock of $500,000, divided into 500,000 shares of the par value of $1 each. Five shares were subscribed for by each of the incorporators, namely, J. W. Jameson, J. M. Smith, William Jenkins, F. E. Borton, and T. Metz, all of whom were made directors. Thereafter, in July, 1910, the company purchased of the two directors Smith and Metz a 40-year lease held by them on 40 acres of land in the oil region, in consideration of the issuance to Smith and Metz of 400,000 shares of stock of the company to be issued as fully paid-up stock. The lease was transferred and the stock issued in accordance with this agreement. The appellants claim that this constituted full payment for the said shares, and that nothing is unpaid upon the stock so issued.

The rule applicable to such transactions is thus stated in Harrison v. Armour, 169 Cal. 790, 147 Pac. 1167:

"In such cases the rule is that, where the corporation and stockholder have agreed upon a given valuation for the property transferred, such valuation is binding and conclusive unless it is fraudulent in purpose or effect. But, if the parties have put upon the property a valuation in excess of what they knew or believed to be its true value, this is a constructive fraud upon the creditors, and the stock will be deemed paid only to the extent of the actual value of the property received in exchange for it."

The same doctrine was stated in Herron Co. v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 674, 133 Pac. 491, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265, and the court added:

"It is the value of the property in the condition it is in at the time of the exchange, the value as known to the parties and as they honestly believe it to be, that determines the liability, at least where there is no subsequent increase in value nor any intentional fraud. The parties may believe that the property will eventually rise to a value far above that at which it is exchanged, and they may willingly accept the hazard in view of the expected gain, but they have no right to demand that the creditor shall share the risk with them, in effect become their partner with no share in the profits, and lose his recourse on them if their speculation proves a bad one."

In the last case the court had found that the directors believed that the property could and would be developed so that eventually its value would exceed the amount at which it was taken in exchange for stock, although they did not believe that it was worth at the time of the exchange more than one-tenth of that amount. See, also, Hasson v. Koeberle, 180 Cal. 363, 181 Pac. 387.

[8] On this point the court found the making of the exchange as above stated, and that "at all of said times the said corporation and the officers and directors thereof knew and believed that said leasehold interest and said appurtenances above described * * * was actually worth no more than the sum of $100,000; * * * that at none of said times did said corporation, its officers or directors, have any reasonable ground for believing that said leasehold interest above referred to and appurtenances were worth or had a value, actual or otherwise, of $400,000, or any sum in excess of $100,000." The appellants claim that these findings are without support in the evidence. It must be conceded that the evidence on the subject is not as full and complete as might have been desired; but, on the other hand it is to be said that full and complete evidence on a subject of this character can seldom be obtained. The only one of the directors who was examined as a witness was J. W. Jameson. He testified that at the time of the transaction he believed the leasehold property was worth the sum of $400,000 and even more, but he based his belief on his opinion that by development it would produce a profit from the pumping of oil therefrom in excess of $400,000. Testimony of other witnesses familiar with the locality and with the business of oil production was given to the effect that the property was worth no more than $100,000, and probably less than that amount under the circumstances then existing in that vicinity and in the oil business. It was also shown that all of the directors, including Smith and Metz, the holders of said lease, were present at the meeting of the directors at which the transaction was closed, and that immediately after the passage of the resolution authorizing the purchase of said lease by the corporation for said amount of stock the same directors passed another resolution that the remaining 100,000 shares of stock of the company should be placed on the market at 25 cents a share. This was done accordingly, and a large part of the 100,000 shares was sold at that price. The greater part of the stock in question here was the stock originally transferred to Smith and Metz in exchange for said lease. It had been acquired afterwards by the appellants with knowledge of all the circumstances. The conduct of these parties in immediately putting the remaining stock on the market at 25 cents a share was a clear indication that they then believed that the stock already disposed of to Smith and Metz had no real value above that amount. It is true that Jameson testified that it was necessary to sell at that price in order to raise the money with which to develop the property, and that this proceeding was not an unusual one in the oil business. It still remains true, however, that the court may well have inferred from this circumstance that the directors, all of whom consented to this sale at the reduced price, did not believe that the stock had a greater value. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the finding is sustained by the evidence, and that under the doctrine above stated it must be deemed paid up only to the extent of $100,000, or one-fourth of the par value.

[9] 7. It is contended that the findings that I. M. Jameson held 52,150 shares of the stock of the corporation is not sustained by the evidence. The books kept by the company were introduced in evidence. It appears that she had an office in which she carried on business, that this office was also used as the office of the corporation in which its books were kept, and that she was somewhat familiar with its affairs. These books show the issuance to her of more than that number of shares of the so-called "treasury stock" at the price of 25 cents a share, and a payment by her of a part of the price. The principal objection as to the effect of this evidence seems to be that the books were kept by one Rose, who was not the secretary of the corporation and that therefore the entries in the books were not competent evidence. The evidence shows, however, that he was the assistant secretary and acted in that capacity in keeping the books and making the entries therein. It is obvious that they have the same sanction as if the secretary had personally made the entries. They were competent evidence and sufficient prima facie evidence of the facts shown by the entries therein. 1 Cook on Corp. § 55.

No other points are presented. No brief has been filed on behalf of the appellant Hubbard. We find no sufficient ground for a reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

STRATTON et al. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA. (S. F. 9579.)

1. Waters and water courses ⊂=217—Water taken by mutual company for distribution to stockholders not taken for public use.

As respects the power of the Railroad Commission to fix rates, water taken by a mutual water company and distributed to its stockholders is not taken for a public use; the corporation being but a joint instrumentality of its stockholders, by means of which each diverts and has brought to him the water to which he in his own private right is entitled.

2. Waters and water courses ⊂=217—Water diverted by company authorized by riparian owner and distributed to land formerly owned by such owner not taken for public use.

Where a land company owning riparian lands, before subdividing and selling them, organized a water company and authorized it to divert the water to which the land company was entitled and supply it to the land for a specified price per acre, reserving the riparian rights, however, as appurtenant to the land, the water was not taken by the water company for a public use, as respected the power of the Railroad Commission to increase the annual rate fixed by the contract.

3. Waters and water courses ⊂=217—Water company diverting and supplying water to riparian lands under contract with former owner held not "public utility."

Where a land company owning riparian lands and also owning stock in a mutual water company, before subdividing and selling the lands with their pro rata share of the water, created a water company and authorized it, as agent of the owners of the land, to divert the water to which the land company was entitled and supply it to the land for $1 an acre, but reserved the riparian rights as appurtenant to the land, the water company was not a "public utility," and the Railroad Commission was without jurisdiction to increase the rate authorized by the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Public Utility.]

4. Waters and water courses ⊂=217—Views of parties or intention of company of weight in determining whether services public or private.

In determining whether a water company which is performing a service for a number of people of a certain class, and obligates itself to serve those who come within that class, is rendering a public service to a limited public or purely private services to each of a number of persons, the views of the parties themselves, or the intention with which the company undertook the service, may be of weight.

5. Public service commissions ⊂=19(1)—Findings of Railroad Commission not res judicata.

The Railroad Commission is essentially an administrative and legislative tribunal, and not a judicial tribunal in a strict sense, though many of its functions are quasi judicial, so that its orders are not judgments, and its findings of fact are not adjudications, and the facts found by it are not res judicata and as such finally and conclusively established between the parties for all purposes.

6. Waters and water courses ⊂=217—Finding of Railroad Commission that company was public utility not conclusive in another proceeding.

Under Public Utilities Act, § 65, providing that the orders and decisions of the Railroad Commission which have become final shall be conclusive in all collateral proceedings, a decision by the Commission that a water company was a public utility, in a proceeding by landowners claiming to be entitled to water under a contract to compel distribution to them of their pro rata proportion, even if necessary to its order in such proceeding, was not conclusive in a subsequent proceeding to increase the company's water rates, since the statute only makes the orders and decisions of the Commission conclusive for the purposes for which they are made.

7. Waters and water courses ⟸217—Acquiescence of consumers in decision that water company was public utility held not to create relation.

Where a proceeding by landowners, claiming to be entitled to water from a water company, to compel distribution to them of their pro rata proportion, in which the Railroad Commission decided that the company was a public utility, resulted in a denial of the relief asked, so that the company and the consumers proceeded as before under the previously existing arrangement between them without change in their rights or in the relation between them, the consumers' acquiescence in the decision that the company was a public utility did not have the effect of bringing into existence the relation of public utility and consumers, when not previously existing.

OLNEY, J. A corporation known as the Empire Water Company had been serving the landowners in a certain tract with water for irrigation at the price of $1 per acre per annum. The company applied to the Railroad Commission for an increased rate, the application was granted over the objection of some of the landowners, and the latter have applied to this court for a writ of review annulling the order of the Commission. The ground on which the writ is asked is that the relation between the water company and the landowners is not that of a public utility and consumers, so that the matter of rates between them is not within the jurisdiction of the Commission. The question in the case therefore is as to the character of that relation.

It seems that in 1905 a corporation known as the Empire Investment Company, and which we will hereafter refer to as the land company, was the owner of a large tract of land lying on both sides of the Kings river and riparian to it. As such owner the company possessed the right to the use of the water of the river on the land. The company also owned certain shares of stock in a mutual water company, entitling it to receive from that company certain water for its land. The land company desired to subdivide and sell the tract, and to facilitate the doing of this desired to put water upon the land. To accomplish this latter object it organized the water company, transferred to it what irrigation works had been constructed, agreed to finance it in the completion and extension of those works, and, without transferring its riparian right to water from the Kings river, authorized and empowered the water company as its agent to divert the water to which it was entitled and supply the same to its land for an annual charge of $1 per acre. The water company, on its part, issued all of its capital stock to the land company, and agreed to assume the burden of distributing to the land the water which it was authorized to divert as the agent of the land company. The land company also transferred to the water company its water stock in the mutual company, the water deliverable by reason of such stock to be distributed in like manner and under the same arrangement as the water diverted from the river under the riparian right.

The arrangement so outlined was made by a deed and written contract between the parties. The deed expressly states that it is not the intention to convey to the water company any riparian right, but that such right shall remain a part of and appurtenant to the land, and the contract recites that it is the desire of the parties to make a binding and permanent arrangement, whereby the system for supplying the land with water may be maintained and water be delivered perpetually to all of the lands of the land company for use thereon by it and by persons succeeding to its title.

The foregoing arrangement having been made, the land company proceeded to subdivide and sell its lands, and succeeded in selling substantially all, or at least substantially all that were irrigable. In making sales, it represented to purchasers that every acre had a perpetual water right attached to it, for which no charge in addition to the price of the land was made, and for whose enjoyment an annual charge of $1 an acre, for the purpose only of maintaining the irrigation system, was payable. In the sales contracts and deeds the contract between the land and water companies was referred to, and it was provided that with each acre went the riparian right to its pro rata of the water to which the entire tract was entitled. A number of years after the land had been sold, the water company applied to the Railroad Commission for an order increasing the annual rate of $1 fixed by its contract, and the Commission made the order now under attack.

[1, 2] Such being the facts of the case, it will be noted at once that the water which the water company is engaged in distributing is not water devoted to a public use. The water taken is of two sorts; that taken under the right given by the ownership of the stock in the mutual water company, and that taken under the riparian right incident to the ownership of the land. It is settled in this state that water taken by a mutual water company and distributed to its stockholders is not taken for a public use, but that such a corporation is but the joint instrumentality of its stockholders, by means of which each diverts and has brought to him the water to which he in his own private right is entitled. See Thayer v. California Development Co., 164 Cal. 117, 135, 128 Pac. 21. As to the water taken by the company under the riparian right, the case is even clearer. The water company did not have even the legal title to such right. It was expressly reserved to the land company and its successors in interest in the ownership of the land, and the water company was avowedly only an agent for making the diversion for the landowners under the riparian right which was carefully preserved to each. This right, of course, is of a purely private nature. We might add that it is expressly admitted by counsel in the case before us that none of the water received or taken by the water company and by it distributed to the landowners is water dedicated to a public use.

[3] The fact, then, being that all of the water distributed by the water company is water received or taken by it, under private rights, the case comes directly within the authority of Allen v. Railroad Commission, 179 Cal. 68, 175 Pac. 466, 8 A. L. R. 249 (the Lake Hemet Case), and is controlled by it. There, as here, the owner of a large tract of land, which he desired to subdivide and sell, organized a water company, transferred to it certain water rights, and proceeded, through the corporation, to divert the water and bring it to the land. He then sold the land, and each purchaser desiring water thereon was required to purchase a "water certificate" from the water company, whereby he was entitled to receive a certain amount of water upon the payment of a certain annual rate. The sole question in the case was whether or not the water company, in serving the landowners under these circumstances, was serving them as a public utility company. It was held that it was not. We see no possible distinction between that case and this. The only differences pointed out are two. The first is that there the water company itself had the legal title to the water rights under which the water was diverted, while here it has not the title to the rights—the riparian rights—under which most of the water is taken. But this difference would seem only to emphasize the private nature of the arrangement. There would seem to be less reason for the view that the service performed by the company is a public service where it consists in taking water for the benefit of a landowner under a private right possessed by him and conveying the water to his land, than where it consists in taking the water under a right possessed by the company itself and distributing that water to the landowner.

The second point of difference pointed out is that in the Lake Hemet Case the water company issued to each purchaser of land a water certificate. But this certificate, as the opinion states, merely represented the contract between the water company and the purchasers, and the same function exactly is served in this case by the contract of the water company with the land company which was made for the express benefit of purchasers from the latter.

[4] The affirmative point advanced to sustain the position of the water company is that the service performed by it is merely that of carrying the water, and that, since it carries the water for all the landowners within a certain district, the service is of a public character. But this very point was likewise advanced in the Lake Hemet Case and there denied. 179 Cal. 73, 175 Pac. 466, 8 A. L. R. 249. It might be that under some circumstances, possibly under circumstances closely resembling those of the present case, the carriage of water would be a public service. Where a company is performing a service for a number of people of a certain class, and obligates itself to serve those who come within that class, as is the case here, it is not always easy to determine whether the service is rendered as service to a limited public and therefore a public service, although the class served is but a limited one, or is merely an aggregate of purely private services rendered to each of a number of persons. In such a case the view of the parties themselves, or the intention with which the company undertook the service, may well be of weight in determining the true nature of the service. In the present case it is fairly plain that the water company was not organized and did not enter upon its task of serving the landowners with any intent of doing so as a public utility, but just the contrary. The company, as we have said, was organized in 1905, and in the arrangement which it made with the land company the riparian rights of the landowners were expressly reserved to them, and it was provided that the water company should act only as their agent in diverting the water from the Kings river. Just two years before, this court had decided the case of Hildreth v. Montecito, etc., Co., 139 Cal. 22, 72 Pac. 395, and the language of the opinion so exactly covers the arrangement made by the water company here, and is so closely followed by the language of the arrangement, that the inference is strong that the arrangement was made with the definite purpose of coming within that language. The court, in Hildreth v. Montecito, etc., Co. said (139 Cal. 29, 72 Pac. 398):

"Where a number of persons owning land are each entitled to take water from a common stream or source, for use upon their respective tracts of land, either by virtue of an appropriation under the Civil Code or by prescription, or as riparian owners, the water right of each is individual and several, and must be considered as private property and not the subject of public use, although the persons so owning interests in the stream are very numerous and their lands include a large neighborhood. The owners of such water rights may make a joint diversion, and may carry the water from the point of diversion in a common conduit, made with common funds, and in such a case, in the absence of a special contract to the contrary, they will be the owners in common of the diversion works and conduits; but the respective water rights will remain several and will remain private property. If the persons owning such rights see fit to form a corporation and delegate to such corporation the work of making the diversion and distribution, and of constructing and keeping in repair the dams and conduits, reserving to themselves their rights in the water, as was done in this case, they do not thereby dedicate or appropriate to public use the water thus reserved and used by them. The corporation becomes merely their agent for the purpose of serving their several interests, so far as they may be served by a common system of works; the water remaining the subject of individual ownership and private use as before. This principle was decided in substance in McFadden v. County of Los Angeles, 74 Cal. 571, and it was also recognized in McDermont v. Anaheim, etc., Co., 124 Cal. 114."

It is perhaps also worthy of note that in the case before us the water company did not agree or hold itself out as ready to transport any and all water for even the limited number of persons it was undertaking to serve. The only water which the company agreed to carry was the water deliverable upon the stock of the mutual water company and that which the landowners as riparian owners had the right to take from the Kings river. In other words, even for the limited class it agreed to serve, the water company did not agree to convey any water that might be offered to it.

[5, 6] Our conclusion, then, is that under the arrangement shown the relation between the water company and the landowners was private in character, and not that of a public utility and consumers. It is urged, however, that any question as to the character of the relation is concluded by a previous order of the Commission, which became final, holding that the water company was a public utility, and that the landowners are estopped from questioning the fact because of their acquiescence in that order, meaning by acquiescence, apparently, merely that the order was not contested and was allowed to become final, for nothing more than this appears. It seems that in 1913 some of the landowners owning lands on the west side of Kings river applied to the Railroad Commission for an order directing the water company to convey to that side of the river and there distribute a pro rata proportion of the water received upon the mutual water company's stock, which water had theretofore been distributed only to lands on the east side of the river. The application to the Commission was, of course, necessarily based on the assertion that the company was a public utility, and for that reason subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission. The company denied that it was a public utility, but took the position that the issue was really between east side and west side landowners, and that it was not concerned. Certain, at least, of the east side landowners resisted the application. The Commission decided that the company was a public utility, but denied the relief asked for. The claim now is that this decision as to the character of the company is res judicata. There is more than one answer to this, but one alone need be given. It is that the Commission is not a judicial tribunal in the strict sense, although many of its functions are quasi judicial, so that its orders are not judgments, and in particular its findings of fact are not adjudications, and facts found by it are not res judicata and as such finally and conclusively established between the parties for all purposes.

The Commission is essentially an administrative and legislative tribunal, and not a court. It frequently has to hear evidence and determine for its own guidance questions of fact, just, for example, as a board of supervisors frequently has to do, but that it must do these and similar things as a court does them does not make it a court, or change the character of its decrees from administrative or legislative orders into judicial judgments. Their character in this respect is not affected by the provision of section 65 of the Public Utilities Act (St. [Ex. Sess.] 1911, p. 54), that "in all * * * collateral proceedings the orders and decisions of the Commission which have become final shall be conclusive." There may possibly be some doubt as to just what the full effect of this statutory provision is, but, giving it the fullest effect to which it can reasonably be claimed it is entitled, it goes no further than providing that the orders and decisions of the Commission are conclusive for the purposes for which they are made. The point here is that they are not made for the purpose of adjudicating between litigants. For example, assuming that the statute should have full effect, it would follow that the previous order of the Commission could in no wise be attacked or its operation prevented in the present proceedings. The point is that it is not sought to do this, and our ruling that the water company is not a public utility does not do it.

That order stands, and it would stand even if it had been an order directing the company as a public utility to do something. But the operation of the order and its full recognition as a final, existing, and effective order does not involve or mean more as to questions of fact determined by the Commission in making the order than that such questions are conclusively determined for the purposes of the validity of the order. If the previous decision of the Commission that the water company involved here were a public utility had been necessary for the order which it made, which it was not, that fact, assuming that the fullest effect should be given to the statute, would be deemed conclusively established so far as questioning the validity of the order or its effective operation is concerned, but no farther. The peculiar effect of a determination of fact operating to conclude the question for other purposes than those of the very proceeding in which the determination is made is confined to strictly judicial determinations alone, and an order of the Commission is not of that character.

[7] As to the contention that the landowners acquiesced in the determination of the Commission as to the character of the water company, the answer is that it is wholly immaterial whether they did or not, unless by reason of the Commission's order and the acquiescence of the parties in it the relation between the company and the landowners was changed. If the Commission had held that the water company was a public utility, and then it and the landowners had not only acquiesced in the order, that is, failed to question it, but had proceeded upon the basis that the company was a public utility, then and there the relation of public utility and consumers would have come into existence between them, regardless of whether it had previously existed between them or not. This, and this alone, is the point of Franscioni v. Soledad, etc., Co., 170 Cal. 221, 149 Pac. 161, and Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 194 Pac. 1003. Nothing of this sort appears in the present case. The Railroad Commission denied the relief which the west side landowners asked, so that the company and the landowners proceeded as before under the previously existing arrangement between them, and as a consequence without change in their respective rights or in the relation between them. That relation must, as we have said, be held, on the authority of Allen v. Railroad Commission, not to be one of public utility and consumers, and consequently not within the jurisdiction of the Commission.

The order of the Railroad Commission is annulled.

SOUTHERN PAC. LAND CO. v. MESERVE et al. (L. A. 6348.)

1. Public lands ⊜114(6)—Patent made pursuant to grant presumed to cover land covered by grant.

In an action to quiet title, in which plaintiff claimed title under a patent made pursuant to the grant from the United States to the Southern Pacific Railroad by Acts Cong. July 27, 1866, § 18, and March 3, 1871, § 23, which grant covered only odd-numbered sections, it will be presumed that the land is in an odd-numbered section; the patent itself being prima facie evidence thereof, shifting the burden upon defendants of proving the contrary.

2. Evidence ⊜83(1)—Official duty presumed to have been duly performed.

Official duty will be presumed to have been duly performed.

3. Evidence ⊜335(2)—Map of resurvey held competent to show section in which tract of land was situated.

In an action to quiet title, in which plaintiff claimed under a patent issued pursuant to a grant from the United States to the Southern Pacific Railroad under Acts Cong. July 27, 1866, § 18, and March 3, 1871, § 23, a map of a resurvey under Act Cong. March 3, 1909 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4824), held competent to prove the section in which the land was situated, where the map was made for the purpose of ascertaining the tracts listed for patent under such grant, and where defendants' only claim was under a desert entry shown to have been canceled.

4. Evidence ⊜46—Judicial notice taken of a letter of instructions from commissioner of land office to United States surveyor general.

The court will take judicial notice of a letter of instructions from the commissioner of the land office to the United States surveyor general regarding the resurvey it made under Act Cong. March 3, 1909 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4824).

5. Use and occupation ⊜10—Finding as to value of use of land wrongfully occupied held excessive.

In action for damages for wrongful occupation of land, where the use of the land was of no value without water, and where the only water available was that owned by the defendants, finding fixing the value of the use of the land during the occupation as $200 per year under Civ. Code, § 3334, held excessive in that the computation made allowed plaintiff damages for the use of the water which was defendants' own property; the use of the land without water being without value.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Land Company, against Alvin R., E. A., and H. W. Meserve. Judgment for plaintiff against the two last named defendants, and they appeal. Reversed.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, and Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank Thunen, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover possession of a tract of land, to quiet title thereto, and for damages for the withholding of posssession thereof by the defendants. The action was dismissed as to Alvin R. Meserve, and judgment was given for plaintiff against the other defendants, from which judgment said defendants appeal. The pleadings, findings, and judgment were in the usual form. The claim of the appellants is that the findings and judgment relating to the title to the land and damages are contrary to the evidence. The finding concerning title is that the plaintiff was the owner of the land and was entitled to the exclusive possession thereof, and that the defendants had no right, title, or interest therein. The land in controversy is described as the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of tract 188, township 13 south, range 14 east, San Bernardino meridian, as shown by the plats of existing official surveys of the United States.

[1] The evidence shows a straight chain of title to the plaintiff based on a patent from the United States to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, executed on November 9, 1915. This patent was made in pursuance of the grant from the United States to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company made by the acts of Congress of July 27, 1866, and March 3, 1871 (14 U. S. Stats. 292, § 18; 16 U. S. Stats. 573, § 23). This grant covered only odd-numbered sections of land. The patent from the United States to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company included the particular tract in controversy as a part of tract 188 of township 13 south, range 14 east, San Bernardino meridan. The patent does not on its face show that tract 188 was in an odd-numbered section. Upon the theory that the acts of Congress aforesaid do not authorize a patent to the railroad company of land not in an odd-numbered section, appellants claim that in order to make the patent valid plaintiff should have proved that the tract claimed was a part of some odd-numbered section, and they contend that there was no evidence of that fact. There are two answers to this objection.

[2] There is a presumption that official duty has been duly performed. Since the proper officers of the United States selected and listed this land as a part of the land covered by said grant and issued the patent accordingly, the patent itself is prima facie, and in this form of action perhaps conclusive, evidence that the land was included in an odd-numbered section according to the survey of 1856, the survey in force at the date of said acts, if that fact was necessary to the validity of the patent. If in a collateral attack, such as the one here made, the patent is conclusive upon this point, there is no more to be said. If it is only prima facie evidence of the fact, it is sufficient, for in that event it puts the burden on the defendants to prove the contrary, and they introduced no evidence on the subject.

[3, 4] The other answer is that a map from the government records was given in evidence, showing that the land in controversy is part of section 5 of said township and range. Appellants contend that this map was not competent evidence, because, as they claim, it was a resurvey made under the act of March 3, 1909, (35 U. S. Stats. 845 [U. S. Comp. St. § 4824]), which act provides that no resurvey made thereunder "shall be so executed as to impair the bona fide rights or claims of any claimant, entryman, or owner of lands" affected thereby. The map itself shows that the survey which it delineates was made in February and March in the year 1912. A letter of instructions from the commissioner of the land office to the United States surveyor general in California regarding this alleged resurvey, of which letter we may take judicial notice (S. P. Co. v. Lipman, 148 Cal. 491, 83 Pac. 445; S. P. R. R. Co. v. Wood, 124 Cal. 485, 57 Pac. 388), under date of August 14, 1912, shows that the map was made for the purpose of ascertaining and designating the tracts of land in certain townships, including the one in controversy, which under the grant aforesaid had been selected and listed for patent to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company under said grant. Furthermore, the only interest which the defendants claim in defense was under a desert land entry made by Alvin R. Meserve in 1907, and the evidence shows that on appeal by Meserve to the secretary of the interior this entry was canceled on February 28, 1912, prior to the completion of said resurvey and prior to the issuance of the patent to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. It would seem, therefore, that whatever may be the state of the title of the plaintiff, the defendants had no title whatever except such as comes from the bare possession at the time said resurvey was made, and hence the same could not impair their rights. Under any view of the case, therefore, the finding that the title was in the plaintiff was fully sustained by the evidence.

On the subject of damages, the findings are that the action was begun on November 16, 1916; that during the three years immediately preceding that date the two appellants were occupying the land without the consent of the plaintiff and were withholding possession thereof from the plaintiff; that the value of the use of the said land during said occupation was $200 per year. The judgment awards plaintiff damages "at the rate of $200 per annum from November 16, 1913, until surrender of possession by said defendants to plaintiff."

The only witness on the subject of value testified, on examination in chief, that the value of the use of the land in the condition it was in during the said period was $200 per year. On cross-examination he said that the land was desert land, and that the use thereof was of no value whatever unless water was applied thereto for irrigation, that said defendants had used water on the land during said period, and that the value given by the witness was the value of the use with water. It further appeared that said defendants were able to get water on the land solely because they owned stock in Imperial Water Company No. 4, that no water for use on said land could be obtained except from said company, nor by any one from said company unless he was the owner of stock of said company, and that the plaintiff never owned any such stock. There was further testimony to the effect that during said period the land could not have been rented at all unless the owner could buy stock from said company so as to obtain water therefor. It also appeared that the plaintiff might have been able to obtain water stock from said company by paying the price therefor.

[5] It is claimed by the appellants that this evidence showed that the damages allowed were excessive. Their theory is that the value shown by the evidence—$200 per year—is composed of two elements: First, the value of the use of the land; second, the value of the use of the water; that water for use on land is a species of real property; that the plaintiff owned no water at all, whereas the defendants were owners thereof; and that the computation made by the court allows plaintiff damages for the use of defendants' property. We see no escape from this conclusion. It appears from the evidence that the stock of Imperial Water Company No. 4 was valuable and could not be had without the payment of money—how much does not appear. It is obvious, however, from the circumstances that the use of the land was of no value without water, and, as water was not available from any other source, that the water stock would probably be worth as much as the land.

The measure of damages for the wrongful occupation of land is the value of its use during the time of such occupation. Civ. Code, § 3334. In the circumstances here appearing this would not be the value of the use of both the land and the water. The plaintiff should have been required to prove the rental value of the land alone, taking into consideration the possibility and the expense of getting water thereon. That was its condition when defendants took possession. The application of the defendants' water right to the land was not, under the conditions existing in that locality, strictly speaking, an improvement on the land; in effect, it was a combination or union of two properties—water and land—the first owned by defendants; the second by plaintiff. It does not appear that the water stock ever became attached to or appurtenant to the land. Apparently it remains the property of defendants. The plaintiff was entitled only to the value of the use of that which belonged to it. The possibility that the plaintiff or its tenant could have procured water by buying the water stock was a circumstance which would tend to increase the rental value of the land. That value, so increased, would be all that the plaintiff should have been allowed to recover in this case. The damages appear to be excessive.

We are not to be understood as approving the form of the judgment on the subject of damages, as above quoted.

We find no reason for disturbing the finding with respect to the title to the property. It will be necessary, however, that there be a new trial of the issue on the subject of damages, and there should be a reversal for that purpose alone.

It is ordered that the judgment be reversed, that the cause be remanded for a new trial on the issue of the subject of damages, and for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

STORY v. RICHARDSON, State Treasurer (two cases). (Sac. 3061, 3062.)

1. Constitutional law ⟸16—Constitutional provision must be interpreted in consonance with objects and purposes.

Where constitutional provisions are not free from doubt, they must be interpreted as nearly as possible in consonance with the objects and purposes in contemplation at the time of their adoption.

2. Constitutional law ⟸16—Court, in construing ambiguous provision, may consider conditions, constitutional convention's debates, etc.

In aid of the interpretation of terms of a constitutional provision not entirely free from doubt, the court may consider conditions existing prior to and at the time of adoption of the provision under consideration, the debates in the constitutional convention, and the printed arguments for and against the provision submitted to the people at the polls.

3. Taxation ⊜382—Provision of Constitution for taxation of gross receipts applicable only to public utilities.

The provision of Const. art. 13, § 14, adopted in 1910, for taxation of electric companies in proportion to gross receipts, is applicable only to public utilities.

4. Taxation ⊜382—Owner of office building not a "public utility engaged in transmission or sale of electricity" within Constitution.

Owner of a 12-story office building in a city, in the sub-basement of which were located three 125-horsepower boilers, pumping engines, lighting engines, etc., to supply tenants occupying the building with light, heat, hot water, elevator, and cleaning service, though during one year he supplied electrical energy and steam to individuals not tenants, but occupying property in the vicinity of the building, held not a public utility engaged in the transmission or sale of electricity within Const. art. 13, § 14, providing for taxation in proportion to gross receipts of public utilities, despite the definition of public utility in the Public Utility Act, § 2.

Appeals from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Sheilds, Judge.

Action by Walter P. Story against Friend William Richardson, Treasurer of the State of California. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

U. S. Webb and Frank L. Guerena, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Amend & Amend, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This action was brought for the purpose of having an assessment declared null and void, and to recover from the Treasurer of the State of California the amount of a tax paid by plaintiff pursuant to said assessment, and under protest.

The plaintiff, Walter P. Story, is the owner of a 12-story office building in the city of Los Angeles, in the sub-basement of which are located three 125-horsepower boilers, pumping engines, lighting engines, vacuum sweeper engines, a hot water heater, filtering machinery, house pumps, etc. This machinery and equipment were placed in the building at the time of its construction, for the purpose of supplying the tenants occupying the building with light, heat, hot water, elevator and cleaning service, and have ever since been so used. During the year 1916, in addition to furnishing such service to the tenants of the building, plaintiff supplied electrical energy and steam to certain individuals, some of whom were not tenants of the Walter P. Story building, but occupied property in the vicinity of that building.

The terms of these sales were arranged by private contract between plaintiff and purchasers; plaintiff possessed no franchise, and neither the operation of the plant nor the sales in question were regulated in any manner by any public utility commission or body. The state board of equalization levied a tax upon the said machinery and equipment in plaintiff's building equal to 5.6 per cent. of the gross sums received from the special sales of electrical energy and steam for the year 1916, which gross returns amounted to $6,040.13 and $7,618.77, respectively. Plaintiff claims that this taxation was unauthorized, and that he is entitled to recover the amount thereof. The trial court held that plaintiff was not entitled to recover the tax based upon the gross sales of electrical energy, but that the tax based upon the gross sales of steam was without authority, and void. Plaintiff and defendant have each appealed from those portions of the judgment which are adverse to them.

Section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution of California provides:

"Taxes levied, assessed and collected as hereinafter provided upon railroads, * * * car companies, * * * companies doing express business on any railroad, steamboat, vessel or stage line in this state; telegraph companies; telephone companies; companies engaged in the transmission or sale of gas or electricity; insurance companies; banks, banking associations, savings and loan societies, and trust companies; and taxes upon all franchises of every kind and nature, shall be entirely and exclusively for state purposes, and shall be levied, assessed and collected in the manner hereinafter provided. The word 'companies' as used in this section shall include persons. * * *"

Subdivision "a" of this section of the Constitution provides that the railroads, car companies, express companies, telegraph companies, gas and electric companies previously mentioned shall annually pay a tax upon the property used exclusively in the operation of their business in this state; the amount of which tax shall equal certain percentages of the gross receipts of said companies; and that—

"Such taxes shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal, upon the property above enumerated of such companies except as otherwise in this section provided."

Defendant claims that this section of the Constitution confers upon the state the power to levy upon plaintiff's property the tax assailed in the instant case. Controverting this contention, plaintiff asserts that the section permits the state to tax the property of only those companies or persons engaged in the transmission or sale of electricity operating as public utilities, and that plaintiff is not a public utility, and therefore not taxable under the section.

[1-3] Where terms of a constitutional provision are not entirely free from doubt, they must be interpreted as nearly as possible in consonance with the objects and purposes in contemplation at the time of their adoption. Accordingly it has been held, in aid of the interpretation of such terms, that the court may consider conditions existing prior to and at the time of the adoption of the provision under consideration, the debates in a constitutional convention, and the printed arguments for and against the provision submitted to the people at the polls. Matter of Russell, 163 Cal. 668, 126 Pac. 875, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 152; Older v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 770, 109 Pac. 478; Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 180 Cal. 497, 501, 181 Pac. 788. The provision of the Constitution here under consideration was adopted by the people of the state at the election of November, 1910, as the result of a movement to separate state and local taxation. In 1905 a commission was authorized to investigate the system of revenue and taxation in force in this state, and recommend a revision thereof. Stats. 1905, p. 390. The commission appointed proposed an amendment to the Constitution. Report of the Commission on Revenue and Taxation of the State of California, 1906, vol. II, Appendix to Journals of Senate and Assembly of California, session 1907. In 1910, after some alterations, the amendment was submitted to the people, and adopted by them. The amendment as adopted was fundamentally the same as that proposed by the commission in its report in 1906, and that report may, therefore, be considered in determining the meaning of doubtful provisions. The commission recommended a separation of the sources of state and county revenue, and that the property of certain "public utilities" and certain "other corporations," namely, banks and insurance companies, be taxed solely for the benefit of the state.

The theory of the report was that an ad valorem system of taxation was unsatisfactory, in that it failed to distribute equally the burden of taxation, particularly in view of the fact that, in certain cases, such as public utilities, banks, and insurance companies, the greatest value lay in the extent and nature of operation rather than in the intrinsic worth of separate items of property. Accordingly, a uniform scheme was proposed for the taxation of certain enumerated public utilities, including electrical companies, and that system was that the tax should equal a certain percentage of gross receipts; special methods were prescribed for the taxation of banks and insurance companies. Throughout the report electrical companies were classified and discussed as one group of "public utilities" to be taxed upon gross receipts. In the printed arguments submitted to the voters in 1910, at the time the constitutional amendment was voted upon, the "gross receipts" method of taxation was advocated solely for public utilities. It is clear, both from the report of the commission proposing the amendment, and the arguments advanced to those voting upon the adoption of the amendment, as well as from the nature of the amendment, that the provision for taxation in proportion to gross receipts is applicable only to public utilities. In discussing the amendment, the cases have generally assumed that the tax upon gross receipts was limited to public utilities, although the precise question has never before been presented for decision. San Francisco v. Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., 166 Cal. 244, 247, 135 Pac. 971; Pacific Gas & Electrical Co. v. Roberts, 168 Cal. 420, 143 Pac. 700.

[4] Plaintiff is also correct in his contention that he is not a public utility "engaged in the transmission or sale of * * * electricity" within the meaning of said section 14 of article XIII of the state Constitution. He is not engaged in the sale and distribution of electricity to the public at large, or any portion thereof, as such. It appears that plaintiff furnished electrical energy under special contract to certain occupants of his own building and to the occupants of an adjoining building. This was the extent of his special sales of electrical energy.

"The test is * * * whether the public has a legal right to the use, which cannot be gainsaid, or denied, or withdrawn, at the pleasure of the owner." Farmer's Market Co. v. R. R. Co., 142 Pa. 580, 21 Atl. 989, 990.

"The essential feature of a public use is that it is not confined to privileged individuals, but is open to the indefinite public. It is this indefiniteness or unrestricted quality that gives it its public character." Thayer v. California Development Board, 164 Cal. 117, 127, 128 Pac. 21, 25.

There was no such general offer on the part of plaintiff. Plaintiff's plant was designed primarily and pre-eminently for supplying service to the tenants of his own building, and the special sales of electrical energy and steam were wholly subsidiary and ancillary to this main purpose. The surplus electrical energy at plaintiff's disposal was therefore so limited as to restrict the sale thereof to exceptional cases and prevent the indefinite offer of service essential to a public use.

Defendant claims that, notwithstanding plaintiff's restricted operation, he comes within the term "public utility" as defined by the "Public Utilities Act" of this state. That act provides that any one who generates or distributes electricity to the public, or any portion thereof, for any compensation or payment whatsoever is a public utility, subject to the provisions of that act. The same act defines "public, or any portion thereof" as—

"The public generally, or any limited portion of the public, including a person." Stats. 1915, pp. 115, 118, 119.

"Even a constitutional declaration cannot transform a private enterprise or a part thereof into a public utility, and thus take property for public use without condemnation and payment." Del Mar Water, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 680, 140 Pac. 591, 596.

Consequently, it has been held that the definitions of public utilities contained in the Public Utilities Act must be construed as applying only to such properties as have, in fact, been devoted to a public use, and not as an effort to impress with a public use properties which have not been devoted thereto. Allen v. R. R. Comm., 179 Cal. 68, 88, 175 Pac. 466, 8 A. L. R. 249. Inasmuch as plaintiff's property was employed solely in a private enterprise, the consummation of the special sales did not bring him within the scope of the definition contained in the act.

Since section 14, article 13, of the Constitution, was designed to authorize state taxation in proportion to gross receipts only in the case of public utilities, and plaintiff is not operating as a "public utility," his property is not taxable thereunder. It follows that the tax based upon gross sales of electricity was without authority, and void. It therefore becomes unnecessary to pass upon the point raised by the state treasurer in his appeal, namely, that the sales of steam were taxable as a by-product of the business in electricity, and that the trial court erred in holding void the tax based upon gross receipts from sales of steam.

The trial court found that plaintiff was not furnishing the commodities of electricity and steam as a public service concern. Therefore, with the exception of the single conclusion of law to the effect that the tax based upon plaintiff's gross sales of electrical energy for the year 1916 was valid, the findings of the trial court are in accordance with the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, and will support the judgment wholly in his favor. That portion of the judgment which declares that plaintiff recover nothing from defendant on account of the tax based upon the sales of electrical energy is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment declaring the said tax void, and that plaintiff recover the amount thereof. That portion of the judgment which grants plaintiff a recovery on account of the tax based upon the sales of steam is affirmed.

TURLOCK IRR. DIST. v. WHITE, Tax Collector, et al. (Sac. 2935.)

Taxation ⟸217—Irrigation district not a "municipal corporation" within exception from exemption from taxation.

An irrigation district organized under the laws of California is not a "municipal corporation," within the amendment of 1914 to Const. art. 13, § 1, excepting from the exemption from taxation of property belonging to municipal corporations, "such lands and the improvements thereon located outside the municipal corporation owning the same as were subject to taxation at the time of their acquisition by the county, city and county, or municipal corporation."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal Corporation.]

Sloane, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by the Turlock Irrigation District, a public corporation, against James G. White, Tax Collector of Tuolumne County, and the County of Tuolumne. From judgment enjoining collection of taxes, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rowan Hardin, of Sonora, for appellants.

P. H. Griffin and Griffin, Boone & Boone, all of Modesto, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is by defendants, from a judgment enjoining them from attempting to collect certain taxes levied by the defendant county against lands of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, an irrigation district, whose corporate boundaries are wholly within the counties of Merced and Stanislaus, is the owner of land situated in the county of Tuolumne. It is the taxation of this land by the county of Tuolumne that is sought to be enjoined.

Authority to levy and collect such tax is claimed by the defendant county under the amendment of 1914 to section 1 of article 13 of the state Constitution. As this section of the Constitution previously stood, it provided that no property belonging to the "United States, this state, or to any county or municipal corporation within this state" shall be subject to taxation. The amendment excepts from such exemption—

"such lands and the improvements thereon located outside of the county, city and county, or municipal corporation owning the same as were subject to taxation at the time of the acquisition of the same by said county, city and county, or municipal corporation."

The entire controversy in this case is as to whether or not an irrigation district, organized under the laws of California, is a "municipal corporation" within the meaning of this section of the Constitution.

This amendment to the Constitution (article 13, § 1) was submitted by the Legislature to the people in November, 1914. A printed argument in favor of its adoption accompanied the publication of the proposed amendment, a copy of such argument being mailed to each voter in the state as required by law.

Sections 1195, 1195a, 1195b, Pol. Code. This argument in favor of the proposed amendment clearly explains its purpose, and the voters, in acting upon the amendment, must be deemed to have considered such reasons in interpreting the general term "municipal corporation" used in the proposed amendment. The argument, in part, was as follows:

"* * * This amendment does not seek to hinder in any way the development of enterprises by and for the benefit of counties or municipalities, in any part of the state, but to protect from loss those counties into which they may enter for such purposes. A concrete illustration is afforded by the counties of Tuolumne, Mono, and Inyo. In furtherance of obtaining a large water supply, for municipal and other uses, the purchase by San Francisco in Tuolumne county aggregated over $1,000,000 worth of property. Los Angeles, in Owens river valley, acquired by purchase over 75,000 acres of land, amounting to over one-sixth of the assessed value, and more than one-fourth of the located agricultural land of the county. The city of Los Angeles has acquired large holdings in Mono county. Before such acquisition the area was taxpaying property. Since the acquisition in Inyo county, the city of Los Angeles has continued to pay taxes, as a matter of justice, but its payments are accompanied by protests, in order to preserve to it the right of refusal to pay which many contend that it has under the constitutional provision as it stands at present, and that it might sustain in case of legal contest. While not abandoning any right from a technical standpoint, the city recognizes the justice of the contention upon which this amendment is based.

"The city of San Francisco refuses absolutely to pay one dollar in taxes in Tuolumne county on their $1,000,000 worth of property, contending they are exempt from such a tax by a constitutional provision. * * *

"It would be possible for an acquiring city or county to virtually destroy the government of a small county by acquiring, for one purpose or another, for municipal use, the substance of its revenue yielding property. That such a result would be improbable and extreme does not alter the fact of its possibility. In the Inyo county instance, refusal by the city of Los Angeles to pay taxes upon real estate which has heretofore borne its due share of the expense of the county government would be a serious matter, either curtailing the county's welfare or imposing a heavier burden on other property. With such a result possible to a fractional extent, it would be equally possible to the fullest extent that the investing city might see fit to go.

"It is to remedy such a condition that this amendment was proposed. Uncertainty on the matter should be removed by a legal assurance that, while natural resources within one county may be directly used for the upbuilding of another, lands or other property already upon the invaded county's tax roll shall continue to bear its shares of maintaining the local government.

"It is hoped, therefore, that the justice of this amendment will insure for it the approval of the people of the state."

It is apparent that the term "municipal corporation" was thus presented to the people as synonymous with such corporations as Los Angeles and San Francisco; that is to say, as municipal corporations in the strict technical sense.

In their brief appellants say:

"To start with, it will be admitted that by the late decisions of the Supreme Court said decisions have, by an exceedingly fine analysis, determined that, as a technical, legal proposition, an irrigation district is an arm of the state government, or a public corporation, and not a municipal corporation, as the term municipal corporation is technically known."

However, appellants' contention is that the term "municipal corporation," in its popular acceptation, includes irrigation district, and, consequently, this popular meaning is to be applied, rather than a technical one. The rule appellants rely on is thus stated in a recent case (City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission of the State of California, 192 Pac. 25, 10 A. L. R. 1425):

"* * * The Constitution, 'unlike the acts of our Legislature, owes its whole force and authority to its ratification by the people; and they judged of it by the meaning apparent on its face, according to the general use of the words employed, where they do not appear to have been used in a legal or technical sense.' Miller v. Dunn, 72 Cal. 465, 14 Pac. 27, 28, 1 Am. St. Rep. 67. Where a word has a popular and also a technical meaning, 'the courts will accord to it its popular meaning, unless the very nature of the subject indicates or the context suggests that it is employed in its technical sense.' Weill v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 113."

Other instances of its application may be found in Miller v. Dunn, 72 Cal. 462–465, 14 Pac. 27, 1 Am. St. Rep. 67; Towle v. Matheus, 130 Cal. 574–577, 62 Pac. 1064; San Pedro etc., v. Hamilton, 161 Cal. 610–617, 119 Pac. 1073, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 686; Perrin v. Miller, 35 Cal. App. 129–132, 169 Pac. 426.

In support of the proposition that the term "municipal corporation" as commonly understood includes an irrigation district, the following quotation from Merchants' Bank v. Escondido Irrigation District, 144 Cal. 329, 77 Pac. 937, is cited:

"* * * But the term municipal, as commonly used, is appropriately applied to all corporations exercising governmental functions, either general or special; and, indeed, this must be taken as the definition of a public or municipal corporation."

Appellants also cite the following from In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 319, 28 Pac. 272, 277 (14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106):

"The municipal corporations which may be thus created are not limited to cities and towns. The constitution makes provision in various places for municipal corporations, other than cities and towns. Article XI, §§ 9, 10, 12, 16. In each of these sections provision is made with reference to the government or officers of 'county, city, town, or other public or municipal corporation,' thus clearly indicating that there may be municipal corporations other than those of a town or city."

The fact that the argument submitted to the voters indicated that the term "municipal corporation" was used with technical accuracy requires that the rule relied upon by appellants be applied against them, rather than in favor of their contention, because the very nature of the subject, the context of the amendment, and the manner and reason for its presentation all require that it be construed in its technical sense, and, hence, it is within the exception of the rule of construction above stated. There are, however, other cogent reasons for concluding that an irrigation district is not included within the term "municipal corporation" as used in the amendment. The nature of an irrigation district has been a matter of judicial investigation and interpretation, and it has been held that such a corporation is not a municipal corporation, but a "public corporation for municipal purposes." Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369. As to swamp land, drainage, levee, and reclamation districts, similar to irrigation districts, it has been held that they were not municipal corporations. People v. Levee Dist. No. 6, 131 Cal. 30, 63 Pac. 676; People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 103 Pac. 207; Swampland Dist. No. 150 v. Silver, 98 Cal. 51, 32 Pac. 866, and Reclamation District No. 70 v. Sherman, 11 Cal. App. 399, 105 Pac. 277. See, also, People v. Selma Irrigation Dist., 98 Cal. 206, 208, 32 Pac. 1047, and cases there cited. The amendment in question must be considered to have been framed and submitted to the people with these decisions in mind, by which it was settled that such corporations were not "municipal corporations."

It is worthy of note that at the very election at which this constitutional amendment was adopted several amendments were submitted in which the term "irrigation district" was used. For illustration, section 13, § 11, was amended to prohibit the Legislature with interfering with any county, city, town, or municipal improvement, etc.—

"except that the Legislature shall have power to provide for the supervision, regulation and conduct, in such manner as it may determine, of the affairs of irrigation districts, reclamation districts or drainage districts, organized or existing under any law of this state."

Article 11, § 13½, was amended to include "irrigation district" in the phrase "county, city and county, city, town, municipality, or other public corporation," so that the phrase now reads: "Any county, city and county, city, town, municipality, irrigation district, or other public corporation," etc., thus tending to impress upon the voter that the term "municipality" did not include an "irrigation district."

At the same election, article 11, § 6, was amended by the people. This section restricts the power of the Legislature in the formation of municipal corporations, to providing by general law for their formation, and prohibits the formation of such corporations by special statute. That section uses the term "municipal corporation," as synonymous with "cities and towns." The section reads, in part, as follows:

"Sec. 6. Corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws; but the Legislature shall, by general laws, provide for the incorporation, organization and classification, in proportion to population, of cities and towns. * * *"

If it were intended by the Legislature and by the people to use the term "municipal corporation" with its broadest possible meaning in article 13, § 1, supra, it is reasonable to suppose that language similar to that contained in article 11, § 13½ supra, would have been employed, expressly including, as does the latter section, the term "irrigation districts."

One of the important rules of constitutional construction is thus stated by Mr. Cooley:

"If a difficulty really exists, which an examination of every part of the instrument does not enable us to remove, there are certain extrinsic aids which may be resorted to, and which are more or less satisfactory in the light they afford. Among these aids is a contemplation of the object to be accomplished or the mischief to be remedied or guarded against by the clause in which the ambiguity is met with." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 100. (Italics the author's.)

In view of the general policy of the law and the great necessity on which that policy rests, that property held by public corporations shall not be taxed by the state, much less by other public corporations, and the plain fact that this particular amendment of the constitution was manifestly inspired by the desires of three counties to prevent Los Angeles and San Francisco from escaping taxation on property owned by them situated outside their limits for the carrying on of public water systems, together with the further fact that the Constitution itself, in other parts thereof, describes "municipal corporations," and provides for their creation in such a way that it cannot be doubted that none other than the ordinary municipal corporations were referred to, it is clear that irrigation districts were not made taxable by the exception contained in the amendment in question.

It should be stated that it is conceded that irrigation districts were not taxable before the amendment of 1914, and are not now, unless such taxation is authorized by the amendment, but it is contended that they then were exempt because of the special exemption of the property of "municipal corporations" contained in such section, and that such irrigation districts are now taxable under the special exception in the amendment authorizing the taxation of "municipal corporations." To the contrary, such exemption existed because of the express exemption of the property of "the state," and contained in that section because of the implications in favor of the exemption of public property. See Reclamation Dist. No. 551 v. County of Sacramento, 134 Cal. 477, 66 Pac. 668, and cases therein cited for a discussion of the principle applicable. See, also, Webster v. Board of Regents, 163 Cal. 705, 126 Pac. 974, and cases cited. Reference may also be made to Central Irrigation District v. De Lappe, 79 Cal. 351, 21 Pac. 825, and Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District v. Superior Court, 187 Pac. 1056, for a discussion of the similarity of the organization of reclamation and irrigation districts.

The language quoted in the dissenting opinion from Southern Pacific Co. v. Levee Dist. No. 1, 172 Cal. 345, 156 Pac. 502, read in the light of the express statement in the opinion that such districts are not "municipal corporations," would indicate that the court considered that the property of the district was "state property," rather than property of a "municipal corporation." The same view is taken in People v. Reclamation District No. 551, 117 Cal. 114, 48 Pac. 1016, where it is said:

"Certainly, these districts were not municipal corporations as that term is used in the Constitution." "If these districts can be said to be corporations at all, I think they are properly called public corporations for municipal purposes. That phrase means no more than that they are state organizations for state purposes. They certainly are not municipal corporations in the strict sense."

Similarly, in Re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 322, 28 Pac. 272, 278 (14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106), it was said:

"The property held by the corporation is in trust for the public, and subject to the control of the state."

However, the reasons presented for the conclusion reached in Southern Pacific Co. v. Levee Dist. No. 1, supra, were so numerous and cogent that the differentiation between the various forms of taxing agencies was of little, if any, weight in arriving at the conclusion that it was intended by the amendment to prohibit all such agencies from exercising the taxing power over railroad corporations, that the decision is of little or no assistance in reaching a conclusion on the question involved here.

Judgment affirmed.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J., and WILBUR, SHAW, OLNEY, LENNON, and LAWLOR, JJ., concur.

SLOANE, J. I dissent. The reasoning of the majority opinion that this constitutional provision should be strictly interpreted against the tax in question because all intendments of the law are against the taxation of public property cannot apply in this instance, because here the provision involved is avowedly dealing with the taxation of public property.

Section 1 of article 13 expressly defines what classes of public property shall be exempt from taxation. It discloses, first, that "all property in the state except as otherwise in this Constitution provided, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed." Standing alone, under the rule cited, this might not include public property, exempt under the general rule of public policy, but the section proceeds with a proviso which shows that it is dealing with the subject of taxation as applied to both public and private property.

The proviso is that various enumerated classes of property, including—

"such as may belong to the United States, this state, or to any county, city and county, or municipal corporation within this state, shall be exempt from taxation."

It is entirely clear that unless the property of an irrigation district is either the property of the state or of a municipal corporation it is not exempt from taxation at all. When the Legislature or Constitution has made express provision for the exemption of certain classes of public property, the inference is clear that it did not intend that other classes should be exempt. 26 R. C. L. p. 291; Chicago Sanitary Dist. v. Martin, 173 Ill. 243, 50 N. E. 201, 64 Am. St. Rep. 110; Bd. of Trustees v. Atlanta, 113 Ga. 883, 39 S. E. 394, 54 L. R. A. 806. But under our Constitution the matter is made conclusive by the direction that all property not so enumerated shall be taxed.

This court was confronted with such an alternative in the case of Reclamation Dist. v. Sacramento, 134 Cal. 477, 66 Pac. 668. As stated in the opinion in that case:

"The sole question presented is, whether property acquired by a reclamation district as necessary and indispensable to the execution of its objects is subject to taxation for state and county purposes."

Exemption was claimed for this property by the district under section 1 of article 13 of the Constitution as it read prior to the amendment of 1914, exempting all property which belongs to "this state, or to any county or municipal corporation within this state." Reviewing the authorities on the question as to whether or not a reclamation district was a municipal corporation, without directly passing upon this point, the court disposes of the case upon another theory. It says:

"It is not necessary to hold this property, thus acquired, to be the property of a municipal corporation, in order to make it exempt from taxation. It would be sufficient to hold that it is public property of the state, within the meaning of the Constitution."

It requires great latitude of construction to hold the property of a reclamation district as property "belonging to the state," but, considering the nature of such district organization, with its limited corporate powers under the law as it existed at the time covered by this decision, it was perhaps a more logical conclusion than to class it as a municipal corporation.

The Supreme Court of Illinois, in determining the liability of a drainage district of the city of Chicago to taxation upon property it owned outside the corporate limits of the city under analogous constitutional provisions (Chicago Sanitary Dist. v. Martin, supra), held that, as the legal title to the property was vested in the district, it could not be held to be property "belonging to the state."

People v. Morrill, 26 Cal. 336, defines "lands belonging to the state" as those—

"(1) Which it holds by virtue of grants from the United States; (2) those which it owns by reason of its sovereignty."

In either event, the term implies ownership, and not mere authority and control over. In view of the fact that the law of California governing irrigation districts expressly provides that "the legal title to all property acquired under the provisions of this act shall immediately and by operation of law vest in such irrigation district," it would be an elastic use of terms to hold that the interest of the state in such lands amounts to such ownership as to justify holding such property to belong to the state.

As previously pointed out, the only remaining alternative which will permit of any exemption of irrigation district property at all is to include such district, for the purposes of this section, as a "municipal corporation."

It, of course, follows that, if the general exemption clause of section 1, art. 13, of the Constitution, includes irrigation districts under the classification of "municipal corporations" the exception from such exemption of "lands and the improvements thereon located outside the county, city and county or municipal corporation owning the same" must also apply to such irrigation districts, for the term "municipal corporations" is obviously used in the same sense in both connections. But the most persuasive reason for classifying an irrigation district as a municipal corporation under this constitutional provision is that any other construction, in my opinion, defeats the very apparent purpose of the amendment.

It is doubtless true, as set forth in the argument presented to the voters on the submission of this amendment, that the inducing cause of the amendment was the acquisition of large real estate interests in the counties of Tuolumne, Mono, and Inyo for reservoir purposes by the distant cities of Los Angeles and San Francisco. These corporations happened to be governmental municipalities, but that was not the circumstance which appealed to the voters of these counties and others likely to be invaded by public power and water purveyors.

The real purpose was to prevent abuses threatened and likely to recur from permitting private lands subject to taxation in one jurisdiction to be taken over for public uses by other communities, and, by depriving the territory in which the lands are situated of the revenue from this taxation, thus throw part of the burden of such public use upon territory not benefited by it. What possible reason or justification could there be for protecting these outside jurisdictions from the incursions of towns and cities in search of water storage and distribution, and leaving them exposed to precisely the same invasion by extensive irrigation districts outside their territory? The gist of the matter clearly appears in the part of the argument for this constitutional amendment which says:

"Uncertainty on this matter should be removed by a legal assurance that, while natural resources within one county may be directly used for the upbuilding of another, lands or other property already upon the invaded county's tax roll shall continue to bear its share of maintaining the county government."

The direct object of the amendment was to protect and conserve the revenues of the invaded territory, and with that object in view it can make no difference whether the public use acquired is by a city or county, or some other public corporation exercising municipal functions.

No violence is done to the rules of construction under the interpretation of the term "municipal corporations" here contended for. It is common knowledge that in popular usage the term "municipal corporation" is understood as applying to all departments of state organization exercising public functions, and the same general use of the term is common in judicial decisions and with law text-writers.

In 19 Ruling Case Law, p. 691, it is said that "municipal" in its primary sense means "pertaining to a town or city or to its local government," but it also declares that the word "municipal" has two meanings, one of which is pertaining to the internal government of a state or nation, and in that sense every corporation formed for governmental purposes is a municipal corporation"; and, further, at page 696, it is said:

"The legislature frequently organizes the people of a certain territory into a district having certain limited powers for the carrying out of some particular public purpose. Familiar examples are school districts, * * * irrigation districts, levy districts; * * * but it has been held that such a district is a 'corporation for municipal purposes.'"

Such district organizations are very commonly referred to in the California decisions as public corporations for municipal purposes, or quasi municipal corporations. Merchants' Bank v. Escondido Irr. Dist., 144 Cal. 329, 77 Pac. 937; People v. Reclam. Dist., 117 Cal. 120, 48 Pac. 1016; Irrigation Dist. v. De Lappe, 79 Cal. 351, 21 Pac. 825; Irr. Dist. v. Williams, 76 Cal. 366, 18 Pac. 379; Hughes v. Ewing, 93 Cal. 414, 28 Pac. 1067; Perry v. Otay Irr. Dist., 127 Cal. 565, 60 Pac. 40; Jenison v. Redfield, 149 Cal. 500, 87 Pac. 62; Fogg v. Perris Irr. Dist., 154 Cal. 209, 97 Pac. 316; Healey v. Anglo-Calif. Bank, 5 Cal. App. 278, 90 Pac. 54; Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 409.

The same classification is maintained in the federal courts in the consideration of such districts under the laws of California. Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 174, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369; Tulare Irr. Dist. v. Shepard, 185 U. S. 1, 22 Sup. Ct. 531, 46 L. Ed. 773; Herring v. Modesto Irr. Dist. (C. C.) 95 Fed. 705.

In the construction of words used in a constitution a more general and inclusive definition is often recognized than in the more technical provisions of a statute or a contract. A constitution is the formulation of broad general rules of governmental policy submitted to the popular will and understanding for their adoption.

"Where a word, having a technical as well as a popular meaning, is used in a constitution, * * * the courts will accord to it its popular signification." Weill v. Kentfield, 54 Cal. 111; Miller v. Dunn, 72 Cal. 462, 465, 14 Pac. 27, 1 Am. St. Rep. 67; Towle v. Matheus, 130 Cal. 574, 577, 62 Pac. 1064; San Pedro, etc., v. Hamilton, 161 Cal. 610, 617, 119 Pac. 1077, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 686; Perrin v. Miller, 35 Cal. App. 129, 132, 169 Pac. 426.

This rule of liberal construction appears to have been applied by this court in So. Pac. Co. v. Levee Dist. No. 1, 172 Cal. 345, 156 Pac. 502, construing the use of the word "municipal" in an amendment to the state Constitution in a way which we think has a marked bearing on this case. In the amendment of the Constitution by adoption of the new section 14, art. 13, for the purpose of changing the system of taxation of corporations, it was declared that the system of taxation provided should "be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county, and municipal." Levee district No. 1 of Sutter county, being a levee district organized under the act of the Legislature for the creation of such districts, undertook to levy a tax upon property of the Southern Pacific Company within such district, and attempted to sustain the validity of such tax against the plea of this constitutional amendment, on the ground that it is a district, and not a municipality, and that the amendment does not exempt from district taxation. This court, in the case cited, while holding directly that such levee district was not a municipal corporation, decided, upon an exhaustive consideration of the purposes of the section, and the obvious intent of the constitutional amendment, that district taxes of this nature were included under the term "municipal," and says:

"It would appear to be beyond peradventure, therefore, that, when the Constitution declared that the state taxes 'shall be in lieu of all other taxes, state, county and municipal,' it used the words 'state, county and municipal,' as inclusive and descriptive, and not as designed to exempt districts from its operation. * * * "

An irrigation district probably comes nearer than any other of the subordinate public corporations of the state to meeting the technical requirements defining a municipal corporation. It has its own directors and officers, conducts its own elections, can sue and be sued in its corporate name, issues bonds, levies, collects, and disburses its own revenues, acquires and holds property, both real and personal, in its own name, and in the management of its internal affairs is entirely independent of the county and state, aside from the control of general laws.

While the courts have frequently drawn the line between public corporations of a quasi municipal character and those performing strictly municipal functions, it has usually been for the purpose of defining limitations upon the political powers of these lesser state agencies, but no reason seems to exist why the distinction should be pushed so far in this case as to exclude irrigation districts from the operation of the constitutional amendment under discussion.

PEOPLE v. CLIFTON. (Cr. 2331.)

1. Homicide ⟸238 — Evidence held not to show defendant so intoxicated as to be without appreciation of his act or ability to form a deliberate intent to kill.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence held to show that the defendant was not intoxicated to such an extent as to render him unconscious of or without appreciation of the nature of his act in so cutting deceased with a knife as to cause death and not to show him incapable of forming a deliberate intent to kill.

2. Homicide ⟸22(2), 180 — Instruction on murder requiring deliberate intent to kill, and permitting jury to consider defendant's intoxication, approved.

The jury was correctly instructed that to constitute first degree murder the unlawful killing must be accompanied by a deliberate and clear intent to kill, and that it should consider the evidence as to defendant's intoxication at the time, together with other evidence, to determine defendant's purpose or intent in committing the act.

3. Criminal law ⟸763, 764(1) — Instruction that prosecution must establish "each material fact so charged" in indictment not objectionable as meaning that indictment's allegations "are facts and true."

The claim that an instruction that every material allegation of the indictment was put in issue by the plea of not guilty, and that it devolved on the prosecution to establish to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt "each material fact so charged," was an instruction to the effect that allegations of the indictment "are facts and true," held without foundation.

4. Witnesses ⟸277(4), 380(2) — Defendant's statements shortly after homicide held admissible to discredit his testimony; defendant may be cross-examined as to all matters concerning direct examination.

In a prosecution for murder the state may fully cross-examine defendant as to all matters concerning his examination in chief under Pen. Code, § 1323, and in so doing may show by his own admissions that he has made a statement contrary to his direct examination to discredit him, so that his answers to questions soon after the homicide as to the cause of trouble between him and deceased, where not amounting to a confession of guilt, were admissible as to his credibility.

5. Criminal law ⟸786(1) — Refusing of instruction as to defendant's credibility held not error in view of the facts.

Where defendant's answers to questions as to cause of difficulty shortly after homicide were introduced to discredit his testimony in chief, an instruction that if defendant was at such time, because of intoxication, unable to understand questions or answers they should not be considered, while hardly objectionable, was not erroneously refused, where, in view of the character of answers given, it appears that witness sufficiently understood and intelligently answered questions.

6. Homicide ⟸253(1) — Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of first degree murder.

In a prosecution for first degree murder, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

David Clifton was convicted of murder in the first degree, with penalty of death, and from the judgment and order denying new trial he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Ralph W. Smith, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The defendant was convicted of murder of the first degree for the killing of one Henry Smith on April 9, 1920, and was adjudged to suffer death. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The killing was admitted, but it was claimed on the trial that it was done in lawful self-defense. In view of the record it cannot reasonably be contended that the jury was not justified in concluding otherwise and finding the defendant guilty. It is earnestly urged, however, that the evidence was not such as to justify a verdict of murder of the first degree, for want of testimony to support a conclusion of the presence of the deliberation and premeditation essential to such a verdict.

[1] While there was evidence which would strongly justify a claim before the jury that the homicide was the result of a drunken quarrel between defendant and deceased, without any element of deliberation and premeditation on the part of defendant, there was, in our opinion, sufficient evidence upon which to found a contrary conclusion. Deceased and defendant and two women, all negroes, were living in a small four-room shack, fronting on an alley between O, P, Fourth, and Fifth streets in the city of Sacramento. Apparently all were ignorant and superstitious. Deceased was living with one of these women, a Miss Fisher, and the other woman, a Miss Watson, had been an occupant of the house for only a few days. The relations between defendant and deceased had been very friendly, so far as the evidence shows, to within a couple of days of the quarrel, and defendant had originally taken up his abode in the house at the invitation of deceased. The only evidence of any trouble between them prior to the fatal quarrel was that of Miss Watson. She testified to a verbal altercation between them a day or two before with relation to the defendant carrying and using red pepper as a protection against evil spirits in and about the house, which ended in defendant drawing a knife, and being pushed out through a door by Miss Fisher. She also testified that the day before the homicide deceased accused Miss Fisher in the presence of defendant of giving defendant money and taking care of him out of his (deceased's) labor. She said that he also told Miss Fisher to make defendant leave the house, and that he would not stay there if defendant remained. She also testified that during the morning of the day of the homicide defendant sharpened his knife in her room, and, after sharpening it, said it would do the work. In none of these statements was she corroborated by other witnesses, and her evidence may well be claimed to be somewhat rambling and unconvincing. The question of her credibility was, however, a question for the jury. Later in the day defendant and deceased, both of whom had apparently been drinking previously, together with a white man called "Pat," who has never been produced as a witness, were in the dining room of this house, engaged in drinking and talking. According to defendant, a quarrel commenced between him and deceased on the question as to which of the two should go out after more liquor, and deceased attacked him with a butcher knife, but there is nothing except this testimony of defendant to suggest that deceased had a knife or was armed. The evidence was such as to fully warrant the jury in concluding that he was unarmed. No witness professes to have seen the commencement of the physical encounter. The two who say they witnessed any part of the encounter, a negro named Miller and Miss Watson, found the two grappling on the floor of the room, Miss Watson saying that defendant was on top of deceased, and that deceased was pleading with him to stop cutting him, and Miller saying that each man was on his side. According to both of the witnesses deceased was then bleeding badly. The defendant then got up and left the house, and was arrested a short time thereafter in the immediate locality, near the corner of Fifth and P streets, where he was standing against a fence. The knife, with blood upon it, was found in his pocket. Deceased, who died the same day, had received several small knife wounds, one being between the thumb and index finger of his left hand, and a mortal wound about nine inches in length across the abdomen, portions of the small intestines being severed. The case was such, assuming the reliability of Miss Watson as a witness, as to warrant a conclusion that there was some feeling of hostility between the two men, and a disposition on the part of defendant to use his knife on deceased, and also that defendant attacked deceased with his knife, deceased being unarmed, and inflicted the abdominal wound with the deliberate purpose of killing. If this wound was consciously inflicted, it is hard to account for the act upon any other theory than that it was done with the deliberate purpose of killing, for the nature of the wound was such that it was most likely to result in death. That it was consciously inflicted seems very clear, unless defendant was intoxicated to such an extent that he did not know and appreciate what he was doing. The strongest evidence in defendant's behalf is that relating to his intoxication. Unquestionably he was under the influence of liquor to some extent. All those who had anything to do with him that afternoon, including the officers, agree on this. The question in this connection is whether he was intoxicated to such an extent as to render him unconscious of or without appreciation of the nature of his act and incapable of forming a deliberate intent to kill. We are forced to the conclusion that the evidence was such as to sufficiently support a negative answer to this question.

[2] The jury was correctly instructed that to constitute murder in the first degree, the unlawful killing must be accompanied by a deliberate and clear intent to kill, and also that it was proper to consider the evidence on the subject of intoxication at the time of the act, together with all the other evidence in the case, for the purpose of determining the purpose or intent with which he committed the act. It found the existence on the part of defendant of this deliberate and clear intent. While in this respect the case may be one that may merit earnest consideration on the part of the executive upon an application for executive clemency, it is not one in which this court is authorized to reverse for want of sufficient legal evidence.

[3] The claim that an instruction that every material allegation of the indictment was put in issue by the plea of not guilty, and that it devolved upon the prosecution to establish to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt "each material fact so charged," was in substance an instruction to the effect that the allegations of the indictment "are facts and true," is, it would seem hardly necessary to say, entirely without foundation.

[4] Defendant testified as a witness in his own behalf. Among other things he testified that there had never been any trouble between himself and deceased prior to the fatal quarrel, and especially that there had never been any trouble or feeling between them with regard to the woman Fisher. He also testified that the deceased attacked him with a knife, "with a keen butcher knife," "a little keen butcher knife that was wrapped around the handle with some string," which he, defendant, knocked out of his hand. On cross-examination the foundation was properly laid with a view to his impeachment as a witness in regard to these matters by asking him if at the city jail about 2:25 p. m. of April 9, 1920 (the day of the homicide), in the presence of certain specified persons, he did not give certain answers to certain questions. The questions and answers involved were as follows:

"Q. What did the fight start over? A. God! his woman, I guess. That was the only thing it started over.

"Q. What is the woman's name? A. Miss Cora Fisher.

"Q. Dave, did you get cut anywhere? A. No, sir; not to my knowledge, no.

"Q. Henry didn't have a knife out or anything? A. Not that I know of.

"Q. Did he have a gun or anything? A. No, sir.

"Q. Did he say he was going to get a gun or anything? A. No, sir.

"Q. He didn't? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did Henry have a knife or anything in his hand? A. No, sir; I don't remember."

Defendant answered that he did not remember making any statement. In rebuttal, Mr. Vinson, the official shorthand reporter who took down the questions and answers in shorthand, testified to the giving by the defendant of these answers to such questions on the occasion specified. Objection was made to this evidence on the part of Mr. Vinson on the ground, substantially, that it was not made to appear that the statement was voluntary, or that defendant was apprised of his rights, and that his condition was such that he was not able properly to understand the questions and know the statements he was making. There was considerable testimony as to his condition with regard to being intoxicated and the extent thereof, but the evidence before the court was clearly of such a nature as to warrant the conclusion that he sufficiently understood the questions and the answers he was giving. It is contended that the court erred in admitting the evidence thus given by Mr. Vinson.

There can be no question, of course, as to right of the prosecution to fully cross-examine the defendant as to all matters concerning which he was examined in chief (section 1323, Pen. Code), and in so doing to show by his own admissions, if they could, that he had made statements contrary to those made upon his direct examination, for the purpose of throwing discredit upon them. See People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 466, 475, 35 Pac. 80; People v. Creeks, 170 Cal. 368, 379, 149 Pac. 821. It seems plain on principle that in the event of his failure to admit the making of such contrary statements, when properly questioned as to the same, proof thereof might be made by other persons who heard him make them, just as in the case of any other witness. This is certainly true if such statements do not constitute a confession of guilt of the offense for which the defendant is on trial, in which event it may be assumed for the purposes of this decision that the same would not be admissible in the absence of proof of being voluntarily made. The trial court admitted proof of the statements here involved for the purpose of impeachment, without proof of their voluntary character. But it is perfectly clear that they did not constitute a confession of guilt, within the meaning of the rule requiring such proof. The distinction between a confession of guilt and a mere admission of a fact or facts not constituting guilt of the offense in question is very fully and learnedly discussed in People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 664, 174 Pac. 892, and need not here be further discussed. These statements, being mere admissions of material facts not amounting to a confession of guilt, were also admissible as such altogether regardless of any question of impeachment. See People v. Sexton, 132 Cal. 37, 39, 64 Pac. 107. As we have said, the evidence was clearly sufficient to warrant the conclusion of the trial court that he was not so incapacitated by intoxication that he did not sufficiently understand the questions asked and the answers he gave.

[5] It is argued that the trial court erred in refusing to give an instruction, requested by defendant—

"That before you can consider the statement made by the defendant at the city jail on April 9, 1920, in reply to questions of Mr. Hughes * * * in the presence of the police officers and Mr. Vinson, the reporter, or any part thereof, the evidence must show to your satisfaction that the accused, David Clifton, was at the time of the making of the statement in possession of his mental faculties, and was so possessed to understand the questions which he answered. Should you find that the defendant was not so possessed of his faculties by reason of his having been drinking liquor, or any other cause, then you are to disregard the evidence as to those portions of the statement concerning which defendant was examined on the witness stand, and which have been admitted in evidence."

As an abstract statement of law we see no very good objection to this instruction, and, in view of the evidence as to some intoxication on the part of the defendant, it might well have been given. However, one of the grounds upon which the learned judge declined to give it was that "there is not sufficient evidence, if any, on which to produce such an instruction," and it is true that there is no affirmative evidence in the record tending to show lack of understanding on the part of defendant of the purport of the questions and his answers. The answers of the defendant were responsive to the questions, and indicated comprehension of the subject of inquiry. In view of the character of the answers given it is difficult to imagine that defendant did not fully understand both questions and answers. Every witness who testified regarding the matter testified that, although the defendant was somewhat under the influence of liquor, he apparently sufficiently understood and intelligently answered the questions. Under the circumstances we think it cannot be held that the trial judge erred in refusing the instruction for the reason above stated, and on which, among others, he founded his refusal.

[6] No other point is made for reversal, and careful consideration of the record shows nothing in the way of substantial error in the proceedings in the trial court. Defendant had a fair trial, and there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SAN FRANCISCO BAR ASS'N v. OPPENHEIM. (Cr. 2350.)

1. Evidence ⊜317(2)—Hearsay testimony by clerk as to what was said by defendant judge sought to be disbarred inadmissible.

In proceedings to disbar an attorney holding office of police justice, for misconduct relative to admitting to bail one charged with homicide, testimony as to what the clerk of court said that defendant judge said was inadmissible to show the making of an order or statement by defendant judge.

2. Attorney and client ⊜53(2)—Evidence insufficient to warrant finding police judge guilty of misconduct relative to admitting to bail.

In proceedings to disbar a police judge for misconduct relative to admitting to bail one charged with homicide, evidence held insufficient to warrant the court in finding defendant judge guilty.

3. Attorney and client ⊜53(2)—Evidence insufficient to show police judge guilty of bribe taking.

In proceedings to disbar a police judge for misconduct in receiving a bribe on a corrupt understanding that he should be corruptly influenced in the decision of certain criminal cases, the allegation being that he discharged the defendants in each of such cases, evidence held insufficient to sustain such charges.

Lawlor, Olney, and Sloane, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by the San Francisco Bar Association for disbarment of Morris Oppenheim. Order to show cause discharged, and proceeding dismissed.

John O'Gara, J. J. Webb, and Max Kuhl, all of San Francisco, for accusers.

Thos. B. Dozier and A. S. Newburgh, both of San Francisco, for accused.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding instituted in this court for the disbarment of Morris Oppenheim, an attorney and counselor, for conduct involving moral turpitude. Defendant was at all the times mentioned in the accusation one of the police judges of the city and county of San Francisco, and, as in the case of John J. Sullivan (Crim. No. 2347, decided May 5, 1921) 198 Pac. 7, all the charges against him are for acts and conduct on his part with relation to matters coming before him as such police judge. Three separate specific charges against the accused are made by the accusation. The accused denied the truth of each charge. By order of the court, the evidence in support of and against the charges was taken by the chief justice, and the transcript of the evidence taken has received full consideration at the hands of each member of the court.

The charges are of the same general nature as those made against John J. Sullivan in the proceeding referred to above. In the opinion in that matter we sufficiently discussed the rules of law applicable, and it is not necessary to repeat that discussion here. In this matter, as in the Sullivan Case, the only direct evidence of guilt of the accused of any of the specific offenses charged is that of C. Vincent Riccardi, whose credibility as a witness is fully discussed in the opinion in that case. It is unnecessary to repeat that discussion here, further than to say, as we substantially said there, that we can accept his testimony as true only in so far as it is substantially corroborated by other evidence. We had occasion in the Sullivan Case to discuss the business of Peter P. McDonough and the intimate relations existing between him and the accused therein. The same sort of intimacy existed between him and the accused here, and all that is said in the opinion in that case about these matters is equally applicable here.

The specific charge mainly relied on is the first in order in the accusation, being with relation to the conduct of the accused in a matter pending before him as a committing magistrate, in which one George Imperiale was charged with the crime of manslaughter. The charge is that while this matter was so pending before him, the accused entered into a conspiracy and agreement with one Peter P. McDonough wherein and whereby it was understood and agreed that accused, as police judge, should make such orders in regard to the bail of Imperiale that the latter would be induced to discharge his then attorney, one John V. Filippini, and employ in his place C. Vincent Riccardi, and also to pay for attorney fees and his release from custody and for the dismissal of the case $500, of which sum McDonough was to receive a part; that, in pursuance of such corrupt agreement, accused, on April 24, 1919, first made an order fixing the bail at $5,000 bond or $2,500 cash, and subsequently on the same day made an order holding Imperiale without bail, thus inducing Imperiale to discharge Filippini from his employment and to employ Riccardi in his place, and that then accused made a third order, fixing the bail at $1,000, which amount was furnished by McDonough, and Imperiale thereupon released; and that on or about May 23, 1919, the case was finally dismissed; and that the sum of $500 was paid by Imperiale for attorney fees and for his release, and for the dismissal of the case, of which sum McDonough received $200. There is no claim either in the accusation or the evidence that accused was to receive or did receive any money in this matter.

Imperiale, who was engaged in the business of running an auto stage or truck, had in operating his car, run into and killed a child. The charge of manslaughter was based upon his alleged negligence in this matter. In so far as the dismissal of the charge by accused is concerned, it is not claimed that the accused was not fully justified in his action by the facts. No effort was made by the accuser to show what an investigation of the facts disclosed. Mr. George B. Keane, an attorney employed by the parents of the dead child, testified that he fully investigated the facts, and concluded that there was no case against Imperiale. It is undisputed that in open court he so stated to the accused judge and asked that the matter be dismissed. In so far as the record shows, there was no probable cause shown for believing Imperiale to be guilty of the crime with which he was charged, and the dismissal was proper.

It is solely in connection with the matter of the bail of Imperiale that anything improper appears. Imperiale, an ignorant foreigner, was in custody on the charge of manslaughter, having been arrested the night before. Riccardi had such information as to lead him to the conclusion that he had some property and sufficient resources to enable him to pay a large amount of money to gain his liberty. Here was a fertile field for development in the eyes of Riccardi. An intervening obstacle to such development was the presence in the case of Mr. John V. Filippini as the attorney of Imperiale. Mr. Filippini was an attorney at law of good repute, without much police court or criminal practice experience, who as a lawyer had previously done some business for Imperiale and had his confidence. In consequence of this he had been engaged to appear for him in this matter, and was, with Mrs. Imperiale, in and about the hall of justice and the courtroom of accused on the morning of April 24th, when Imperiale was first brought into court to answer to the charge, engaged in an effort to obtain the release of Imperiale on bail. It was considered by Riccardi to be necessary to exclude Filippini from the case and to obtain his own employment in his place. The plan adopted to accomplish this was to bring Imperiale and his wife and Filippini to a conclusion that Filippini could not obtain an order for such release on bail, or other favorable action in the case, and that Riccardi could obtain his release at once and eventually a dismissal of the case.

There can be no doubt that Imperiale and his wife and Filippini were prevailed upon to believe that Filippini could do nothing for Imperiale in that court, and that with the assent of Imperiale, Filippini withdrew from the case, and Riccardi took charge. Except for the continued representations and insinuations by Riccardi as to his ability to accomplish results and the lack of knowledge of Filippini as to how things must be done in order to obtain favorable results in that court, the potent consideration leading the parties to the conclusion that Filippini could do nothing was certain information given them as to an alleged change made by the accused in the matter of the bail. It is the alleged willful participation by the accused with Riccardi in this matter, as well as in the original fixing of bail, that is mainly relied on by the accuser.

Riccardi's story is, in brief, substantially as follows: All his dealings in the matter were with McDonough, and at no time did he speak to the accused about the case. Before court convened on the morning of April 24, 1919, he went to McDonough's place of business and acquainted him with the prospect of mutual gain in the Imperiale case in the event that he was employed as attorney in place of Filippini. McDonough agreed to help and Riccardi divulged his plan, which was to have the judge fix the bail at so high a figure as to make it impossible for Filippini to obtain it. McDonough said he would communicate with the judge at once. Riccardi went back to the courtroom, arriving there before court was convened. After the accused took his place on the bench for the disposition of the business of the day's calendar, application was made by Filippini for the fixing of bail in the Imperiale case. The judge fixed it at $5,000 bond or $2,500 cash. Filippini left the courtroom saying that he would endeavor to obtain it. Riccardi thereupon went to McDonough again and told him that Filippini would probably get the required bond and suggested that he have the accused raise the bail or refuse bail altogether. McDonough said he would do this. Riccardi went back to the courtroom a little later. Court had adjourned and the accused had left the courtroom. Imperiale and the other prisoners were still in the dock in the courtroom. He (Riccardi) says that he was informed by the clerk of the court that an order of "no bail" had been made. It was at this stage that Filippini withdrew from the case and Riccardi became attorney for Imperiale. He then went back to McDonough's place of business, in company with Mrs. Imperiale, and sought an order fixing the bail at $1,000 cash. McDonough went into a back room and came back with such an order signed by the accused. He heard the voice of accused speaking in such back room. He procured $1,000 from McDonough to deposit with the bond and warrant clerk, and went to the office of such clerk with the money and the order fixing bail, there deposited the money and the order, and received an order directed to the prison keeper at the city prison for the release of Imperiale. He went back to the courtroom with this order, and showed it to Filippini who was still there. The prisoner had in the meantime been taken to the city prison. The order for release was taken to the city prison and delivered to the officer in charge, and Imperiale was discharged from custody at 11:55 a. m.

This story is absolutely uncorroborated in so far as any competent evidence directly implicating the accused is concerned. Moreover, in certain essential details it is opposed, in our opinion, to a clear preponderance of the testimony, altogether regardless of the denials under oath of both accused and McDonough. The latter denies that he had anything whatever to do with the case, beyond furnishing on application, in the course of his business, the money to be deposited as bail, and says he never communicated with the accused in relation to the case. The accused testified that McDonough never communicated with him about the case, and denied that he ever made any "no bail order" or said anything about such an order to any one. He further testified that having first fixed the cash bail at $2,500 on the statement of the arresting officer, he reduced it to $1,000, before leaving the courtroom; his best recollection being that he so reduced it on the application of Mr. N. C. Coghlan, who came into the case by arrangement with Riccardi.

In so far as appears, except for Riccardi's testimony there is nothing to suggest even a suspicion of wrongdoing in the matter of the original fixing of bail. When the application was made by Mr. Filippini, the accused said he would have to wait for the arresting officer's statement. When the officer arrived, he told the accused that the case was a serious one of deliberately running down a little boy and killing him. He also said something about previous negligent driving by Imperiale. The accused then made the order, and when Filippini protested and said it should be reduced to $1,000, somewhat impatiently said the order had been made and would stand. This is, in substance, the testimony of Mr. Filippini. To us, in view of the seriousness of the charge and the statement of the arresting officer, the amount so fixed does not appear excessive, certainly not so excessive as to suggest improper motive. Much is made of the fact that on cross-examination the accused could not remember ever having fixed so high an amount of bail in a case of involuntary manslaughter, and that he admitted that in the ordinary case of this character, where generally the party charged was the employee of some person of known responsibility, the bail was fixed at a sum which appears to us absurdly low. But here it is not disputed that neither Mr. Filippini nor Imperiale was known to the accused, and, according to Mr. Filippini's testimony, the officer's statement was such as to make the matter seem very serious in so far as the defendant therein was concerned.

[1] As to the alleged subsequent order of "no bail" there is no competent evidence whatever. Of course, such an order would be absolutely without warrant in law in any but a capital case, and if there were any competent evidence showing the making of such an order by accused, or the willful doing of anything for the purpose of making Filippini believe that such an order had been made, it would constitute most substantial corroboration of Riccardi's story. There is no record of any such order, and no one testified to having heard the accused make either any such order or any statement designed to convey the idea that such an order had been or would be made. The only possible foundation for any claim that the accused made any such order or statement is a statement made by the clerk of the court (since deceased) to Mr. Filippini, when, in company with Riccardi and Mrs. Imperiale, he returned to the courtroom after court had adjourned and the judge had departed, and while the matter of his withdrawal was still unsettled. Mr. Filippini testified substantially that the clerk then informed him that the accused had made an order of "no bail," which was "the last straw," and it was at once concluded that he could do nothing for Imperiale, and he withdrew. We have no doubt of the truth of Mr. Filippini's testimony, and must accept it as an established fact in the case that the clerk of the court so stated to him. In view of certain insinuations in the course of the proceeding before us as to his attitude and testimony, we feel that it is due him to say that in our opinion there was nothing in his conduct in this very disagreeable episode in his professional career to reflect unfavorably in the slightest degree upon his character, and that his testimony throughout appears to us to be that of a fair and intelligent witness, sincerely endeavoring to state the whole truth. This statement, however, of the clerk to Filippini, and as Riccardi claims, to him, was admitted solely for the purpose of showing the influences directly used upon Filippini and Imperiale to bring about Filippini's withdrawal. Of course as against the accused, this testimony as to what the clerk said that the accused said was incompetent to show that the accused in fact said it, and objection was duly made to its being considered for any such purpose. Unfortunately the clerk died without having testified in any of the investigations relative to the matter before us. We have no disposition to needlessly say anything unfavorably reflecting upon his memory, especially in view of his inability to reiterate, explain, or deny, but it is obvious that he may have made this statement to Filippini without having any direction or information from the accused, and for the very purpose of assisting Riccardi in his effort to obtain Filippini's withdrawal. As the case now stands before us, such a theory is as probable as the theory implicating the accused. Strange as it may seem, the undisputed evidence is that the clerk of this court kept no record of orders relative to bail, and was not expected to keep any such record, even though the same were made in open court. If this be true there was no occasion for the judge to acquaint him with the fact of any such order. Then, too, the discussion hereinafter contained as to the proof relative to the final order fixing the bail at $1,000 indicates that such order was made before the judge left the courtroom. Regardless of all this, however, under most elementary rules, evidence of this statement of the clerk was inadmissible to show the making of an order or statement by the accused.

[2] It is, however, in respect to the final order on bail, the order fixing the bail at $1,000 cash, that the story of Riccardi is opposed to the clear preponderance of the evidence. This was the order said by him to be made after Filippini's withdrawal and his own employment, and because of such change in attorneys. It is the testimony of all that this change in attorneys was not consented to until after court had adjourned for the day and the accused had left the courtroom. To obtain a reduction of the bail at that stage, it is admitted that it was essential to obtain an order fixing the bail at the reduced sum, signed by the judge, which, when deposited in the office of the bond and warrant clerk with the amount of bail so fixed, would authorize that officer to issue an order of release. Such an order, we have seen, Riccardi testified he obtained at McDonough's place of business. No such order has been produced. Furthermore, no one, except Riccardi, testified that he ever saw any such order. Mrs. Imperiale, who accompanied Riccardi to McDonough's place of business, would not testify that she saw or was told of any such order. In passing it may be said that Riccardi's visit to McDonough's place at this stage is entirely explainable upon the theory that it was for the purpose of securing the $1,000 to deposit as cash bail. Filippini testified that he was not shown any such order. There is absolutely no scrap of affirmative evidence, except that given by Riccardi, to the effect that any such signed order ever was in existence. And in so far as the official record evidence goes it is opposed to the theory that there was any signed order fixing bail, and also opposed to the theory that the reduction to $1,000 was made after the adjournment of court, and Filippini's withdrawal from the case. The uncontradicted evidence of many witnesses is to the effect that there was a difference in the form of the order of release issued by the bond and warrant clerk, between those issued when the amount of bail was evidenced by a signed order of the judge, filed in such office, and those issued when there was no such order and it was stated at the office by the party depositing the bail that the amount had been fixed in open court, without a signed order. In the latter class it was the uniform custom to accept the statement of the party as to the amount and to issue the order of release specifying the amount of the deposit, in view of the fact that the prison record showed the amount fixed in open court, if it was so fixed without a signed order, and if the fact of an order in accord with the representation stated and shown in the order of release did not appear in the prison record, the order of release would not be honored. If, however, there was a signed order fixing bail, which might be made out of as well as in court, and of which, consequently, there would be no prison record, it was the uniform custom to stamp with a rubber stamp, in one corner of the order of release, the words "This bail has been fixed at above sum by order of ———, judge of police court, No. ———," filling in the blanks with the name of the judge and the number of his department. The order of release in this case was produced in evidence, and is without these stamped words, showing, therefore, if the uniform custom was followed, as we may assume, that it was issued upon the representation to the bond and warrant clerk that an order had been made in open court, and that it was not issued upon an order signed by the accused.

In addition to this we have the city prison register in evidence, together with the testimony of Officer Norman, a prison keeper, who himself made the entry of $1,000 in the appropriate column thereof relative to Imperiale on that day from the sheet returned to him by the court bailiff with the prisoners still in custody, including Imperiale, when such bailiff returned such prisoners to the city prison after the adjournment of court. These prisoners had been so returned when Riccardi went back into the courtroom, after his visit to McDonough's office to obtain, as he said, the order fixing bail. The testimony of Officer Norman was clear and convincing, and, with his entry in the register, shows that when Imperiale was returned to the city prison that day, the court sheet returned with him showed a notation by the bailiff of the fact of his admission to bail in the sum of $1,000 cash. Officer Bates, the bailiff of the court, testified that he heard the accused first fix the bail at $2,500 cash, and that later, before leaving the bench, he told him to make the bail $1,000 cash. He further testified that he saw Mr. Coghlan go up to the bench and speak to the judge before this reduction. In consequence of this direction, in making notes on his daily list of prisoners at the close of court, he made a note of the fact that the bail had been so fixed, and it was this sheet returned to the prison with the prisoners from which the prison record was made. This notation, so far as appears, was the only record made of any order fixing bail in the Imperiale case. It is difficult to understand the reason for the looseness of the practice apparently prevailing in this department in the matter of bail orders made in open court, a practice entirely without sanction in law, but the evidence is undisputed that such "orders" were frequently made by orally notifying the bailiff of the amount, and the bailiff was expected to make the record thereof by noting the amount on his daily sheet, for delivery to the prison authorities. The judge sometimes made a note on his personal docket and sometimes made no note. In this matter no entry at all appears on his docket. He explains this by saying that he made his entries for the information of the bailiff in filling out his sheet for the prison authorities, and that if the bailiff was personally notified by him there was no necessity for such an entry. Mr. Coghlan has a very dim recollection that while court was in session that morning he, as an attorney acting on behalf of Imperiale, requested a reduction of bail to $1,000, but his recollection is confessedly so dim as not to assist materially. Just what prompted the reduction of $2,500, to $1,000, by the accused does not satisfactorily appear to us, except that there is nothing to our minds satisfactorily establishing any improper influence operating on the accused in so doing, but the clear preponderance of evidence, excluding altogether from consideration the testimony of the accused and McDonough, and accepting, as we do, everything testified to by Mr. Filippini to be true, is to the effect that there was no signed order fixing bail, and that the final order fixing bail at $1,000 cash was made before the judge left the courtroom and before Filippini had withdrawn from the case. This being the situation, the case necessarily fails for want of proof in so far as the accused is concerned, both as to the theory of a no-bail order for the purpose of accomplishing the withdrawal of Filippini, and the reduction to $1,000, as soon as Riccardi was employed. It is suggested that there was an admission of wrongdoing on the part of accused in an interview between him and Riccardi in the presence of certain newspaper men, but we do not so construe the conduct and words of the accused, as testified to by Mr. Warner, one of the newspaper men. We have discussed the evidence in relation to this specific charge at considerable length in view of the fact that it is the charge mainly relied on. We are satisfied that it may not fairly be held that the charge is sufficiently sustained by proof to warrant us in finding the accused guilty thereon.

[3] The two remaining charges are that accused in each of two matters pending before him as a committing magistrate, one being the case of L. Ysussi, charged with assault with intent to commit murder, and the other being the case of G. Pasquale, charged with assault with intent to commit rape, agreed to receive, and did receive, a bribe of $100 from Peter P. McDonough upon the corrupt understanding and agreement that he should thereby be corruptly and unlawfully influenced in the decision of the case, and that he was thereby corruptly and unlawfully influenced to dismiss and did dismiss each of said cases corruptly and unlawfully. As to both these charges the only direct evidence of guilt on the part of accused is that of Riccardi, the attorney for the defendant in each case. He testified as to an arrangement in each case with McDonough, to whom he agreed to pay $100 to obtain a dismissal. He said substantially that McDonough said the amount was so small he would give it all to the judge. The cases were dismissed on different dates. Upon the dismissal of each case he paid the stipulated $100 to McDonough in his place of business. Accused was present on each occasion. As each payment was made McDonough delivered the money to the accused, who accepted it. So runs Riccardi's story. It is absolutely denied in all respects by both accused and McDonough. There is no such corroboration of Riccardi's evidence to be found in the record of these matters before the accused and his conduct as a magistrate with relation thereto, which was the only corroboration attempted, as in any degree to add to the weight of such evidence in so far as it purported to sustain the specific charge made. As to the Pasquale case, the assistant district attorney, Mr. W. P. Caubu, testified substantially that he stated to accused in open court that it was not a proper case for holding for trial in the superior court and consented to a dismissal, and a reading of the evidence introduced before the accused does not satisfy us that he was in error in so recommending. The evidence in the Ysussi case was not such as to make it clear to us that the defendant should have been held for trial. As to each of these specific charges we have, in the last analysis, only Riccardi's uncorroborated story, and it produces no measure of conviction in our minds. Therefore, each of these charges must fail in this judicial proceeding for want of proof.

We desire to say that we fully appreciate the motive of the bar association in instituting this prosecution, as well as that in the Sullivan Case, and the courteous and able assistance given us on the trials by the committee conducting it. We are fully aware that nothing but a most commendable desire to rid the bar of members believed by the members of the association to be unworthy prompted the making of the charges, and it may well be that their reasons for their belief were well based. But certainly charges of specific misconduct on the part of a member of the bar can be sustained by a court only upon satisfactory proof of the particular misconduct alleged, and that proof is, to our minds, wanting here.

The order to show cause is discharged and the proceeding dismissed.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. According to the evidence of the accuser, Riccardi, in the corridor before court convened, was told by the officer who made the arrest about Imperiale and his owning three Pierce-Arrow automobiles. Riccardi scented the chance to work the system, so he immediately went to McDonough's and, upon a promise to share the fruits of the enterprise with him, enlisted his co-operation. Riccardi then went to the courtroom, where he was a witness of the proceedings. When the accused came on the bench the case was called, but the determination of Mr. Filippini's application for bail was deferred until the officer appeared. The statement of the officer that it was a serious case, which was accepted by the accused and the order of bail of $5,000 bonds or $2,500 cash, followed. Mr. Filippini took issue with the statement of the officer and addressing the court stated he had known the defendant, that he was a responsible man, and applied for lower bail. The accused, in a loud voice, answered, "that is the order." Mr. Filippini replied, "Very well, if that is the case I will see if I can raise it." Riccardi promptly returned to McDonough and informed him that Mr. Filippini was going to secure bail, and said McDonough had better send word to the judge to order higher bail, or no bail. This McDonough promised to do. A man at once left McDonough's office to go to the courtroom and Riccardi followed him. When Riccardi reached the court room he observed McDonough's man speak to the accused at the bench, and presently, as the accused was leaving the courtroom, he stopped to speak to clerk Kane. Neither of these conversations was heard by Riccardi. Riccardi next proceeded to try to get the case. He first had a conversation with Mrs. Imperiale outside the courtroom, the gist of which was that for $500 he would secure bail and Imperiale's release in ten or fifteen minutes; he also promised a dismissal of the case without a trial on the merits. As Mr. Filippini reached the sidewalk to take his automobile, Mrs. Imperiale came running up to tell him about what Riccardi, a man she did not know, had said to her. They went back into the building, met Riccardi, and after some talk near the telephone booth the trio entered the courtroom. The Riccardi proposal was taken up and discussed with Imperiale, who was in the dock. Mr. Sapala, Mrs. Imperiale's brother-in-law, was in the party. While this conversation was in progress, clerk Kane interrupted Mr. Filippini, whom he knew, and said to him:

"Mr. Filippini, by the way, you recollect in that Imperiale case this morning—the court has made a no bail order. 'Is that so,' I said, 'This is worse and more of it.'"

Mr. Filippini then told Imperiale he did not want anything to do with Riccardi "because he has a different system of handling cases in this court than I have," and left Imperiale to decide between them. Mr. Filippini finally said:

"Well, now, I will not have anything further to do with the case. Now you will have to take Mr. Riccardi. It is worse and more of it now. I will not have anything more to do with it."

The retirement of Mr. Filippini and the employment of Riccardi followed. Riccardi, accompanied by Mrs. Imperiale and Mr. Sapala, then went to the office of McDonough. Riccardi entered a rear room where McDonough joined him; Mrs. Imperiale and Mr. Sapala remaining in the waiting room. In the conversation between Riccardi and McDonough the former proposed that the bail be fixed at $1,000. McDonough went into another room and Riccardi states that while McDonough was in there he heard the voice of the judge. McDonough returned with a bail order of $1,000 signed by the accused, which he gave to Riccardi, together with $1,000 in currency. As Riccardi passed out he delivered an eulogium upon his own cleverness and told Mrs. Imperiale to go to his office. He took the bail order and the currency to the office of the warrant and bond clerk, received a signed order of discharge and returned to the courtroom to have Imperiale released, but he found Imperiale had been taken back to the city prison. The order of release was exhibited to Mr. Filippini, who had remained to witness the outcome of the bail matter, and the city prison records show that Imperiale was discharged from custody at 11:55 a. m.

The ultimate question to be decided is whether Riccardi's testimony is sufficiently corroborated to warrant an inference that the accused was a guilty participant in the scheme to eliminate Mr. Filippini from the case and fleece Imperiale out of $500.

From my own analysis of the evidence I am convinced it is shown not only that the accused had a hand in victimizing Imperiale, but that the fraud could not have succeeded without his co-operation. Riccardi, like a bird of prey, was waiting in the hall of justice for something to turn up, especially among his own countrymen. He testified he did not knew Imperiale. Somebody having knowledge of the case, therefore, must have told him about it and that Imperiale had property. It is not suggested how he got the information, if it was not from the officer. The officer said he had known Riccardi slightly for three years, that Riccardi first broached the subject, asking him if Imperiale was charged with manslaughter. It is conceded Imperiale was not to blame for the death of the child, and the question arises: Why did the arresting officer report to the accused it was a serious case? Did the accused know about the charge against Imperiale when he convened court? It was the custom of the accused, according to his own testimony, to reach the neighborhood of the hall of justice half an hour before court time. He admitted that on such occasions he sometimes conversed with McDonough at or in front of his place of business about cases that came before him, but he made the same qualification as did the accused in the Sullivan disbarment proceeding—they never mentioned felony cases. I shall not repeat what I said in that case about McDonough's activities in the police courts as a professional bail-bond broker and his relationship with Sullivan, for the majority opinion states the same conditions prevailed between the accused and McDonough. I am sure no member of this court doubts that McDonough would speak to the accused about any case before him if he had any interest in it, and it is idle to think he did not speak to him about the Imperiale case. The accused and McDonough deny they saw each other that morning, or that the case was ever mentioned between them. In regard to what is said in the main opinion about the amount of the bail fixed by the accused, it is proper to point out that the question is not what would be proper bail in a manslaughter case, but rather whether the accused in this particular manslaughter case departed from his usual standards in such cases. If he did, it is a circumstance against him, independent of what would be proper bail. I think the accused showed every evidence of having an unusual interest in the case. He adopted completely the appraisal of the arresting officer without asking for or receiving the testimony of Imperiale or his witnesses as to the facts of the charge, and when Mr. Filippini explained his relationship with and knowledge of the character of the defendant, he sustained the order of bail with a warmth wholly unaccountable upon any theory of judicial balance. His demeanor and action were well calculated to inspire the defendant and his distracted wife with fear and apprehension, and to render them the more susceptible to Riccardi's devices. It must be kept in view that no record was made by either the accused in his docket or the clerk in his minutes, or the bailiff on his sheet, of this bail order, a circumstance not depending on Riccardi's testimony and which tends to justify an inference that the original order was only pretended to be made to help the scheme along. Such an entry might be evidence against him. I do not agree with the prevailing opinion that there was not even a suspicion of wrongdoing in the original fixing of bail. However, the solution of the first fixing of bail must depend in part upon what followed, and when all the evidence is considered no doubt will remain that it was a part of the plan to drive Mr. Filippini out of the case and make way for Riccardi.

With regard to the statement of clerk Kane to Mr. Filippini that the court made a "no bail" order: The testimony of Mr. Filippini is sufficient to prove it was made to him, and to corroborate Riccardi's testimony on the point, notwithstanding the bailiff testified that while he was in close proximity to clerk Kane at the time he did not hear the conversation. I do not agree with the majority opinion that it is as probable clerk Kane made the statement to assist Riccardi as it is that it implicated the accused. To my mind, the more natural inference, and the one more in keeping with the presumption of innocence and a regard for the memory of the deceased clerk, is that he acted upon the direction of the judge of the court. The presumption would be that the clerk regularly performed his duty and obeyed his superior officer. However, if the presumption of innocence is applied to the accused, is it likely the clerk would take the risk of making an unauthorized statement with the liability of exposure when Mr. Filippini became aware such an order was without warrant of law? The fact the "no bail" order did not appear in the judge's docket does not help the case of the accused for the reason that the original order of bail was not entered therein. With respect to the failure to produce the "no bail" order I shall later refer to the method of transacting business in that department and the practice of ignoring the plain provisions of the law. I concur with the majority opinion that the statement itself is only admissible for the limited purpose of showing its effect on Mr. Filippini and the Imperiales. The fact, however, that the accused, after McDonough's man had spoken to him at the bench, stepped over to the clerk's desk to speak to him, is substantive evidence against the accused in the chain of circumstances relied upon by the accuser, to be given such weight as each justice may deem it entitled.

Now as to the final order of bail: It will not be questioned that if the accused only pretended to make the original order of bail it would follow that McDonough also dictated the final order. The two events stand or fall together. The accused knew that Mr. Filippini had left the courtroom to raise the original bail and that he made no report to the court. It is not disputed the final order was made without any reference to this circumstance. Furthermore, it is plain the Imperiales and Mr. Filippini when they learned of the no bail order despaired of securing bail except through the medium of Riccardi, for the substitution of attorneys immediately followed. It is clear that if Riccardi was not responsible for McDonough having the final order made it must have been made without regard to Mr. Filippini and the Imperiales, for, as I have shown, the accused had curtly denied the application for lower bail and Mr. Filippini had left the courtroom to secure bail on the original order.

This brings me to a consideration of the affirmative defense interposed by the accused, in addition to the denials of himself and McDonough, that the Imperiale case had ever been mentioned between them. It was not claimed that Riccardi had ever mentioned the subject to the accused and McDonough testified that Riccardi never spoke a word to him about bail in the Imperiale case. The testimony of the accused was that before he left the bench on that morning, on the application of Mr. Coghlan, the final order of bail was made. McDonough supplemented his above denial with the admission that Riccardi did come to his office on that morning, accompanied by Mrs. Imperiale and Mr. Sapala, and that Riccardi merely said they were waiting for Mr. Coghlan. McDonough also testified that Mr. Coghlan applied to him for $1,000 for bail in the Imperiale case and that he gave it to him. Mr. Coghlan was called as a witness to support the defense, but his testimony is so intrinsically indefinite that it would not support a finding that he had anything to do with procuring bail for Imperiale. For instance: If Mr. Coghlan figured in the matter of bail he must have done so during the forenoon of April 24th. The record shows the following:

"Q. What time of the day was it? I mean as to before or after noon. A. It was in the afternoon."

In other connections in his testimony the time is given as "in the forenoon," and in one instance the expression "in the morning, of course," was used. His testimony as to his applying to the accused for the bail order is, if anything, less definite. He admitted he did not know the time when, or the place where, he made the application, except that the court "would be naturally the place where it occurred." He admitted that he appeared in the trial of a case in the superior court the same morning and names the case and the department in which it was tried, but every effort failed to get him to make a definite statement as to the circumstances under which he came to ask for bail, when he asked for it, or what he did with the bail money when he got it. It is difficult to understand why, if there is any foundation for his testimony, he could not recall the circumstances under which he applied for the order and secured the money from McDonough, for it is conceded that as Riccardi contemplated an early visit to the eastern states he employed him to try the Imperiale case; that the bail was put in his name; and that he represented Imperiale during the absence of Riccardi until May 23d, when the charge was dismissed, at which time $250 was paid to him by Mr. Filippini. Moreover, the relations between Riccardi and Mr. Coghlan were of an intimate character, for at that time he was representing Riccardi personally in a criminal action and had been associated with him in other professional employment. Every reason is seen why he should be able to recall the circumstances, especially as it appears that he testified in a grand jury investigation of the Imperiale case about a year before he gave testimony in this proceeding. He does not even intimate that he gave the bail to the warrant and bond clerk, or that he had anything to do with the issuance of the order of release, or its presentation at the city prison. I am satisfied from the evidence that he never had anything to do with the matter of obtaining the order or securing the $1,000 bail money; that it was an invention pure and simple, and that he was brought into the proceeding to save the accused and McDonough, with whom for years he has been on terms of friendship. If Riccardi's testimony is entirely left out of view, and the transaction as it is revealed in the testimony of Mrs. Imperiale and Mr. Filippini is considered, this affirmative defense cannot stand. It throws out of balance every other circumstance in the case. Mr. Coghlan does not claim he spoke to either of the Imperiales or Mr. Filippini at that time, and the accused admits he did not mention to him that Mr. Filippini was representing Imperiale and had left the courtroom to get bail. The truth doubtless is that pressing Mr. Coghlan into service in this proceeding came as an afterthought. It appears that his connection with the Imperiale case got into the newspapers during the grand jury investigation; that one day in February, 1920, when he came home at 1 o'clock in the morning, the accused and McDonough were waiting for him in front of his house; and that the following Sunday he visited Riccardi at Los Gatos. He denies, however, that this visit had anything to do with the investigation. It is equally clear to me that the accused put Mr. Coghlan forward because of his conceded connection with the Imperiale case in the expectation that his testimony would refute Riccardi's story, minimize the effect of the testimony of Mr. Filippini and Mrs. Imperiale, and, upon the entire evidence, inject a doubt into the case.

But if the testimony of Mr. Coghlan lacked definiteness, that of the accused and McDonough is not open to the same comment, for it is plain they have not hesitated in their testimony to state that the bail was effected through Mr. Coghlan. Unquestionably this testimony is willfully false and furnishes corroboration of the story told by Riccardi. Innocent men do not commit perjury, nor seek to induce others to do so, and under a familiar rule of evidence their entire testimony should be distrusted. So far as their testimony is concerned, that of Riccardi should stand as undenied. It is worthy of note that when the accused was examined by the grand jury he made no reference to Mr. Coghlan making application for bail. The bailiff of the court testified that he saw Mr. Coghlan approach the accused while he was on the bench that morning and speak to him. On cross-examination he stated that within a few minutes after Mr. Coghlan left the accused told him to make the bail $1,000.

"Q. At that time did you connect Mr. Coghlan with the reduction of the bail? A. I did not at that time, but I did very soon afterwards. Q. How soon afterwards? A. Well, I saw Mr. Coghlan in the case and then when the case came up there was a question of bail. I always did believe—I don't know—that Mr. Coghlan had that bail fixed. * * * I believe it. I don't know it."

His attention was called to his testimony before the grand jury that he answered, "Not that I know of," when he was asked if any one else made application for a reduction of bail after the first order was made; also, that he answered, "I would not," when he was asked if he would know the man who asked to reduce the bail.

"The Court: You testified that way before the grand jury? A. I did. Q. Mr. Webb wanted to know why you didn't tell them that you knew it was Mr. Coghlan? A. I didn't know it was Mr. Coghlan and don't know it now."

The main opinion does not discuss this affirmative defense, as such. It does, however, suggest that Riccardi going to McDonough's when he claimed he obtained the bail order signed by the accused "is entirely explainable upon the theory that it was for the purpose of securing the $1,000 to deposit as cash bail." This is at once a concession that Riccardi and not Mr. Coghlan got the bail from McDonough, and that Riccardi deposited it. In connection with the accused's testimony that he reduced the bail to $1,000 before leaving the courtroom, it is stated "his best recollection being that he reduced it on the application of Mr. N. C. Coghlan, who came into the case by arrangement with Riccardi." The only reference in the opinion to Mr. Coghlan's testimony is that he "has a very dim recollection that while court was in session that morning, he, as attorney acting on behalf of Imperiale, requested a reduction of bail to $1,000, but his recollection is so dim as not to assist materially." It is to be noted the opinion does not state Mr. Coghlan had come into the case on that morning, or that he acted as attorney for Imperiale for the purpose of bail. No other reference is made to the testimony of the accused that Mr. Coghlan was connected with the bail matter, and the testimony of McDonough is not mentioned at all.

I have expressed myself in the Sullivan disbarment proceeding to the effect that Riccardi testified under conditions peculiarly calculated to induce him to tell the truth. I also referred to the system which prevailed in the police courts at the time material here and the evil influence a professional bail-bond broker like McDonough would exercise upon the administration of justice. All that I said then applies with equal force in this proceeding. Yet we are urged to believe that in the Imperiale case where McDonough's money was at stake, the subject was never mentioned by him to the accused. Inferences are just as much evidence as are the facts from which they may be drawn, and the irresistible inference arising from the entire evidence is the inference which the Imperiales and Mr. Filippini drew from the action and bearing of the accused, the statement of clerk Kane, the securing of lower bail by Riccardi, his production of the bail money, and the release of the prisoner—that Riccardi was dealing with forces superior to the law itself. I cannot see that there can be any ground for doubt that the accused was apprised of the Imperiale case before he went on the bench that morning, that the amount of bail was unusual for him to set, that he resented Mr. Filippini's remarks and his insistence on lower bail, that he advisedly refrained from entering the bail order in his docket, that he made the bail order at the suggestion of McDonough and not on the application of Mr. Coghlan, and that Riccardi saw McDonough on the three occasions he has described, that through McDonough he got the bail order and from him received the bail money, and that he deposited the bail and secured the order of release.

In the face of the inferences, which indisputably arise from the evidence viewed in its entirety, Riccardi's testimony assumes a secondary importance—the silent and impressive circumstances surrounding the transaction indubitably show that while Riccardi never spoke to the accused about the case, the stealthy influence of McDonough was at work. The vital question in the case is: Why did the accused make the final order of bail? The majority opinion does not purport to rely on the testimony of the three principal figures in this defense; it does not deem Mr. Coghlan's testimony of material assistance and, with the exception of the one allusion to that of the accused, it ignores his testimony and McDonough's on the point. Concededly, if this defense were established the case of the accuser would fail. On the other hand, if it was founded on perjury no question of the sufficiency of the evidence to corroborate Riccardi's testimony should remain. The main opinion concludes that the testimony of Riccardi implicating the accused is "absolutely uncorroborated," and it further holds that in certain essential details it is opposed to a clear preponderance of the evidence independently of the denials of the accused and McDonough. This position of the prevailing opinion rests upon three propositions—there was no suggestion of wrongdoing in the fixing of the original bail, there is no competent evidence that a

"no bail" order was made, and, apart from the testimony of the accused and McDonough, and accepting everything Mr. Filippini testified to as true, the clear preponderance of the evidence is to the effect there was no signed order fixing the final bail, but that it was made before the accused left the courtroom. The first two propositions have been discussed by me, and I shall now consider the third.

It is to be noted the opinion does not state upon whose application the final court order was made, but in view of what it has said concerning Mr. Coghlan's testimony I may assume it does not conclude the application was made by him.

The majority view is that Riccardi is not corroborated as to how and under what circumstances the final order was made, and therefore the accusation fails of proof. It is pointed out in the opinion that, under the practice followed in the issuance of orders of release on bail, the order of release admitted in evidence would indicate the accused had not made a signed bail order, but that it was made in open court. The order of release is on blue paper, but does not contain a rubber stamp notation, and hence this means, according to the evidence, that the party depositing the bail must have stated to the warrant and bond clerk the order was made in open court, thereby refuting Riccardi's testimony that McDonough delivered to him in his office an order of bail signed by the accused. This must be so, it is argued, for the reason that under the evidence, if the order of release had contained the rubber stamp notation it would have been returned to the warrant and bond clerk, because the sheet which had been delivered to the bailiff that morning and upon which, as he claims, he had made the entry at the close of the session, shows the final bail order was made in open court.

I have not been able to accept the testimony of the bailiff that the entry on the sheet was made in pursuance of the direction he testified he received from the accused to "make the bail in the Imperiale case a thousand dollars." According to the testimony of the city prison officials and the records of the office the entry must have been on the sheet when it was delivered with Imperiale at the city prison. The bailiff was the only witness to the records who claimed to have an independent recollection of the Imperiale case as of the time it came up. For some unexplained reason bail orders in this department of the court were customarily given to the bailiff instead of to the clerk in matters coming up during the court proceedings. The conventional way, of course, would be to give all orders, bail and otherwise, to the clerk and for the bailiff to get his information from him. In this way a court record would be kept of the court business. This was not done in this department, at least so far as bail is concerned. The charter provides that the clerk shall keep full and complete records of all cases in the court and the disposition made thereof by the court (article 5, c. 8, § 10). The bailiff is to preserve order and to execute the orders of the court (Id., § 14). Besides the Imperiale case there were eleven other cases on the sheet that day, the information as to the disposition of which the bailiff testifies he got from the judge's docket, but as to the disposition of the Imperiale case he relied entirely on his memory and, indeed, could not say whether the docket contained any mention of it. I have heretofore touched upon his testimony as to Mr. Coghlan's asserted connection with the bail. The testimony of this witness, who, it seems, kept in his possession a duplicate of all these sheets, leaves some doubt in my mind as to the records of the Imperiale case, but I am free from doubt that the bail order was not made as testified to by him.

Now as to the order of release. Riccardi first testified that a man connected with his office deposited the bail. He finally testified, however, that upon further reflection he must have made the deposit and received the order of release himself. Both Riccardi and Mr. Filippini, to whom, according to the testimony of both, Ricardi exhibited his release, said it was on blue paper, but apparently neither of them was questioned as to whether it contained the rubber stamp notation. Mr. Filippini was so surprised and deeply interested in Riccardi's performance in securing bail that he went to see and had a long talk with the warrant and bond clerk after the order of release was exhibited to him by Riccardi, but this conversation was properly excluded. It does appear, however, that when Mr. Filippini entered the office a white paper dropped on the floor and that the incident was discussed between them, but what was said is not shown. Apart from the contention as to whether Riccardi received the bail order in McDonough's office, no particular importance should attach to the circumstance of whether or not a bail order was signed in any given instance, for when the accused was asked whether it was not the custom in his department of the court to sign an order of bail even when the order of bail was made in open court, he answered: "Yes, it was usually done; that in a few cases it was not done." It was probably the rare exception not to sign an order in that department, for otherwise the records of bail would, in most instances, depend on the bailiff of the court. No special stress, therefore, should be laid merely on whether or not a bail order was signed, nor on the failure to produce a signed order, for at that time no effort was made to preserve them.

The determination of the question as to the order of release must rest on the action of the two officials—the bailiff in furnishing the data for the city prison records, and the warrant and bond clerk in issuing an order of release minus the rubber stamp notation. As I understand the matter, no record was kept by the warrant and bond clerk which would show who deposited the bail, nor the representations by such person in cases where a signed order of bail is not produced. The warrant and bond clerk has no independent recollection of the occurrence, and upon the face of the records, it would seem that the depositor of the bail must have represented that a signed order of bail had not been made. In my opinion, this was not the fact, and the truth of the matter must be sought elsewhere. It may be argued that if the bail was deposited by the man in Riccardi's office (he did not appear as a witness) he may have assumed and stated to the warrant and bond clerk the bail order was made in open court, and if by Riccardi himself, he may have declared it was a court order so as to protect the system against exposure, for he has testified that all his operations in that department were carried on through McDonough and never with the accused himself. These, however, are mere conjectures, and upon the evidence as to the contents of the order of release and the circumstances under which it was issued I entertain such a doubt, that if the decision turned on this question alone, I would resolve it in favor of the accused.

But it cannot be held that this question is decisive. The evidence as to why the accused made the final order of bail is so convincing I have no doubt of his guilt. Riccardi and the officer agree they had the conversation in the corridor that morning some time before the accused went on the bench. The officer left and Riccardi proceeded to McDonough's and had his first interview with him about the Imperiale case. It is unnecessary to again review the proceedings in court which resulted in Mr. Filippini leaving to get bail. Riccardi had his second interview with McDonough and was preceded to the courtroom by McDonough's man, who spoke to the accused. While negotiations were on the accused spoke to the clerk and left the courtroom. Upon the assumption that the bail orders during the proceedings are generally given to the bailiff it is clear why, if there was a "no bail" order, it was given to the clerk, for otherwise it would have appeared on the bailiff's sheet. Mr. Filippini retired to get bail and Riccardi made his third visit to McDonough's, obtained the bail money, Imperiale was released on schedule time, and all the surrounding circumstances proclaimed Riccardi as the genius of the occasion.

There was no question in the mind of Mrs. Imperiale, who had waited anxiously at McDonough's for her husband's deliverance, nor of Imperiale when he was released after being returned to the city prison, nor of Mr. Filippini, amazed at the performance, when Riccardi showed him the order of release, as to who had secured the results. In the face of such circumstances the denials of the accused and McDonough should carry no weight. In view of Mrs. Imperiale's great relief at the outcome too much stress should not be put on her failure to note whether Riccardi, when he emerged from the back room, had a paper in his hand, if that were the way he would carry such a paper, or whether or not he had the bail money.

I have said Mr. Coghlan testified before the grand jury. It is apparent the affirmative defense was never thought of until that occasion, for the testimony of the accused, who preceded Mr. Coghlan on the stand, is barren of any suggestion that the latter applied to him for a reduction of bail. In addition to what I have already said about this defense it is proper to refer again briefly to the evidence. It was through Riccardi Mr. Coghlan was employed in the Imperiale case. Riccardi's movements from the time he spoke to the officer until Imperiale was released from custody are accounted for, and Mr. Coghlan had not been seen by the Imperiales or Mr. Filippini during that time. No one has testified, not even Mr. Coghlan himself, that he was employed to secure bail. The truth of the matter probably is that Mr. Coghlan knew nothing about the case until after Imperiale was released, and that while Riccardi was attending to the matter of bail Mr. Coghlan was engaged in the superior court. It is evident that he only met the Imperiales on that day to arrange to have him try the case while Riccardi was in the east.

The Penal Code provides:

"A docket must be kept by * * * the police justice, or by the clerk * * * if there is one, in which must be entered each action and the proceedings of the court therein. * * *" Section 1428.

The provisions of this Code relative to bail are applicable to bail in police courts (section 1458). In matters of bail the bailiff seemed to discharge the duties properly belonging to the office of clerk, and only occasional entries were made in the docket by the accused. The evidence does not sustain the theory that it was through ignorance or carelessness the accused conducted the court in defiance of the law, but indicates that the methods followed were intended as a protection to him in carrying on operations such as those charged in the accusation. In the Imperiale case no entry appears of the original or final bail order. The two orders—one fixing and the other reducing the bail—should have been entered. Yet orders of bail in other cases do appear in the docket.

The first bail order was entirely disproportionate to the bail usually fixed by the accused in manslaughter cases, apart from the existing arrangement with the transportation companies in that class of cases. The accused, after the officer testified, said it was a very serious case and apparently nothing had intervened to change his mind as to its gravity. It may be inferred from the excessive bail and the other circumstances that the first order was only tentative. The purported "no bail" order, for obvious reasons, would not be entered. And if the final order had been entered the question might arise as to why the original order was not entered. If the final order was not made on the application of Mr. Coghlan, why, and under what circumstances, was it made? Concededly, not through either Mr. Filippini or Riccardi.

And it must not be lost sight of that in spite of these charges the accused and Riccardi were on speaking terms, and that they drank together. On an occasion within two months of the hearing, in the presence of some newspaper men, the following colloquy ensued:

"Judge Oppenheim: Did you ever say that you ever did business with me? Riccardi: Well, no, not exactly, but indirectly a hundred times, and the goods were always delivered. Judge Oppenheim: Very well."

Judge Oppenheim then turned around and walked away.

In view of the relationship between the accused, McDonough, and Riccardi, and the system under which they operated, I think the testimony of Riccardi as to the Leandro Ysussi case, in which the defendant was charged with intent to commit murder, and as to the case of Geralmo Pasquale, involving a charge of assault with intent to commit rape, it being alleged in the accusation that the accused received a $100 bribe to dismiss in each case, and that he did so, finds ample corroboration in the aggravated character of the cases. The method followed in each of these cases was to make repeated orders of continuance covering several months and finally, without even the formality of taking the evidence of the defendant, dismiss the case.

The accused should be disbarred.

NATIONAL BANK OF CALIFORNIA AT LOS ANGELES v. EXCHANGE NAT. BANK OF LONG BEACH. (L. A. 5832.)

1. Trusts ⟸31—Agreement authorizing payment of note from funds due guarantor, collected by bank, held to create trust.

Under Civ. Code, § 2251, providing that the mutual consent of trustor and trustee creates a trust of which the beneficiary may take advantage at any time before its rescission, sections 2215, 2221, 2222, and 2258, that the trustee must fulfill the declared purpose of the trust and follow the directions of the trustor except as modified by the consent of all the parties interested, and section 2280, that a trust cannot be revoked by the trustor after its acceptance by the trustee and beneficiaries, except by their consent, unless the declaration of trust reserves the power of revocation to the trustor, a contractor's assignment and delivery to a bank of his warrant for electric light assessments against property owners, authorizing the payment, from the amounts collected and those realized from the sale of deficiency bonds, of a promissory note of which the contractor was guarantor, created a trust in favor of the holder.

2. Estoppel ⟸97—One to whom general representation, made known directly afterward, may act on it, though he did not hear it.

Only the person to whom a representation is made or for whom it is designed can act on or avail himself of it, but, if the declaration was intended to be general, one who did not hear it, but to whom it was made known directly afterward, or within the time allowed for acting on it, may act on it.

3. Estoppel ⟸97—Holder of promissory note payable from trust funds not estopped to claim benefit of trust by letter to attorney for maker, demanding payment.

The holder of a promissory note, provision for the payment of which was made by agreement of the guarantor, a contractor, with a bank, authorizing the application of funds realized from the collection of electric light assessments, the warrant for which he assigned and delivered to it in escrow, and the sale of deficiency bonds, was not estopped from claiming the benefit of the escrow instructions by a letter from its attorney to the attorney for the maker of the note that such arrangement was not satisfactory, and requesting immediate payment, though the latter informed the guarantor at once, who instructed the bank not to pay the claim without a further order from himself, the representation not having been made to the public generally or to any individual as a member thereof, but to an attorney, for the purpose of informing him further delay would not be granted, and not for the purpose of influencing the bank's conduct in connection with the trust.

4. Election of remedies ⟸3(1)—Bringing suit on promissory note not election not to take under trust from funds of which payable.

The commencement of a suit against the maker and guarantor of a promissory note was not an election by the holder not to take under a trust created by agreement between the guarantor and a bank, providing for payment of the note from a fund to be realized by the bank from the collection of moneys due the guarantor.

5. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⟸288—Moneys ordered paid to creditors by trustee belongs to them, though deposited in trustor's name.

Where a contractor assigned and delivered to a bank a warrant for electric light assessments, instructing it to collect the same, sell bonds for those unpaid, and from the money received to pay claims against him, including a promissory note, with interest, of which he was guarantor, the money, when collected, belonged to his creditors, though deposited in his name; his instructions having been accepted in writing by the bank as trustee.

6. Contracts ⟸187(1)—Rule third person may enforce contract for his benefit any time before rescission inapplicable to trusts.

Civ. Code, § 1559, providing that a contract, made expressly for the benefit of a third person, may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind, has no application to a case where a trust has been created in favor of such third person, such trust being governed by the provision of the Code with reference to trusts.

7. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⟸32—No consideration necessary for agreement to collect and pay trust funds to trustor's creditors.

Under Civ. Code, § 1040, no consideration was necessary for an agreement of a trustee to collect electric light assessments owing the trustor, a contractor, or sell bonds in lieu of unpaid assessments, and pay the proceeds to trustor's creditors.

8. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1170(3)—Where rights of parties fully litigated under pleadings, technical error in complaint will not justify reversal.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where evidence of the acceptance of a trust by the beneficiary and trustee of the receipt of the trust moneys by the latter, and of the nonpayment of the beneficiary's claim was fully presented, it was not error to overrule a demurrer to the beneficiary's complaint; a technical error if any therein not justifying reversal.

9. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⊂⊃98—Fact of additional oral instructions by trustor immaterial, unless agreed to be incorporated in written declaration of trust.

Under Civ. Code, § 2254, providing that all declarations of a trustor to his trustee before acceptance of the trust by the latter are deemed part of the declaration of the trust, except that when such a declaration is made in writing all previous declarations by the trustor are merged therein, the fact that a trustor, who instructed a trustee to collect moneys due him and pay his creditors from the proceeds, also instructed the trustee to hold all money so collected subject to his order, reserved the right to alter the instructions at his pleasure, and could add to or strike from the list of creditors, was immaterial, unless it was agreed that such instructions should be incorporated in the written declaration of trust.

10. Reformation of instruments ⊂⊃36(3)—Allegation of mistaken omission from written declaration of trust insufficient where facts not alleged showing how mistake made.

Where a trustor authorized a trustee to collect money due him and pay his creditors therefrom, an allegation that, by inadvertence and mutual mistake, an agreement that all moneys collected should be held subject to his order, he reserving the right to alter the instructions and to add to or strike from the list of creditors, was omitted from the written declaration of trust, is insufficient to justify a reformation of the instructions, it being necessary to allege the facts showing how the mistake was made, and that the parties intended to incorporate the agreement in the writing; proof of the terms of a trust being limited to written declarations thereof.

11. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⊂⊃317—Interest at 7 per cent. held included in amount owing beneficiary of trust fund on promissory note.

Where a trustor authorized his trustee to collect moneys due him and pay his creditor's claims therefrom, including a promissory note, with interest, it was not error to include compound interest thereon at 7 per cent., though the amount of interest was not specified; the trustor having been advised by correspondence between the holder of the note and the trustee that the indebtedness covered by the instructions included such interest.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by the National Bank of California at Los Angeles, a corporation, against the Exchange National Bank of Long Beach, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene C. Campbell, of Long Beach, and Geo. E. Cryer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John E. Biby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the lower court for the sum of $2,604.44. Defendant appeals. Previous to December 10, 1914, K. T. Bennett had performed a contract for the installation of electric lights along American avenue in the city of Long Beach, for which there had been issued to F. B. Amend, his assignee, by the board of public works of the city of Long Beach, assessment No. 167, whereunder F. B. Amend was entitled to collect assessments aggregating $11,821.99 levied upon the property fronting upon said street, or in case of nonpayment thereof to have issued bonds for the unpaid assessments. On December 10, 1914, K. T. Bennett and his attorney and assignee, F. B. Amend, assigned and delivered the warrant and assessment to the defendant for collection, with written instructions for the disposition of the proceeds. These instructions authorized the defendant to collect the amounts due, and to receive and sell bonds issued for the unpaid assessments. It was directed that the money received from the sale of such bonds should be deposited with the defendant in the name of K. T. Bennett, and the same should be "subject to the instructions hereinafter given." These instructions authorized the payment of a large number of labor and materialmen claims incurred in the performance of the work, and specifically detailed in the instructions. The labor claims in the instructions were to be first paid, and thereafter any other labor claims which were so subsequently authorized by the assignors were to be paid, and it was then provided:

"Eighth. After you have either paid or received sufficient money to pay all of the aforesaid claims (the same being labor claims), you are then instructed to pay, upon receiving proper receipts therefor, the following amounts to the following parties, to wit."

Then follows a list of claims, the sixteenth being the following item, which is the subject of this litigation:

"National Bank of California * * * $2,000, interest $———."

The ninth item of the instructions refers to certain disputed claims, and the tenth was as follows:

"Tenth. Upon matters of law concerning the collection of said assessments, the making of demands therefor, the issuance of bonds, etc., you will please follow the advice and instructions of Messrs. Amend & Amend, and they will furnish you opinions in writing should you desire the same; they are also to act as counsel should any action be necessary in said collection."

The defendant accepted the instructions and indorsed such acceptance thereon at the time of delivery. At the time the instructions were given the plaintiff held a promissory note of the Western Construction Company for $2,000, dated May 6, 1914, bearing 7 per cent. interest, payable and to be compounded monthly, and also a certain written guaranty dated April 22, 1914, signed by James Irvine, K. T. Bennett, and E. Irvine, whereby said guarantors within the limits of $3,000 guaranteed the prompt payment of any indebtedness due to the bank by the Western Construction Company. It was this obligation of Bennett as guarantor which was intended by Bennett to be covered by the instructions to pay plaintiff $2,000.

December 11, 1914, plaintiff wrote to defendant, stating that it was informed of the transfer "and that Mr. Bennett has authorized you to pay this bank the amount of a note of $2,000 executed by the Western Construction Company and others," and asking for a confirmation, "stating that you have accepted the above-mentioned order from Mr. Bennett to the effect that on receipt of proceeds from the warrant you would pay to us the above amount, $2,000 and interest at 7% from August 5, 1914." On December 12th the defendant replied, acknowledging the receipt of the communication, and stating:

"We have accepted the escrow and are receiving payments by the lot owners covering this work. Our instructions from the assignors are that we must pay the labor claims first, then the material claims, and in the list of material claims is one of $2,000 in your favor. This matter will receive prompt attention."

On December 14th plaintiff requested information as to the amount to be collected on American avenue, and the total amount of claim, stating:

"We of course cannot expect you to give us a promise regarding the payment of our claim, but would like to know whether or not there will be sufficient money coming in to take care of same, and the time payment could be expected."

On December 15th defendant replied, stating that the total warrant was $11,821.99, but the amount of cash to be received could not be ascertained, but the total claims for labor and material amounted to $11,741.09. On December 19th Mr. Hyman Schwartz, attorney for the Western Construction Company and for James Irvine, wrote to the plaintiff, informing it of the above-mentioned assignment by K. T. Bennett, and on December 24th Mr. Trippet, attorney for the plaintiff, replied, stating:

"The arrangement that has been made to take care of this claim is not satisfactory to the bank, and I am instructed to request immediate payment."

Mr. Schwartz at once showed this letter to Mr. Amend, who upon December 31st informed the cashier of the defendant bank that plaintiff was dissatisfied with the arrangement made for the payment of its claim, and on January 2d gave the defendant written instructions not to pay said claim without a further order to that effect from himself. The defendant believed the statement made by Mr. Amend, and relied upon the same in withholding payment from the plaintiff and in paying out the money on the attachment hereinafter mentioned.

On December 23, 1914, Mr. Trippet had been instructed to bring suit against the Western Construction Company and the guarantors, James Irvine and K. T. Bennett, which was done December 30, 1914, and judgment upon said note and guaranty was obtained. Suit was also brought against the stockholders of the Western Construction Company to recover said amount.

On January 18, 1915, one R. S. Shotwell attached the interest of K. T. Bennett in the proceeds of said warrant in the possession of defendant, and on January 22, 1915, obtained a judgment of $3,300 in the attachment suit, and levied the execution upon the interest of K. T. Bennett in and to the proceeds of said warrant, which at that time amounted to the sum of $2,700, which amount was paid by the defendant to the sheriff on account of said levy. On February 1, 1915, in an action by a creditor of K. T. Bennett and James Irvine, the balance of the money in the hands of the defendant, amounting to $164.08, was ordered by the court to be paid to the receiver in that action. The defendant also paid the claim of $1,000 to John Roebling Sons Company, which, under the terms of the escrow agreement, was to be paid subsequent to the claim of the plaintiff. Basing its claim upon the proposition that the payments to Roebling Sons Company and to the sheriff upon execution were in violation of the instructions and amounted to a diversion of moneys payable to the plaintiff, it instituted suit and obtained the judgment appealed from.

One of the main questions in the case is whether or not the plaintiff repudiated the benefit of the agreement made on its behalf by the defendant and K. T. Bennett and F. B. Amend. The trial court found that F. B. Amend at the time he made the foregoing statements to the defendant concerning plaintiff had no authority from the plaintiff to act on its behalf for any purpose or in any manner whatsoever, and that such statement and notice were given without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff.

It should be observed that the only communications passing directly between the plaintiff and the defendant are those hereinabove set forth, in which the defendant stated its purpose to carry out the instructions given it by Bennett for the payment of the plaintiff's claim. If the communications from Trippet to Schwartz had been made by the plaintiff to the defendant perhaps it might be considered a repudiation of the arrangement made in plaintiff's favor and a consequent release of the defendant from the obligation it incurred by accepting the assignment and instructions from Bennett, but the evidence is and the court has found that such letter was not intended to be communicated to the defendant bank, and the case must be determined in the light of this finding.

[1] There can be no doubt that the original transaction created a trust in favor of the plaintiff bank. Section 2251 of our Civil Code provides as follows:

"The mutual consent of a trustor and trustee creates a trust of which the beneficiary may take advantage at any time prior to its rescission."

Section 2258, Civil Code, provides as follows:

"A trustee must fulfill the purpose of the trust, as declared at its creation, and must follow all the directions of the trustor given at that time, except as modified by the consent of all parties interested, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as an employee."

See, also, Civ. Code, §§ 2215, 2221, and 2222. It is further provided in section 2280 that—

"A trust cannot be revoked by the trustor after its acceptance actual or presumed, by the trustee and beneficiaries, except by the consent of all the beneficiaries, unless the declaration of trust reserves a power of revocation to the trustor, and in that case the power must be strictly pursued."

The general rule is thus stated in Am. & Eng. Ency.:

"Where property is transferred and accepted on the agreement and understanding that it or its proceeds are to be applied for certain designated purposes, an express trust is created complete upon the trustee's acceptance thereof, and the application of the property as directed enters into the consideration of the transfer." 28 A. & E. (2d Ed.) p. 904.

[2, 3] We will now pass to a consideration of some of the specific points made by the appellant.

First. Plaintiff is estopped to maintain the action. It is claimed:

"That the plaintiff's attorney published the statement to the effect that plaintiff repudiated the escrow instructions."

This contention is based upon the facts hereinbefore stated with relation to the communication from Trippet to Schwartz. The ordinary rule with reference to estoppel is thus stated by Bigelow in his work on Estoppel, 708, 709:

"Only the person to whom the representation was made or for whom it was designed can act upon and avail himself of it. * * * A person who receives statements at second hand, not intended for him, clearly has no right to act upon them. * * * If, however, the declaration was intended to be general, then it seems that one who did not hear it, but to whom it was made known directly afterwards, or within the time to be allowed for acting upon it, may act upon it."

The obligation to the defendant bank was not only an obligation of K. T. Bennett, but of his two joint guarantors, of the Western Construction Company, and of its stockholders as well. It is apparent that the Western Construction Company and James Irvine, who were being pressed for payment, sought through their attorney to secure delay by calling attention to the escrow agreement made by Bennett in favor of the plaintiff corporation. This escrow agreement involved the actual delay incident to collection of street assessments, and in addition such delay as might result from the issuance and sale of the bonds for the purpose of securing a fund. The obligation due the plaintiff was a promissory note executed May 6, 1914, due one day after date. Plaintiff's expression of dissatisfaction must be construed in the light of this additional delay, proposed not by K. T. Bennett, but by his associates represented by Mr. Schwartz. The letter to Mr. Schwartz was not intended for general publication. It was a communication between attorneys occupying confidential relations toward their respective clients, and intended for the benefit of the clients of Mr. Schwartz. The case of Mitchell v. Reed, 9 Cal. 204, 70 Am. Dec. 647, is cited by the appellant as authority for the proposition that the plaintiff is estopped in this case. In the case of Ghio v. Cline (App.) 187 Pac. 433, the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division 2, correctly stated that—

"Though this case has not been directly reversed or modified by the Supreme Court, there can be no doubt that it is contrary to the great weight of authority upon the doctrine of estoppel."

It is sufficient, however, to point out here that the facts do not bring it within the rule quoted from Bigelow or stated in Mitchell v. Reed, supra. In the case at bar the representation relied upon by the defendant was not made to the public generally, or to any individual as a member of the public, but to an attorney who was apparently seeking delay in contemplated litigation for the purpose of informing that attorney that such delay would not be granted, and not for the purpose of influencing the conduct of the defendant in connection with the trust which it had already informed plaintiff it had accepted and would carry out. The instructions of Mr. Amend to the defendant bank in his letter of January 2d, and also by the indorsement upon the escrow instructions to "hold" this item, do not indicate that he understood that the plaintiff had wholly repudiated the arrangement in its behalf, but rather that he expected to negotiate further with plaintiff with reference thereto. Apparently this situation was overlooked when attachments were levied and ordered paid by Mr. Amend, attorney for K. T. Bennett. The defendant neglected to inform the plaintiff of the existence of such an attachment. Plaintiff was not estopped from claiming the benefit of the trust, and for the same reason it cannot be said to have waived the benefit of the escrow instructions on its behalf.

[4] Appellant claims that the commencement of the suit against the Western Construction Company, its stockholders and guarantors, was an election by plaintiff not to take under the trust. The answer to that contention is that there is no inconsistency between such action and a reliance upon the benefit of the escrow instructions.

[5] Appellant claims that the assignment of the warrant and assessment to the bank was for collection only, and that the assignor had control of the paper until it was collected, and hence retained the power to recall the instrument at any time before it was collected. The difficulty with this contention is that, in addition to the assignment for collection, instructions were given with relation to the use of the proceeds which put the fund collected beyond Bennett's control. This is equally true whether the escrow instructions provided for the deposit of the money in the name of Bennett or in the name of the several creditors to whom the money was to be paid. In either event the ultimate recipient of the money was designated in the escrow agreement, and the money belonged to such recipient when collected, whether deposited in the name of K. T. Bennett or not, for Bennett had given defendant instructions to pay out said money, and said instructions had been accepted in writing by the defendant.

[6] Section 1559, Civil Code, providing that a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person, may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it, has no application to this case, where a trust has been created in favor of such third person. Such trust is governed by the provisions of the Code with reference to trusts.

[7] No consideration was necessary for the agreement of the defendant. Section 1040, Civ. Code; Kopp v. Gunther, 95 Cal. 63, 30 Pac. 301; Taber v. Bailey, 22 Cal. App. 617, 135 Pac. 975.

The various assignments of error with relation to the introduction of evidence do not affect the result, and do not require separate discussion.

[8] Appellant contends that the court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to the third amended complaint. In view of the answer and trial upon the merits it is unnecessary to consider the special demurrer. The rights of the parties were fully litigated under the pleadings. The evidence of the acceptance of the trust by the defendant and by the plaintiff, of the receipt of the money by defendant, and of the nonpayment of the plaintiff's claim was fully presented to the court, so that a technical error, if any, in the statement of the causes of action in the complaint, would not justify the reversal of the case. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

[9] A more serious question arises from the attempt of the defendant to secure a reformation of the escrow instructions on the ground of mutual mistake. A cross-complaint for that purpose was interposed, wherein it was alleged that, in addition to the terms contained in the written instructions it was agreed between the defendant and K. T. Bennett and F. B. Amend that all moneys collected should be held subject to the order of K. T. Bennett and F. B. Amend, and that Bennett and Amend reserved the right to alter the instructions at their pleasure in relation to the disposition of the money so collected for the creditors named in said instructions, except as to creditors named in paragraph 5 thereof; that it was agreed that they could add other creditors to the list, or could strike out any of said creditors, and that all said moneys should be subject to the control and order of Amend and Bennett, and could be paid out at their order.

It was further alleged:

"That by inadvertence and the mutual mistake of the defendant and said Amend and Bennett, the aforesaid additional terms were omitted from said writing; and that said K. T. Bennett and said F. B. Amend are necessary parties to this amended cross-complaint, and their presence is essential to the complete determination of the controversy between the parties herein named."

A demurrer to this cross-complaint was sustained.

Section 2254 of the Civil Code provides:

"All declarations of a trustor to his trustees, in relation to the trust, before its acceptance by the trustees, or any of them, are to be deemed part of the declaration of the trust, except that when a declaration of trust is made in writing, all previous declarations by the same trustor are merged therein."

[10] The fact that additional instructions were given or agreed upon orally would be immaterial, unless it was also agreed that such instructions should be incorporated in the written declarations of trust. The above allegation that by inadvertence and mutual mistake such agreement was omitted from the written declaration of trust is insufficient to show such a mistake as would justify a reformation of the instrument. It was necessary to allege the facts showing how the mistake was made. 34 Cyc. 974. It is not even alleged that the parties intended to incorporate the agreement in the writing.

The beneficiary is entitled to rely upon the rules of evidence which limit the proof of the terms of the trust to written declarations thereof. The demurrer to the cross-complaint was properly sustained.

[11] Appellant claims that the judgment should not have included compound interest at 7 per cent., which was in accord with the original obligation. It is apparent from the escrow instructions that interest was to be paid upon the $2,000 due the plaintiff. While the amount of this interest was not specified, appellant was advised by the correspondence between plaintiff and defendant that the indebtedness covered by the escrow instructions was $2,000 and interest at 7 per cent. from August 5, 1914. It was undoubtedly the intention of Bennett and of the defendant that the amount of the note and interest thereon should be paid from the proceeds of the assessment and warrant, and the judgment was in accordance with that agreement.

Judgment affirmed.

COOPER et al. v. BUXTON. (L. A. 6591.)

Records ⊂=9(11)—Action to set aside decree of registration of title held barred.

An action to set aside a registration decree on the ground of mistake held governed, not by the three-year statute of limitations for actions for relief on the ground of mistake (Code Civ. Proc. § 338), but by Torrens Act, § 45, barring action for recovery of registered land not brought within one year after the registration, after which time persons injured must look to the relief provided by section 105 of the act respecting the "assurance fund."

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Sarah E. Cooper and another against Francis E. Buxton. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

George A. Skinner, of Long Beach, and Wheaton A. Gray, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

McCaughan & McCaughan, of Long Beach, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment rendered against them upon demurrer to their complaint. The complaint is somewhat long, but the facts shown by it material for a decision of the case may be rather briefly stated.

One Buxton died possessed of certain real estate. The defendant is his surviving wife, and the plaintiffs are his children by a former marriage. Not very long before his death he had caused his real estate to be registered under the "Land Title Law" or Torrens Act. Stats. 1915, p. 1932; Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 1049. His wife, the defendant, joined him in the application. The application alleged the property to be community property. The court in the registration proceedings found it was community property, and it was registered as such. By Buxton's will the real estate, or his disposable interest in it, was devised to the plaintiffs. If it were community property, only one half was subject to his testamentary disposition, and the defendant, as the surviving spouse, would take the other half. On the other hand, if it were separate property, it was all subject to testamentary disposition and passed to the plaintiffs by the will. The complaint alleges that the property was in fact separate property, so that it passed to them, but that the defendant, in reliance upon the registration decree, claims one-half of it as community property.

We need hardly say that by the terms of the Torrens Act—whose validity and operation in this respect are not questioned—the registration decree, as long as it stands, is a conclusive adjudication in rem that the property was community property. To meet this situation, the complaint seeks to have the decree set aside on the ground of mistake, alleging that the allegations of the application for registration to the effect that the lands were community property were made through mistake, inadvertence, and ignorance of the legal consequences on the part both of Buxton and his wife, and that, induced by these allegations, the court made the decree in question. The vital point in the case, then, is: May the registration decree be set aside upon the facts alleged?

It is exceedingly doubtful if the allegations as to mistake are sufficient to make out a case for setting aside a judgment. But, assuming that they are, it would seem plain that, in view of the further fact that the action was not brought until more than a year after the registration, the action cannot be maintained under section 45 of the Torrens Act. The section reads:

"No person shall commence any action at law or in equity for the recovery of land, or assert any interest or right in, or lien or demand upon the same, or make entry thereon adversely to the title or interest certified in the first certificate bringing the land under the operation of this act after one year following the first registration. It shall not be an exception to this rule that the person entitled to bring the action or make the entry is deceased, an infant, lunatic, or is under any disability, but action may be brought by such person by his next friend or guardian or by the administrator or the executor of a deceased person. It shall be the duty of the guardian, if there is any, to bring action in the name of his ward whenever it is necessary to preserve or enforce the ward's rights in registered land; provided, however, before such action shall proceed, it must be made to appear to the court that the person bringing such action or those under whom he claims, had no actual notice of the proceedings to register such lands in time to appear and file his objections or assert his claim. The provisions of this section shall in no way affect or disturb the rights of any person in said land, acquired subsequent to the registration thereof, bona fide and without knowledge and for a valuable consideration."

The answer which plaintiffs' counsel make to the asserted application of this section is that it does not operate to repeal subdivision 4 of section 338, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an action for relief on the ground of mistake may be brought at any time within three years after the discovery of the mistake, and that there is no inconsistency between the Code section and the section of the Torrens Act. There is, of course, an inconsistency between them, if the section of the act were intended to apply to an action to set aside a registration decree, and, if such were the intention, the section of the act must prevail over the general provision of the Code. The real question, as we view it, is whether or not the section was intended to apply to an action to set aside a registration decree as distinguished from an action for the recovery of the land or the assertion of some interest in it independently of the decree.

It will be noted that by its terms the section of the act applies to actions for the recovery of the property or the assertion of some interest in it, and makes no mention of actions directly attacking the registration decree. Nevertheless, when the nature and effect of the decree are considered, we see no escape from the conclusion that the section was intended to apply to actions of the latter character; that, in fact, it must apply to such actions if it is to be given any meaning at all. The registration decree is a judgment in rem, binding on all the world, and by section 34 of the act is made conclusive on every interest or claim in the property other than certain minor interests not material here. Its conclusive character in this respect does not wait upon the expiration of a year or any other period of time. It attaches with the decree becoming final. After that time no action can be maintained to recover the land or to assert an interest in it contrary to the decree. The decree must be first set aside before there can be any such recovery or assertion of interest. In other words, after the registration decree has become final, the only action by which the land can be recovered or an interest in it asserted except under the decree is an action such as the present, wherein it is sought to set aside the decree and then establish the asserted right to the land or to an interest in it. The section providing a limitation of one year must therefore apply to such actions, since it can apply to no other.

It is also worthy of note in this connection that an action to set aside a deed or other muniment of title to land on the ground of fraud or mistake, and thereupon to recover possession of the land, has been held to be an action to recover real property, so that the period of limitation prescribed for such actions applies to it. See Murphy v. Crowley, 140 Cal. 141, 73 Pac. 820, and cases there cited. If this be true, it would seem that the present action is also one to recover the property (and certainly that is its final object), so that it would come within the express enumeration by section 45 of the actions which must be brought within a year of registration.

It is also to be noted that, while the act places such a brief limitation upon the time within which a registration decree may be set aside, it endeavors to provide by section 105 for relief in another manner to persons who have been unjustly deprived of their property by the decree, such other manner being by the way of compensation from the "assurance fund" created by the act, and that here the period of limitation is four years after the right of action accrues. In view of the general purpose of the act to make the registration decree conclusive and to facilitate transfers of real estate by making reliance upon the decree wholly safe, we think the inference is strong that it was intended that the decree should not be set aside after the brief period of a year, but that for any injustice worked by it the persons injured must then look to the different relief provided by section 105.

It is also to be noted that the one exception which the statute makes to the conclusive nature of the decree is the case of fraud, that this exception repeatedly appears in the statute, and that it is always confined to fraud alone and never includes mistake. If there be any exception to the operation of section 45, it would seem to be only the case of fraud, and the failure of the statute to unite with it the companion case of mistake would seem to indicate that it was not intended that it should be an exception.

Judgment affirmed.

SPRECKELS SUGAR CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 9641.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1921. Modified June 23, 1921.)

1. Master and servant ⟸386(1) — "Annual amount" contributed as basis of compensation to dependents held to be contribution at time of injury.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14 (b), providing that the question of dependency shall be determined as of the time of injury, and section 9(c) (2), providing for a death benefit amounting to three times the "annual amount" devoted to support of partial dependents, where deceased employee left no dependents except his brother and brother's family, to whom for some years the deceased's contributions had averaged $145 per month, but to whom, because of the coming into earning power of a member of the dependent family, deceased had reduced his contribution to $45 per month during the three months prior to his death, the death benefit should be computed on the basis of $45 per month, the term "annual amount" meaning the annual amount of contribution at the rate at which deceased was contributing at the time of his injury, regardless of whether that rate had existed for a year or more or for less than a year.

2. Master and servant ⟸417(6) — Excessive compensation award reviewable as involving "lawfulness" and "jurisdiction;" "want of jurisdiction."

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, and Workmen's Compensation Act, § 67 (a), the latter providing for certiorari for the purpose of having the "lawfulness" of the Industrial Commission's order inquired into and determined, where the Industrial Commission, through error of law, allowed an excessive death benefit, it rendered an "unlawful" award, and one in excess of its "jurisdiction," so that the award was reviewable by the Supreme Court; determination of the "lawfulness" of the award covering a review of errors of law by the Commission, and "jurisdiction" meaning authority to do the particular thing done, so that a want of jurisdiction means a want of authority to exercise in a particular manner a power which the board or tribunal has, the doing of something in excess of the authority possessed.

Proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act by John H. Gamblin and others to recover compensation for the death of one Gamblin, employee, opposed by the Spreckels Sugar Company, employer. An award was made by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the employer brings certiorari. Award annulled.

R. P. Wisecarver, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (L. C. Brown, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

D. W. Burbank, of San Francisco (F. J. Hambly and H. E. Smith, both of San Jose, of counsel), for respondents John H. Gamblin and others.

OLNEY, J. This is an application to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. There is no conflict in the evidence; the ultimate facts are found by the Commission, and the question presented is one as to whether upon those facts the award of the Commission can be sustained in respect to the amount which it allowed the dependents of one who was admittedly an employee, and had been killed by accident in the course of his employment.

It appears that the deceased employee left no dependents except his brother and his brother's family, consisting of his wife and two minor children. The brother was paralyzed and incapacitated, and for several years he and his family were supported wholly by the decedent, whose average monthly contribution for that purpose was $145. During these years, however, the brother's wife was training herself as a teacher at a normal school and the state university, and some three months before the accident to the decedent secured a position as a teacher, and from then on was herself in receipt of a salary. Her earnings went to the support of her family; it became but partially, instead of wholly, dependent upon the decedent, and the latter's contribution to its support fell to $45 a month. This was the condition of affairs existing at the time of the accident.

[1] The statute (Workmen's Compensation Act [St. 1917, p. 844], § 14[b]) provides that the question of partial or entire dependency shall be determined in accordance with the fact as the fact may be at the time of the injury to the employee. The present case is, then, one of partial dependency. The statute also fixes the amount to be allowed as a death benefit in a case of partial dependency. Section 9(c) (2) of the act reads:

"In case the deceased employee leaves no person wholly dependent upon him for support, but one or more persons partially dependent therefor, the said dependents shall be allowed * * * a death benefit which shall amount to three times the annual amount devoted by the deceased to the support of the person or persons so partially dependent."

The Commission computed the death benefit allowable in the present case by taking as the annual amount of the decedent's contribution the amount he had actually contributed during the year immediately preceding his death, both during the nine months when total dependency existed and during the three months of the partial dependency which existed at the time of injury. The employer contends that this was erroneous; that the annual amount of which the statute speaks is not the amount actually contributed in the last or any other year of the decedent's life, but is the annual amount of the rate at which the decedent was contributing at the time of his injury, regardless of whether that rate had existed for a year or more, or for less than a year. Putting it concretely, the employer contends in this case that at the time of injury to the decedent a state of partial dependency existed, and had existed for three months, as found by the Commission; that likewise, as found by the Commission, the decedent, during the continuance of this partial dependency, had been contributing to the support of his brother at the rate of $45 a month, and that the annual amount of contribution upon which the death benefit should be computed is the annual amount of contribution at this rate, and not the amount of contribution for three months at this rate and for nine months at a rate which did not exist when the decedent was injured.

It is quite evident, we think, that the employer's contention is correct. The whole theory of the compensation act as to death cases is that the dependents of the employee killed through some hazard of his employment shall be compensated for the loss of the support they were receiving from him at the time of his injury. This necessarily means that the death benefit must be computed on the rate of contribution at that time. It is the rate which is the measure of the loss, not the gross amount which the decedent has happened to pay through any past year, or through any other period of time. A very simple illustration will make this plain. By reason of some circumstance—the death of his father, for example—the mother of an employee becomes partially dependent upon him, although she had not been previously dependent upon him at all. When this occurs he begins to contribute to her support at the rate say of $50 a month. He does this for three months, or perhaps for only one month, when he is killed. Manifestly the mother's loss of support is $50 a month, or $600 a year, regardless of how long that support has been continuing, and compensation for the loss must be upon that basis, and not upon the basis of what the son has actually contributed in the short time the condition of dependency has existed. In the present case, the facts as to dependency are merely reversed. A period of total dependency is succeeded by a short period of but partial dependency. During the first period the employee has contributed at the rate of $145 a month, and during the second at the rate of only $45 a month. It is plain that the loss of support to the dependents incurred by the employee's death is the latter rate.

In addition to this line of reasoning, based upon the fundamental theory of the act as to the compensation granted by it, there is the language of the act itself. It provides that not only shall the question of the condition of dependency as entire or partial be determined as of the date of injury to the employee, but also that the extent of dependency shall be determined as of that date. The provision of the statute that in cases of partial dependency the death benefit shall be proportioned to the amount of the annual contribution of the employee is but a provision that the death benefit shall be proportional to the extent of the dependency, so that the effect of the two provisions is that it is the annual contribution as of the time of injury that is to be taken. This can be only a rate of contribution, since it is a point and not a period of time by which the contribution is to be determined. We would add that the rate of contribution at the time of injury is by no means necessarily to be determined by the contributions made during the last month of the employee's life, as counsel for the Commission would seem to assume. There may have been no contributions in the last month. The employee may have been contributing in quarterly installments, for example, and the last month may not have happened to be a month of payment. But there would nevertheless be a rate of contribution existing as of the date of injury. It is this rate which the Commission must determine from all the facts in the case, and, when they have determined it, it is three times the amount of the annual contribution according to this rate which the law says shall be the amount of the death benefit.

[2] A number of arguments in support of the award are advanced, but with one exception they are all answered directly or indirectly, by what has been said, or else by the express language of the statute itself. The exception mentioned is not so much an argument in support of the award as it is one that the award, even though erroneous, cannot be set aside. It is that the power of the court to annul an award of the Commission is confined to those cases wherein the Commission has made a finding as to some jurisdictional fact which is not supported by the evidence, and that it does not go to a case where upon the facts found the Commission has authority to make an award, but has made one contrary to what the law calls for upon those facts. The difficulty arises from the different shades of meaning which the word "jurisdiction" has. As sometimes used, it means simply authority over the subject-matter or question presented. In this sense the Commission undoubtedly had jurisdiction in this case and its award was not without jurisdiction on its part. But the word is frequently used as meaning authority to do the particular thing done, or, putting it conversely, a want of jurisdiction frequently means a want of authority to exercise in a particular manner a power which the board or tribunal has, the doing of something in excess of the authority possessed.

A good illustration of a want of jurisdiction of this latter sort is the imposing by a court upon a person convicted of crime of a sentence in excess of that permitted by the statute. The court had jurisdiction to sentence the convicted person, but it did not have jurisdiction to impose a sentence not permitted by law; that is, it acted in excess of its power in so doing. Such excesses of jurisdiction can be reviewed on certiorari. The code section so provides (section 1068, Code Civ. Proc.), and, in particular, section 67(a) of the Workmen's Compensation Act says that any party affected by a final order of the Commission—

"may appeal to the Supreme Court of this state * * * for a writ of certiorari * * * for the purpose of having the lawfulness of the original order * * * inquired into and determined."

It is the lawfulness of the award in question that is now under consideration. Upon the facts found the statute prescribed the amount to be allowed as a death benefit, and the Commission, in allowing a different amount, rendered an unlawful award, and one in excess of its authority.

The award is annulled, and the matter involved remanded to the Industrial Accident Commission for such further proceedings and order as are not inconsistent with the views expressed herein.

In re PHELPS' ESTATE.

CHIPMAN v. LORD.

(S. F. 9644.)

Executors and administrators ⊜497—Statutory commission of executors covers services until final settlement and distribution.

Aside from any extra allowance for extraordinary services, the commission on the amount of estate accounted for by an executor as fixed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1618, is intended to be full compensation for all services during the entire administration to the time of final settlement and distribution, so that an executor cannot recover an additional allowance for ordinary services subsequent to the filing of a final account, the order of distribution on which was reversed on appeal and a different distribution ordered, after which two supplemental accounts were filed before final hearing, distribution and settlement of accounts.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Final accounting by W. F. Chipman, executor of the estate of Josephine A. Phelps, deceased. From an order refusing further compensation on objections by Virginia A. Lord, the executor appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 179 Cal. 816, 178 Pac. 849; 190 Pac. 17.

W. C. Sharpsteen, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by W. F. Chipman, one of the executors of the estate of Josephine A. Phelps, deceased, from an order of the superior court, refusing to allow him further compensation as executor of the estate upon the settlement of his third supplemental final account thereof.

The final account and petition for distribution of the estate was filed on June 12, 1919. An order of distribution was made thereon, from which an appeal was taken, and thereupon the order was reversed, and the court below was ordered to make a different distribution thereof. On July 22, 1920, a second supplemental account was filed, showing the receipts and expenses of the executors during the interval between that date and the original decree of distribution. The petition for distribution and this account came up for hearing on August 5, 1920. Thereupon a third supplemental account was filed covering the interval between the filing of the second supplemental account and the time of hearing. In the second supplemental account the said executor asked that his compensation for his services as executor be fixed and directed to be paid.

The total value of the estate accounted for was $539,388.82, upon which the executors were allowed the regular statutory commissions as fixed by section 1618 of the Code of Civil Procedure, amounting to $4,071.94. An error of $45 here appears in favor of the executors. Upon the final hearing in August, 1920, Chipman asked for an additional allowance as executor for services subsequent to the filing of the final account in June, 1919. He did not file any claim showing any extraordinary services, but claims compensation on the theory that the estate was closed at the time he filed the final account in June, 1919, and that for his services as executor subsequent thereto he is entitled to compensation in addition to that fixed by the Code. It appears from the record that the services rendered subsequent to the account of June, 1919, consisted of the performance of the ordinary duties of an executor, such as the leasing of the property, collection of rents due on the property and of interest due on claims owing to the estate, and the paying out of such moneys as were necessary for the completion of the administration.

Section 1618 aforesaid provides that the executor of an estate must be allowed certain commissions "upon the amount of estate accounted for by him," according to certain graded percentages upon the amount as therein fixed; that if there are two or more of them the "compensation shall be apportioned among them by the court according to the services actually rendered by them respectively"; that for any extraordinary services the court shall make a "just and reasonable" allowance, not exceeding one-half the regular commissions as fixed by the section, and that all contracts with an heir, devisee, or legatee for a higher compensation than that allowed by the section shall be void. It is plain from these provisions that, aside from any extra allowance that may be proper for extraordinary services, the commission fixed by the section is intended to be full compensation to the executors for all services rendered by them during the entire administration of the estate from the beginning thereof down to the time of the final settlement of the estate and the distribution thereof to the persons entitled thereto. The administration did not close at the time of the rendition and settlement of the account of 1919. The appeal then taken extended the administration, and when that order was reversed the full administration could not be complete until the final order of distribution was made, and all accounts of the executors adjusted and settled. The fees already received by the executors according to the statutory schedule were therefore full compensation for all the services which had been rendered from the beginning of the administration until the final settlement of the third supplemental account in August, 1920. The court below properly refused to allow further commissions.

The order is affirmed.

McDOUGALD, Treasurer, v. FIRST FEDERAL TRUST CO. et al. ((S. F. 9510.)

1. Taxation ⊂=869—Inheritance of community property taxable.

Community property going to the wife upon the death of the husband is taxable as an inheritance.

2. Taxation ⊂=861—Inheritance law in force at time of death controls.

The inheritance tax law in force at the time of death controls as respects taxability of community property inherited by wife on husband's death.

3. Taxation ⊂=861—Where husband's conveyance of community property without consideration was avoided by wife, she took as heir as respects time of taxability of the property.

Where decedent transferred, to be held in trust, all the community property of himself and wife without the consent of the wife required by Civ. Code, § 172, and after his death the wife, by suit against the trustee and beneficiaries of the trust, recovered her half interest in the community property, the wife obtained the property as heir of her husband, the conveyance being treated as to her as a nullity, so that she was liable for inheritance tax thereon; and the date of the wife's taking of her interest in the community property would be the time of her husband's death as regards the inheritance tax law applicable.

4. Judgment ⊂=702—Judgment against husband's administrator seeking to intervene in wife's suit to recover community property held not to affect right of state to recover inheritance tax.

Where a widow sued under Civ. Code, § 172, to set aside her deceased husband's transfer of community property in trust, the denial of the application of the husband's administrator to intervene, he claiming the right to have the widow's half interest in the community property delivered to him for administration and for payment of the collateral inheritance tax, did not affect the right of the state to later collect such inheritance tax from the widow in a proper proceeding; the state not being a party to the action in which the administrator sought to intervene.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Proceeding by John E. McDougald, as Treasurer of the City and County of San Francisco, against First Federal Trust Company, as executor of the last will of Emma Shafter Howard, deceased, and others, to fix an inheritance tax. From a judgment fixing the tax, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. A. Denicke and H. S. Young, both of San Francisco, for appellants Anglo-California Trust Co. and Howard Inv. Co.

J. C. McKinstry and Charles S. Wheeler, both of San Francisco, for appellant First Federal Trust Co.

Charles S. Wheeler and Charles S. Wheeler, Jr., both of San Francisco, for other appellants.

Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco (H. C. Lucas, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This proceeding was instituted by the treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco for the purpose of having an inheritance tax fixed upon the community property interests of Emma Shafter Howard in the estate of her husband, Charles Webb Howard. The property was appraised at $302,565.85 and the tax fixed under the law of 1905 at $6,589.14. The husband died July 17, 1908.

[1, 2] As it is well settled that the community property going to the wife upon the death of the husband is taxable as an inheritance under our laws (Estate of Moffitt, 153 Cal. 359, 95 Pac. 653, 1025, 20 L. R. A. [N. S.] 207), and that the inheritance law in force at the time of death controls (Estate of Stanford, 126 Cal. 112, 54 Pac. 259, 58 Pac. 462, 45 L. R. A. 788), the only questions arising in this case grow out of the fact that in 1903 the decedent transferred all the community property of himself and wife without her consent (see section 172, Civ. Code) to the Central Trust Company to be held in trust under the terms and conditions of a written declaration of trust. After the death of her husband Mrs. Howard brought a suit against the trustee and the beneficiaries of the trust whereby she recovered her half interest in the community property.

[3] The interests of the wife in the community property secured to her by this litigation, by reason of the provisions of section 172, Civil Code, are no longer in doubt. She obtains the property as an heir of the husband. As to her the conveyance is treated as a nullity. Dargie v. Patterson, 176 Cal. 714, 720, 169 Pac. 360. As the wife takes the property as an heir of the husband, and as the conveyance is ignored in determining her rights, it would seem clear that she would be liable for an inheritance tax.

[4] Some point is made of the fact that the administrator of the husband's estate intervened in the action brought by the widow to recover her half interest in the community property and claimed the right to have the widow's half interest in the community property delivered to him for the purpose of administration and for the payment of the collateral inheritance tax. This application was properly denied. Dargie v. Patterson, supra. The right of the state of California to an inheritance tax was not litigated in that proceeding, the state was not a party thereto, and the judgment in favor of the wife has no bearing upon the right of the state of California to recover an inheritance tax except as it shows that the widow has successfully maintained her right to succeed to the community property awarded to her by the judgment.

It would also seem clear from the case of Dargie v. Patterson, supra, that the wife took her interest in the community property at the time of the death of the husband. Appellant points out that under the law of 1903 the wife's interest in the community property was not taxable. If, therefore, the right of the wife was vested in her at the time of the transfer to the trustee, October 1, 1903, or relates back to that date, then the property is not taxable. The claim is that the entire title passed from the husband by his conveyance, that the widow succeeds to the title of the trustee as to one-half of the property, and that under these circumstances section 1 of the act of 1905, in effect at the time of the death of the husband, does not apply for the reason that such section imposed a tax only upon property which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state from any person who may die seized and possessed of the same while a resident of this state.

It is not only claimed that the property in question did not pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state, but also that the property did not pass from a person who was seized or possessed of the same at the moment of his death. The first contention is disposed of by what we have heretofore said in regard to the method by which the wife takes her half of the community property, namely, by succession. The same consideration likewise disposes of the second contention. While it is true that the title passed from the husband at the time of the transfer and could not be attacked as invalid by any one except the wife, the conveyance of this community property, having been made without consideration and without her consent, was voidable at her option. When she exercised her option to have the transfer set aside as to her interest in the community property and secured a judgment of the court having the transfer decreed void as to her interest, the effect of this judgment was to void the transfer from the beginning. The legal consequence of her action was that, so far as she was concerned and so far as her interest in the community property was concerned, the husband remained seized of the property as community property until the moment of his death, at which time it passed to her by law of succession to the same extent as if he had never made any conveyance thereof.

SCHEUERMANN v. KUETEMEYER et ux. (S. F. 8944.)

1. Trial ⊂=142—Nonsuit denied, where fact alleged is reasonably inferable.

While, to withstand motion for nonsuit, the proof must be sufficient to raise more than a mere conjecture or surmise that the fact is as alleged, yet, if the evidence is such that a rational, well-constructed mind can reasonably draw from it the conclusion that the fact exists, nonsuit must be denied.

2. Highways ⊂=184(3)—Nonsuit is improperly granted on evidence that in daylight pedestrian was struck from behind by automobile.

Where evidence showed that in broad daylight, about noon, a pedestrian on a gravel strip along the side of a paved highway was struck without warning by an automobile coming from behind, nonsuit in his action for damages against the driver of the automobile was improperly granted, though, by reason of the plaintiff's becoming unconscious when struck, he was unable to show exactly how it was that the machine happened to hit him, for the accident was inferably caused by the negligence of the driver of the car.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William S. Wells, Judge.

Action by August G. Scheuermann against Henry F. Kuetemeyer and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. A. Berlin, of Oakland, for appellant.

Snook & Church and Chas. E. Snook, all of Oakland (George M. Naus, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries received by him as a result of being struck by an automobile driven by Mildred Kuetemeyer, the wife of her codefendant. The automobile, according to the testimony of Mrs. Kuetemeyer, was bought from the earnings of her husband, and was owned by her husband and herself. The accident was alleged to be due to the negligent operation of the automobile. At the close of the plaintiff's case, a motion for a nonsuit was made by defendants, and this motion was granted by the court. Plaintiff appeals from this judgment of nonsuit.

The only ground specified for a nonsuit, that is discussed in any of the briefs, or that merits consideration, is the failure of the evidence to sufficiently show any negligence in the operation of the automobile. Plaintiff's case, as shown by the evidence introduced on his behalf, may be stated in comparatively few words:

On June 14, 1917, some time between 11 a. m. and noon, the plaintiff, returning from a call upon a relative, was walking in a westerly direction upon a public highway leading from Niles to Hayward, in Alameda county, at a point near Hayward. The highway was 24 feet wide, and consisted of a paved strip 16 or 18 feet wide, and, on each side of this strip, a strip of gravel and cement 3 or 4 feet wide. Plaintiff was walking along the gravel strip on the northerly side of this highway, the right-hand side as he walked in a westerly direction. While so walking, in a place where, of course, he had the right to be, he was suddenly and without warning violently struck from behind by the automobile driven by Mrs. Kuetemeyer, who was also proceeding in a westerly direction along this highway. The result was that he was thrown to the ground, rendered unconscious, and seriously injured. Having been without warning of the approach of the machine from behind until struck and rendered unconscious, he was not able to disclose further how the thing happened. So far as appears, the only other persons who observed the accident are Mrs. Kuetemeyer and the two ladies who were with her in the automobile, and none of these ladies has testified with relation thereto. Mrs. Kuetemeyer, called by the plaintiff, did testify that she was driving the machine, which was a Ford automobile, at the time of the accident, that it belonged to her husband and herself, that she had a chauffeur's license to drive, that she had driven a machine about once a week for two months and felt competent to run it, that it was her machine that struck plaintiff, and that the machine was bought from the earnings of her husband.

The plaintiff testified that Mr. and Mrs. Kuetemeyer called on him the next day while he was disabled, and that Mrs. Kuetemeyer tried to explain "that she had to get out of the way and run into" him. Mr. Becker, the uncle of plaintiff, to whom plaintiff had made his visit prior to the accident, testified that he was brought back to his place after the accident in defendants' machine, and that Mrs. Kuetemeyer said she wanted to make things right; that they ran the man down and could not help it, because there were so many machines together; that she ran the man down, and wanted "to make right what is right"; that she "run the man down off from the road." A Mr. Lazarus testified that, driving along this road in his own machine, he came to the place of the accident and stopped there, owing to the presence of "a lot of machines and more or less excitement." He found defendants' machine turned "right across the road," the front wheel "more or less in the gutter," the plaintiff in the machine, apparently injured and dazed, and Mrs. Kuetemeyer standing beside it. Some one asked him to turn the machine around, and he did so and put it on the road. It is conceded, of course, that the width of the paved portion of the road was ample to permit two machines to pass.

[1, 2] While the evidence introduced by plaintiff did not show exactly how it was that Mrs. Kuetemeyer happened to allow her machine to come into contact with plaintiff, we are utterly unable to perceive any good reason for holding that it did not make a sufficient prima facie case of negligence in the matter of her operation of the machine to go to a jury or trial judge for determination of the fact. Of course, it cannot be disputed that the motion for a nonsuit admitted the truth of the evidence in behalf of plaintiff and every inference of fact that might reasonably be drawn therefrom. It is true, as was said in Janin v. London, etc., Bank, 92 Cal. 14, 27, 27 Pac. 1100, 14 L. R. A. 320, 27 Am. St. Rep. 82, that the proof must be sufficient to raise more than a mere conjecture or surmise that the fact is as alleged, and that "it must be such that a rational, well-constructed mind can reasonably draw from it the conclusion that the fact exists"; but, where the evidence is such that "a rational, well-constructed mind can reasonably draw from it the conclusion that the fact exists," it is a sufficient answer to a motion for nonsuit. We are not concerned here with any question of the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, as to which a great deal is said in the briefs. The simple question is whether the matters appearing are such as to reasonably warrant, in the absence of any explanation or denial, an inference of negligence on the part of the driver of the car. We venture to say that it seems to us to be the natural inference, and that any conclusion to the contrary would be based on pure conjecture and surmise. In broad daylight, about 12 o'clock noon, a pedestrian is walking along a public highway, on his own side of the road, and off the paved portion ordinarily used by machines, when he is suddenly struck from behind by an automobile that has come upon him without any warning of its approach.

There is nothing to indicate any basis for a conclusion of negligence on his part. The driver of the machine is at its wheel, and there is nothing to indicate that there was anything wrong about the machine itself. In fact, it does appear that it was driven away after the accident. The paved portion of the highway was amply wide for the passage of two automobiles. There is testimony that the driver had admitted that she ran plaintiff down "off from the road," but could not help doing so; the explanation why she could not being most general and very vague. Her own testimony showed that she was a comparatively inexperienced driver, having driven the machine only about once a week for two months. There was nothing to indicate the existence of any emergency requiring the driver to leave the paved portion of the highway. The thing that happened, the leaving of its course by an automobile and the running down by it from behind of a pedestrian who is lawfully pursuing his way along the unpaved portion of the highway, in entire ignorance of its approach and without any negligence whatever on his part, is certainly not a thing that ordinarily happens if the driver is exercising due care; that is, if there is nothing wrong with the machine itself. We have seen that there was apparently nothing wrong with the machine.

In determining in favor of plaintiff the question of the correctness of the ruling of the trial court in granting the motion for a nonsuit, it is not essential to hold that the evidence on his behalf created a "presumption" of negligence on the part of the driver, or, uncontradicted, as matter of law established his case, but simply that it was such as to warrant the jury or trial judge, as reasonable men, to infer therefrom that the accident was due to negligence on the part of the driver of the car. That it was such we have no doubt whatever.

Learned counsel for respondents relies particularly upon three decisions of this court, none of which appears to us to be at variance with our conclusion. In Tower v. Humboldt Transit Co., 176 Cal. 602, 169 Pac. 227, a street car, operated on railway tracks, had run into the plaintiff as she lay partly on one of the rails, unconscious because of having fainted while crossing the track, she said. It was dark, or between dusk and dark. There was a conflict in the evidence on the question of negligence on the part of the employees of the defendant. They claimed that, though exercising reasonable care, they did not see her in time to avoid the accident. Under these circumstances the trial judge instructed the jury in such a way as to apply the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur; the effect of the instruction being, as said by this court, to make "mere proof of the accident suffice to impose on the defendant responsibility for such injury." Upon the facts of that case it was held, as is clear, that "the instruction was inapplicable, and therefore misleading." Manifestly, the strictures of the court as to the instruction were correct. The court did not intimate that the evidence was not sufficient to support a verdict in plaintiff's favor, and expressly said so.

In Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 Pac. 38, there was a collision between the wagon on which plaintiff was riding and the defendant's automobile. The trial court directed a verdict in defendant's favor. It was said that in that kind of a case "negligence is not to be inferred from the mere fact of injury," or from the mere fact of collision producing an injury, which is, of course, true, not only as to that case, but as to this also. The court said:

"The testimony on behalf of plaintiff was very indefinite, and, giving it all the weight which it could fairly bear, it went no further than to show that there had been a collision between the wagon and the automobile. *There was a total lack of proof of any circumstances from which it might * * * be inferred that the collision was caused by any want of care on the part of the driver of the automobile, rather than by the negligence of the driver of the wagon, or by accident without fault on the part of anyone.*" (Italics ours.)

A very different situation is here presented, as we have seen. Here it is certainly true that if the motion for a nonsuit had been denied, and the defendants had failed to offer any evidence, the evidence on behalf of plaintiff, in the absence of any attempt at explanation by defendants, would have furnished ample support for a decision in his favor.

In Depons v. Ariss, 188 Pac. 797, an appeal from a judgment on the merits in favor of the defendants, it was correctly said that in this state negligence is not presumed from the mere fact of injury, and it was held that negligence could not be implied from the particular circumstances surrounding the accident, as shown by the evidence in the case. In other words, the circumstances of that case were not such as to reasonably warrant an inference of negligence. A reading of the opinion will demonstrate the material difference in facts between that case and this. It must be held that the trial court erred in granting the motion for a nonsuit.

In re LUBIN'S ESTATE. (L. A. 6695.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1921.)

1. Wills ⟸14—Jewish synagogue held "charitable corporation" within statute prohibiting bequests to such within 30 days before testator's death.

A Jewish synagogue organized for religious purposes under Civ. In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edgar A. Luce, Judge.

In the matter of the Estate of William Lubin, deceased. From an order on final distribution holding bequests to a Jewish synagogue void, the legatee appeals. Affirmed.

J. Weinberger and Johnson W. Puterbaugh, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Wm. L. Morrison, A. Rosenthal, and Wright & McKee, all of San Diego, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. One William Lubin died, leaving a will whereby he made two bequests to the Congregation of Beth Israel of San Diego; one of $5,000 for beautifying its cemetery, and one of $1,000 for beautifying its temple. The will was made within 30 days of the testator's death, and because of this fact the probate court on final distribution held the bequests void under section 1313, Civil Code. The Congregation appeals.

The material portion of section 1313, Civil Code, reads:

"No estate, real or personal, shall be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses, except the same be done by will duly executed at least thirty days before the decease of the testator."

The claims of the appellants are that it is not a charitable corporation, and also, as to the $5,000 bequest, that the beautifying of the cemetery is not a charitable use. It is difficult to see anything of substance in either claim.

[1] The appellant is a Jewish synagogue organized for religious purposes under the sections of the Code (sections 593–605, Civ. Code) providing for the formation of corporations for religious, social, and benevolent purposes. That such a society or corporation is a charitable one within the legal meaning given to the word "charitable" is beyond question. 11 Cor. Juris, 320; Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 457; Estate of Hewitt, 94 Cal. 376, 29 Pac. 775; Estate of Hamilton, 181 Cal. 758, 186 Pac. 587. The contention of the appellant is that, although it is a religious corporation, it is not a charitable corporation, because its by-laws provide that its members shall be elected by its board of directors and shall pay an admission fee, and that the full privileges of the Congregation are limited to members. The argument is that because of these limitations the appellant is not an organization for public benefit, either for the benefit of the public generally or for a particular class of the public, but is for the benefit of the particular individuals who make up the membership, and therefore comes within the rule of Estate of Dol, 187 Pac. 428. The immediate answer to this is that the by-laws relied upon do not have the effect of limiting the purpose of the corporation to that of benefiting in a religious way only those particular individuals who happen at the time to be members of the corporation. The appellant's articles of incorporation specify:

"That the purposes for which it is formed is for (sic) the purpose of religious worship after the manner of the Jews, and for constructing a synagogue for that purpose, and acquiring real estate for the site of such synagogue and for burial purposes."

The by-laws themselves begin with a somewhat fuller statement of the objects of the organization, specifying in effect that they are adopted for the furtherance of those objects. They commence thus:

"The members of this Congregation, anxious to preserve, cherish, and exercise the doctrines and precepts of the Mosaic religion, solicitous of perpetuating the time-hallowed ancestral institutions for the establishment of public worship in accordance with the principles and ritual of reform Judaism, desirous of maintaining schools for the instruction of the youth in the principles of Judaism, and wishing to make proper provision for the interment of the dead —have adopted the following constitution and by-laws."

It is manifest that the by-laws are merely regulations adopted for the more effective carrying out of the objects so stated; that those objects are primarily to form a religious body for worship according to the Jewish faith, and far transcend any such exceedingly narrow purpose as that of benefiting solely those who happen to belong to the organization; and that the provisions as to admission to membership are merely regulations designed to safeguard the organization against the admission of unworthy members, and are in no wise intended to so narrow the broad and beneficent purposes declared as fundamentally to change their character. In fact, any such narrowing of the purposes for which the appellant exists would be an essential departure from the spirit of the faith which it professes to follow. We have no hesitation in holding that the appellant is a religious organization organized and existing for the benefit of all of like faith. It is therefore a charitable organization within the legal meaning of that word.

[2] As to the claim that the beautifying of the appellant's cemetery is not a charitable use, it proceeds upon much the same argument. It is not contended that a cemetery may not be a charitable use, but it is contended that the cemetery of the appellant is not such because it is not a place of public burial for all persons alike, but for those of the Jewish faith only, and of these for those only who are members of the Congregation. A cemetery may, of course, be conducted for profit or in some other manner that precludes it from being considered as charitable in nature, just as a hospital may be. But it may also, like a hospital, be conducted in such a manner as to make it charitable in nature, and when, as here, it is conducted by a religious organization charitable in nature and as one of the religious objects of the organization and for the benefit of those of the faith which the organization professes, its charitable nature would seem to be clear. Such is the established rule. 11 Cor. Juris, 324, and cases there cited. As to the limitation of the absolute right of burial to those who are members of the Congregation, suffice it to say that the practice has been to admit all who are members of the Jewish faith, although a higher fee is charged nonmembers than members, and also that since the privilege of burial is open to all members, and there is no restriction on membership by those of the Jewish faith other than the regulation mentioned designed to protect the Congregation against unworthy members, the privilege is, in effect, open to those of the Jewish faith as a class. This is sufficient.

Judgment affirmed.

MORA v. FAVILLA. (S. F. 9213.)

1. Municipal corporations ⊂=816(8)—In suit for injuries on wet walk, allegation of contributory negligence held not to limit proof to intoxication.

In an action for personal injuries by falling on a wet sidewalk, defendant's answer that such injuries were contributed to and proximately caused by plaintiff's intoxicated condition and his carelessness and negligence did not limit plaintiff's contribution to the accident to proof of a state of intoxication, but covered want of care in any other particular.

2. Negligence ⊂=6—Violation of ordinance negligence.

An act in violation of an ordinance is presumptively an act of negligence and conclusively so until rebutted by evidence that it was justifiable or excusable under the circumstances.

3. Trial ⊂=296(4, 5)—Instruction to find for defendant if contributory negligence proximate cause of injury held not prejudicial.

In an action for personal injuries, where the jury was instructed that a want of ordinary care by plaintiff concurring or co-operating with defendant's negligence as the cause of the injury constitutes contributory negligence, an instruction to find for defendant if plaintiff's negligence was the proximate cause of the accident, even if too broad, was without prejudice.

4. Municipal corporations ⊂=822(4)—Instruction suggesting proof of intoxication essential condition to finding plaintiff injured on walk contributorily negligent erroneous.

In an action for personal injuries by falling on a wet sidewalk, an instruction that it was for the jury to determine whether plaintiff was intoxicated at the time of the accident, and, if he was not and the injury was sustained without any contributory negligence on his part, to find a verdict in his favor, was erroneous, as suggesting that proof of intoxication was essential to finding him contributorily negligent.

5. Trial ⊂=253(9)—Instruction to find for plaintiff if not negligent erroneous, not requiring proof of defendant's negligence.

In an action for personal injuries by falling on a wet sidewalk, an instruction that, if plaintiff was not contributorily negligent, to find a verdict for him, was erroneous as instructing a verdict for plaintiff without reference to proof of defendant's negligence.

6. Municipal corporations ⊂=822(5)—Instructions on care required of plaintiff held within issues of fact shown by evidence.

In an action for injuries by falling on a slippery sidewalk washed with a hose during prohibited hours, instructions that, if plaintiff knew the walk was wet and failed to use ordinary care, and knew or had reason to know it was dangerous to pass over it, and there was another safe and convenient way he could have taken, and that if defendant warned him and requested him not to pass over it, plaintiff could not recover, held within the issues raised by the evidence.

7. Municipal corporations ⊂=805(1)—One not justified in walking on slippery sidewalk if he knew or should have known of its condition.

Though a sidewalk is made slippery by the negligence of another in washing it with a hose during prohibited hours, one is not justified in passing over it if he had knowledge or warning of its condition and knew or ought to have known that he was liable to slip and fall, and if he could have avoided it by slight change of route.

8. Municipal corporations ⊂=817(3)—Presumption pedestrian can safely make detour around dangerous place in sidewalk.

In an action for injuries by falling on a slippery sidewalk caused by defendant's negligence in wetting it with a hose, though there was no evidence of any conveniently safe alternative to avoid passing down the walk, it may be presumed as a matter of common knowledge, the locality of the accident being a downtown residence street, that there were sidewalks on each side and a roadway between, and that it was not so congested with travel that a pedestrian could not make a detour around a dangerous place in a sidewalk.

9. Municipal corporations ⊂=821(26)—Whether one injured by falling on wet sidewalk should have avoided same for jury.

In an action for injuries by falling on a slippery sidewalk, it was for the jury to determine whether or not in the exercise of reasonable prudence plaintiff should have made an attempt to avoid it.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Dino Della Mora against C. Favilla. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

O'Gara & De Martini, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Frank J. Egan and Jos. A. Brown, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This appeal is by defendant from a judgment awarding damages to the plaintiff for personal injuries suffered by him in falling upon a wet and slippery sidewalk in front of defendant's premises.

On a former trial of the action the verdict of the jury and judgment was for the defendant. On appeal an order for a new trial granted by the trial court was affirmed. Mora v. Favilla, 37 Cal. App. 164, 173 Pac. 770. On the second trial the verdict and judgment appealed from fixed plaintiff's damages at the sum of $2,500. This amount was reduced to $1,800, with the consent of plaintiff, as a condition made by the trial court in denying defendant's motion for another new trial.

The alleged negligence of defendant consisted in his having wet down the sidewalk with a hose just prior to the time that plaintiff was injured, about 10 o'clock in the forenoon, in violation of a city ordinance which prohibited the wetting down or washing of sidewalks between the hours of 8 in the morning and 6 in the evening.

The walk in question is on Montgomery street in the city of San Francisco, and at a steep place in the street presenting a grade of about 20 per cent. In attempting to pass down this strip of sidewalk the plaintiff slipped and fell, breaking his leg.

[1] The defendant by his answer alleged contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. Plaintiff's negligence was sufficiently pleaded. It was averred:

"That during all said times plaintiff was intoxicated, reckless, indifferent, and thoughtless as to the consequences of his movements; that any and all injuries, if any, received and sustained by plaintiff as set out in the complaint on file herein were so received and sustained by him and caused to him solely by reason of his intoxicated condition aforesaid and of his own recklessness, negligence, and lack of ordinary care; that the alleged injuries to plaintiff were contributed to and proximately caused by the said intoxicated condition of plaintiff, and the carelessness and negligence aforesaid, and if it had not been for said intoxicated condition, carelessness, and negligence of plaintiff, no injury or injuries would have been suffered by or inflicted upon plaintiff because of or as a result of the conduct of defendant complained of in said complaint."

The alleged contribution of plaintiff to his accident is not limited to proof of a state of intoxication, but covers negligence and want of care in any other particular.

[2] Conceding the sufficiency of the evidence to make a prima facie showing that defendant was guilty of negligence in turning water upon the sidewalk at the time of day indicated, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to use the walk with full knowledge that it was wet, we agree with the contention of defendant that material issues in the case were taken from the jury by erroneous instructions given for defendant and by refusal to grant certain instructions asked by plaintiff.

Instruction numbered 1, complained of on this appeal, is not in itself subject to serious criticism. It instructs the jury that the violation of an ordinance constitutes negligence in itself.

An act which is performed in violation of an ordinance or statute is presumptively an act of negligence, and while the defendant is permitted to rebut such presumption by showing that the act was justifiable or excusable under the circumstances, until so rebutted it is conclusive. Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 56, 58, 161 Pac. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560; Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, p. 13; Cragg v. L. A. Trust Co., 154 Cal. 663, 667, 98 Pac. 1063, 16 Ann. Cas. 1061; Squier v. Davis Standard Bread Co., 181 Cal. 533, 185 Pac. 391.

[3] In this instruction as it stands there is no condition stated as to the effect of contributory negligence on the right of recovery, but respondent claims that such omission is cured by instructions numbers 5 and 6, which correctly define contributory negligence, and inform the jury that it must find for the defendant if the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence at the time of the happening of the accident in question, and if such negligence on his part was the proximate cause of the accident.

It is objected that the statement in this instruction as to the contributory negligence being the "proximate cause" of the accident is too broad. In view of the fact, however, that in the instruction immediately preceding the jury was told that a want of ordinary care by plaintiff "concurring or co-operating with the negligent act of the defendant" as the cause of the injury constitutes contributory negligence, this instruction may be held without prejudice.

[4, 5] But in summing up the charge to the jury the court in an oral instruction used the following language:

"Some evidence has been introduced here as to the condition of the plaintiff with respect to sobriety at the time of the injury in question. You have heard this testimony, and you are to determine from that what in fact was his condition. It is a question of fact for you to determine whether he was at that time intoxicated or not. If you should find that he was not, and that the injury was sustained without any contributory negligence on his part, then it is your duty to find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff."

Coming after the written instructions presented by the parties to the action, in an oral statement of the law of the case by the court, the instruction was likely taken by the jury as a summing up of the view of the court upon the questions presented. It contains two grounds of objection: First, it suggests that proof of a state of intoxication on the part of plaintiff is an essential condition to finding him guilty of contributory negligence; and, secondly, it instructs a verdict in such case for the plaintiff without reference to proof of the defendant's negligence. In fact, the earlier part of this oral charge practically fixes the negligence of the defendant as a matter of law. The trial judge says:

"Now, the plaintiff in this case has established, concededly, a violation of the ordinance. That of itself was negligence on the part of the defendant."

There was an attempt under the evidence in behalf of defendant to show that the sidewalk was in such a dirty and dangerous condition by reason of boys of the neighborhood having been sliding down the incline of the walk on greased boards as to justify washing it off at any time of day irrespective of the inhibition of the ordinance. This condition was disputed on behalf of plaintiff, but it may well be contended that the facts in evidence raised a question for the jury as to whether or not the defendant was guilty of negligence in washing the sidewalk, although in violation of the ordinance, or even that the water on the sidewalk was the proximate cause of plaintiff falling and suffering injury. It is common knowledge that it is difficult to remove grease with water, particularly cold water from a hose, and it may well be that the remains of the grease which defendant had attempted to remove caused plaintiff to fall. And, in any event, it was for the jury to determine, in the light of this claim of necessity for washing the sidewalk, whether the act of using the hose at the forbidden time of day established a want of ordinary care and prudence. It may sometimes happen that prudence and safety to life and limb require the doing of an act which otherwise would be a violation of law. Squier v. Davis Standard Bread Co., 181 Cal. 533, 535, 185 Pac. 391. It is difficult to escape the conclusion that there was prejudicial error in the construction of the law given by the instruction. Taken in connection with the refusal of the court to give certain instructions asked by defendant, which would have cured error in the instructions given, we think a new trial should be had.

[6] The following instructions, presented on behalf of defendant, were refused:

"(13) If you find from the evidence that plaintiff knew that said sidewalk was wet and he did not use the care that a person of ordinary prudence would have used in passing over said sidewalk under the circumstances, and in consequence fell and suffered his injuries, then I instruct you that plaintiff cannot recover. * * *

"(15) If you find from the evidence that plaintiff at the time he attempted to pass over said sidewalk in front of defendant's building situate on Montgomery street, in this city, and designated as Nos. 1130–1132 Montgomery street, knew that it was dangerous or unsafe to attempt to pass over said sidewalk, or knew or had reason to know and should have known that it was imprudent for him to attempt to pass over said sidewalk, and you further find that there was at hand another safe and convenient way which he could have easily and readily have taken in going the way he desired to go, and that nevertheless he attempted to pass over said sidewalk, and in consequence fell and came to his injuries, then I instruct you that plaintiff was negligent in attempting to pass over said sidewalk and cannot recover.

"(16) Even if defendant was negligent because he violated Ordinance No. 1035, respecting the washing of sidewalks, which was read in evidence, and even if you find that the washing of said sidewalk did cause or occasion plaintiff's fall and his injuries, still, if you find that the said sidewalk was at the time plaintiff attempted to walk over it in such condition that it was then apparent and would have been apparent then to any person of ordinary prudence who was about to walk over said sidewalk or attempted to walk over said sidewalk that it was dangerous to attempt to cross said sidewalk, and you further find that defendant warned plaintiff that said sidewalk over which he was about to pass had been washed and requested him not to pass over said sidewalk, but to pass in the street, and you further find that plaintiff could have easily and conveniently avoided passing over said sidewalk by taking another safe and convenient way, and that there was plainly at hand another safe and convenient way which he could easily and readily have taken in going the way he desired to go, and that nevertheless he attempted to pass over said sidewalk, and in consequence fell and received his injuries, then I instruct you plaintiff cannot recover, and you must find in favor of defendant.

"(17) If you find that the said sidewalk in front of defendant's said building was before and at the time defendant began to wash said sidewalk greasy, and in consequence dangerously slippery and seriously dangerous to defendant, the members of his family then living in said building, and to pedestrians that should pass over said sidewalk, and seriously impaired to defendant the enjoyment of said building, then I instruct you that the defendant had the right to remove said danger from said sidewalk by the reasonable use of the means necessary to remove said danger, even though he did so within the hours of 8 o'clock a. m. and 6 o'clock p. m."

These proposed instructions state the law with substantial correctness, and, we think, were within the issues of fact before the jury on the evidence.

Plaintiff himself testified that as he approached this strip of sidewalk the defendant was in front of his premises turning the water upon and over the sidewalk from an inch and a half hose, and that the water was running over the surface of the walk. He therefore knew that the sidewalk was wet. Defendant states in his testimony that he warned plaintiff of the condition of the walk. He testified:

"When plaintiff came out of Mrs. Modena's house he was coming down in this manner (witness illustrates by staggering), and when he was in front of me and I told him to pass on that side for it was damp on this side. He was about to approach and pass in front of me; he don't want to go on the other side, but he come on towards me, * * * and at the same time he fell on the ground."

[7] Conceding that defendant was negligent and that the sidewalk was in a dangerous condition by reason of defendant's fault, this did not justify the plaintiff in passing over it if he had knowledge or warning of its condition, and if he knew, or ought as a reasonable man to have known, that he was liable to slip and fall.

The evidence presented an issue on this point, and plaintiff was entitled to an instruction as to plaintiff's duty under such a state of facts.

The fact that defendant had wrongfully and unlawfully created a dangerous condition of the sidewalk would not excuse plaintiff in exposing himself to injury if he knew or had warning of the dangerous condition and could with a slight change of route have avoided it.

[8, 9] It is said there is no evidence in the record that there was any conveniently safe alternative open to plaintiff to avoid passing down this walk. It sufficiently appears that the locality of the accident was a downtown street of the city of San Francisco. It may be presumed as a matter of common knowledge that there were two sides to the street with sidewalks on each side, and a roadway between. It also may be inferred from the record that it was a residence district and presumptively not so congested with travel that a pedestrian could not safely make a detour around a dangerous place in the sidewalk. It, at most, was fairly a matter for the jury to determine whether or not in the exercise of reasonable prudence the plaintiff should have made an attempt to avoid this wet sidewalk. The instruction as to his duty in the premises, if he knew or was warned of his danger, should have been given.

We think also the instruction should have been given informing the jury that the presumption of negligence from disobedience of the ordinance forbidding turning water on the sidewalk after 8 in the morning was not conclusive, but was subject to rebuttal by evidence of an overruling necessity for such act to avoid more serious danger to pedestrians passing over that portion of the street.

There was sufficient evidence bearing on this point to require its submission to the jury under such an instruction.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; LENNON, J.

WILBUR, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal. By Ordinance No. 1035 of the city and county of San Francisco, it is declared unlawful for any person to wash or cause to be washed any sidewalk or street, with a hose or otherwise, between the hours of 8 o'clock a. m. and 6 o'clock p. m. It was conceded by the defendant that some time between 9 and 10 o'clock a. m. he washed down the sidewalk in front of his premises using a hose for this purpose. The court correctly instructed the jury in instruction No. 8:

"Hence such act was in violation of the ordinance, and that violation constitutes negligence in and of itself. In order, however, for any plaintiff who brings an action to recover damages for injuries sustained or alleged to have been sustained on account of the injuries suffered, it must appear that the injuries suffered resulted from negligence on the part of the defendant, and that such negligence was the immediate and proximate cause of the injuries of which plaintiff complains. Now, the plaintiff in this case has established, concededly, violation of the ordinance. That of itself was negligence on the part of the defendant. Now, then, in order to enable the plaintiff, however, to recover upon that ground, it must appear that the violation of the ordinance directly contributed to the plaintiff's injury."

The court instructed the jury to the same effect in instruction No. 1 and in instruction No. 2. By instruction No. 1 the jury were informed:

That a violation of the ordinance constituted negligence, and that, if they found "that the plaintiff slipped and fell by reason of the wet condition of the sidewalk so caused by the defendant, and that the plaintiff thereby broke his leg, that your verdict should be for the plaintiff for such amount as you believe from the evidence the plaintiff is entitled to."

Instruction No. 2 was to the same effect, concluding as follows:

"And thereby caused the same to become wet, and that by reason of the wet condition of said sidewalk, and without any negligence on his part, plaintiff slipped and broke his leg, your verdict must be for the plaintiff."

By instruction No. 3 the jury were informed that the negligence of the defendant in order to justify a recovery must be the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.

Two defenses were relied upon by the defendant: First, that the washing of the sidewalk was necessary by reason of the fact that the walk was dirty and greasy; the second, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in that he was intoxicated, "and because of his intoxicated condition plaintiff failed to exercise ordinary care for his own safety; that during all of said times plaintiff was intoxicated, reckless, indifferent, and thoughtless as to the consequences of his movements;" that his injuries were received by reason of his intoxicated condition aforesaid and of his own recklessness, negligence, and lack of ordinary care.

With reference to the first defense: It appeared from the defendant's evidence that he discovered the day before that boys were sliding down the sidewalks on greased boards, and as a result the sidewalk had become greasy and slippery. The next day, Sunday, he swept the sidewalk, washed it, and scrubbed it. Defendant testified that he had completed the task of cleaning the sidewalk, and that it had been completely cleansed and the dirt and grease removed more than 20 minutes before the accident happened; that the sidewalk was damp, but not wet or slippery, at the time of the accident. Conceding that it is proper to show in defense of such an action that an act which is within the literal prohibition of the ordinance is nevertheless justifiable and excusable under all the circumstances, either because the act was not within the intent of the legislative body or because some higher obligation required it to be disregarded under the circumstances, it nevertheless appears that under the facts shown by the defendant the court should have held, as it did, that no such excuse or justification was shown, and that therefore the violation of the terms of the ordinance was negligence per se.

With reference to the question of contributory negligence: The defendant testified that the sidewalk was merely damp at the time of the injury, but the plaintiff, on the other hand, testified that the defendant was engaged in washing the sidewalk at the time he approached and was discharging water thereon from an inch and a half hose; that the sidewalk was very wet and slippery; that he took one step and found that the sidewalk was slippery, and when he put his foot down for the second step he slipped and fell before he had an opportunity to retreat. The defendant, on the other hand, testified that he warned the plaintiff of the condition of the sidewalk and advised him to avoid the wet portion of the sidewalk; that plaintiff stopped and talked to him for some time, and upon turning to leave suddenly fell and broke his leg. In this condition of the record the court gave instruction No. 5, defining contributory negligence as follows:

"Contributory negligence is such an act or omission on the part of the plaintiff amounting to a want of ordinary care as, concurring or cooperating with the negligent act of the defendant, is the proximate cause of the injury complained of, but to constitute a defense it must be affirmatively shown by the defendant, unless it has been shown by, or can be inferred from, the evidence of the plaintiff."

The court also gave the oral instruction quoted in the main opinion. It might be inferred by the jury from this latter instruction that it was necessary for them to find that; the plaintiff was intoxicated in order to find that he was guilty of contributory negligence, notwithstanding the fact that contributory negligence was defined in instruction No. 5 as a lack of ordinary care. If it was not negligence as a matter of law for the plaintiff to walk on a wet sidewalk where the conditions were perfectly obvious in broad daylight, where he had observed those conditions and proceeded after such notice to walk upon the sidewalk, a point which we need not determine, it is clear that the defendant was entitled to definite instructions calling the attention of the jury to the law bearing upon that particular question. For this reason I think that instructions 13 and 15 should have been given. I am not certain that instruction 16 should have been given, because under this instruction the plaintiff might have been held negligent for failure to observe the condition of the sidewalk. Perkins v. Sunset T. & T. Co., 155 Cal. 712, 722, 103 Pac. 190. In view of the plaintiff's testimony that he did observe that the sidewalk was wet and was being washed down by the defendant, the instruction was unnecessary, and the matter was fully covered by instructions 13 and 15. I do not agree that instruction No. 17 should have been given. The defendant testified that he observed the slippery condition of the sidewalk about 3:30 p. m. Saturday. This was in ample time to have washed it off in the evening of Saturday or before 8 o'clock Sunday morning, and this opportunity to clean the sidewalk within the period authorized by the ordinance would render his efforts to do so by washing with water within the prohibited hours inexcusable, even if it be conceded that otherwise he would be justified after 8 a. m. Sunday in removing grease or dirt by the use of water. Moreover, the court will take judicial notice or the fact that other means of removing grease, not prohibited by ordinance, were much more effective for that purpose, gasoline, for instance.

I concur: OLNEY, J.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I concur in the judgment.

In view of the circumstances of this case defendant was entitled to have it very clearly made known to the jury that, notwithstanding his violation of the ordinance with the result that he was guilty of negligence, the plaintiff could not recover unless such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. The situation was such that the jury might reasonably have concluded that the fall of plaintiff was not due to the wetting of the sidewalk by defendant. The trial court did in one place tell the jury in general language that plaintiff could not recover unless defendant's violation of the ordinance "directly contributed to the plaintiff's injury," but, taking the charge as a whole, in my opinion it did not so clearly present the matter with relation to the facts of this case as to make it entirely plain that it was essential to plaintiff's case for him to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that his fall was caused by defendant's violation of the ordinance. Under the circumstances certain instructions requested by him on this subject should have been given, viz. defendant's requested instructions 9, 11, and 14.

I think, too, that certain requested instructions going to the question of contributory negligence should have been given, and concur in what is said by Mr. Justice SLOANE on this point.

The case is, to my mind, a close one in the facts, and I cannot regard the matters to which I have referred as unsubstantial.

It does not seem to me that the evidence was such as to afford support for a conclusion that there was any sufficient justification or excuse for defendant's violation of this ordinance. Certainly the fact that the sidewalk was very "dirty" would not be sufficient to do this, and the theory that it was suddenly discovered to be so "greasy" as to be dangerous to pedestrians unless cold water from a hose was at once applied appears to me to be so insufficiently supported by substantial evidence as not to be worthy of serious consideration. In so far as this phase of the case is concerned, I do not think there was any error on the part of the trial court. But on account of the other matters to which I have referred I concur in the judgment.

I concur: LAWLOR, J.

BESSHO et al. v. GENERAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION et al. (L. A. 6116.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1921.)

1. Mines and minerals ⊂=81 — Evidence held sufficient to support implied finding that lessee's possession was such as to put subsequent lessee on inquiry.

In an action by a lessee against an oil company, which was assignee of a subsequent lease, evidence held sufficient to support implied finding of jury that plaintiffs' possession was such as to put the subsequent lesseee on notice or inquiry as to the character of plaintiffs' claim.

2. Mines and minerals ⊂=81—Notice to lessee of possession of former lessee notice to assignee.

Whatever operated as notice to a lessee of the claims of a former lessee in possession also served as notice to his assignee.

3. Mines and minerals ⊂=81—Mere cultivation by lessee under unrecorded lease may be sufficient to put subsequent lessee on inquiry.

Mere cultivation of premises by a lessee on a portion of which the owners of the premises reside may be such actual, open, notorious, visible, and exclusive possession thereof as will serve to put a subsequent lessee on notice or inquiry as to the claims of the former lessee.

4. Mines and minerals ⊂=81—Actual notice of prior unrecorded lease unnecessary to constitute constructive notice.

In a controversy between persons who had leased the same premises, the question is not whether the second lessee actually noticed anything growing on the premises, but whether the first lessee's particular possession was sufficient to constitute constructive notice to him, whether it would put a prudent man upon inquiry; the first lessee's lease being unrecorded.

5. Mines and minerals ⊂=81 — Oil corporation held liable to prior lessee for damage done to crops.

An oil corporation, obtaining a lease on land, was liable to a prior lessee for damage done to crops, even though it did not know that there was a prior lease, where in its lease it agreed to pay for any injury done to crops of lessor, since, having so stipulated, it could not claim that it was a bona fide purchaser, and did not take lease in the belief that it would not be responsible for damage done by its operations to the crops on the land; the prior lessee suing in tort.

6. Guardian and ward ⊂=44 — Execution of lease by guardian in personal capacity binding on ward.

Where a mother, who was duly appointed guardian of her minor children, who collectively owned an undivided half interest in land, executed a lease of the property and signed it only in her personal capacity and not as guardian, it was valid as against her wards.

7. Tenancy in common ⊂=49—Lease by tenant in common binding on other tenants when ratified.

A lease of an entire tract made by one tenant in common is binding on the other tenants when ratified by them, and one method of ratification is the acceptance of benefits under the lease by the cotenants.

8. Guardian and ward ⊂=70 — Accounting by cotenant guardian for proceeds held to show ratification of lease by ward cotenants.

Where a mother who was duly appointed guardian of minor children, her cotenants, executed a lease signed by her only in her personal capacity and not as guardian, and accounted to the court for the proceeds from the land, and one of her children, an adult, expressly assented to the lease, held that the wards ratified the lease, even though they were parties to a subsequent lease of the same property to a third person.

9. Landlord and tenant ⊂=139(4) — Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that landlord jointly participated with subsequent lessee in damaging crops of first lessee.

In an action by a lessee for damages done to crops by a subsequent lessee drilling for oil, evidence held sufficient to support an implied finding of the jury that conduct of landlord amounted to more than a passive permission on her part to the commission of the tort, and amounted to co-operation which would render her jointly liable.

10. Landlord and tenant ⊂=139(4)—Measure of damages for co-operation with subsequent lessee in injuring crops.

Where lessor co-operated with subsequent lessee oil company in injuring crops of plaintiff lessee, who brought action against the oil company and the lessor for damages without alleging or claiming that lessor was liable for a breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment, the measure of damages was not the amount of the proportion of the rent paid by the plaintiff from the time of the damage to the termination of the lease, but was the actual damages sustained.

11. Action ⊂=38(1)—Held that there was no misjoinder of causes of action.

A complaint in an action by a lessee against lessor and subsequent lessee, alleging that the subsequent lessee, an oil corporation, "with the previous knowledge, authorization, consent, and co-operation of the said S. [lessor] wrongfully * * * proceeded to * * * construct on said property an oil well derrick, * * * and destroyed plaintiffs' nursery stock," held to state but one cause of action, and that for injury to property; no relief being sought on the ground of a breach of covenant.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by G. Bessho and others against the General Petroleum Corporation and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. L. Weil, of San Francisco, and Fredericks & Hanna, J. H. Ardis, and W. S. Knott, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Evans & Pearce, Evans, Abbott & Pearce and W. E. Evans, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. We hereby adopt the following from the opinion of the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District as correctly stating the facts:

"This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in an action to recover damages for the destruction of certain flowers and rose cuttings being grown by said plaintiffs upon a certain tract of land, consisting of about five acres, owned by the defendant Sarah E. Ralph and her five children as tenants in common, which lands had been made the subject of two leases, under the first of which the plaintiffs claimed the right to the exclusive possession and use of said property, and under the second of which the other defendant, General Petroleum Corporation, had entered upon said premises for the purpose of boring for oil, and had thereby caused the damage to their flowers and rose cuttings of which the plaintiffs complain.

"The facts attending the making of these two leases are the following: On November 5, 1915, Sarah E. Ralph, as lessor, gave to the plaintiffs herein a written lease of said premises for a period of three years in the usual form of such leases, containing a covenant of quiet enjoyment. The said lessor, while purporting by the terms of said lease to let to said plaintiffs the whole of said premises, signed the same in her own right only, and did not purport to execute the same as guardian of her children, who collectively owned an undivided one-half interest in said property, although at the time of the making of said lease she was such guardian, and resided with said children in a dwelling house upon one corner of said premises, the use of which, with the outbuildings and a small orchard immediately surrounding the dwelling house, was excepted from the provisions of said lease. The plaintiffs as lessees under said lease began the propogation of flowers, particularly of rose cuttings, upon the remaining portion of said land, and while they were cultivating the same were given permission to use one of the small outbuildings otherwise reserved to the lessor. They did not, however, record their lease. While they were thus engaged in using the land for the purposes above stated one L. A. McCray approached the said Sarah E. Ralph with a proposition to take a lease of the same premises for the purpose of prospecting for oil, and on November 10, 1917, the said Sarah E. Ralph and all of her children joined in the execution of a second lease to said L. A. McCray for the period of five years from the date thereof. This lease when obtained by said McCray was immediately transferred and assigned by him to the defendant General Petroleum Corporation, and was recorded by the latter on February 4, 1918. On February 9, 1918, the said General Petroleum Corporation entered upon said premises, and proceeded to explore the same for oil, in the course of which they worked the destruction of the plaintiffs' flowers and rose cuttings, in consequence of which this suit was brought by the plaintiffs both against the General Petroleum Corporation, who had immediately worked such destruction, and against said Sarah E. Ralph, as one of the makers of said second lease. Upon a trial of the cause the plaintiffs recovered a judgment against both of said defendants for the sum of $1,500 damages for the destruction of their said property, and from such judgment this appeal on behalf of both of said defendants has been taken.

"The contention of the appellant General Petroleum Corporation upon this appeal is that the said L. A. McCray was a lessee in good faith and for a valuable consideration of the premises in question without notice, actual or constructive, of the rights or claims of the respondents herein under their prior but unrecorded lease, and that the said appellant having purchased from said McCray said lease for a valuable consideration and without notice, either actual or constructive, of any prior rights or claims of the respondents herein, and having duly recorded said lease prior to its entry upon the said premises, became entitled thereby to a priority of right to the possession and use of said premises as against any prior claims of the plaintiffs therein.

"The validity of this contention depends upon whether the possession of which the said plaintiffs had of said premises at the time of the execution of said second lease to said McCray and of its assignment to said appellant was such as to put said McCray and his assignees of said lease upon notice or inquiry as to the rights of said plaintiffs in the premises.

"It is conceded at the outset of this discussion that the subsequent purchaser or lessee of premises in good faith and for a valuable consideration and without notice, either actual or constructive, of the rights or claims of persons holding a prior unrecorded lease or deed of the same premises, take the same free of such prior rights or claims. The exception to this rule is this: That if the prior grantee or lessee of the premises under an unrecorded deed or lease has gone into actual possession of the same, such possession may operate to put subsequent purchasers or lessees of the premises upon notice or inquiry as to their prior rights or claims thereunder. The respondents herein contend that their possession of the premises in question was of such a character as to impart notice to both said McCray and to the General Petroleum Corporation, its agents and officials, as to their prior rights and claims, or at least to put them upon inquiry as to the basis of right or claim behind the said plaintiffs' possession. The said appellant, on the other hand, contends that the said plaintiffs' possession was not of that character, and that the mere fact that said plaintiffs were engaged in cultivating the premises in question, upon a portion of which the owners of the premises resided, was not such actual, open, notorious, and exclusive possession thereof as would serve to put either its assignor or itelf upon notice or inquiry as to the plaintiffs' claim of right therein, based upon their prior unrecorded lease."

[1, 2] 1. We are of the opinion that the evidence is sufficient to support the implied finding of the jury that respondents' possession was of such a character as to serve to put McCray, the original lessee of the second lease, upon notice or inquiry as to the character of respondents' claim. Whatever operated as notice to him also served as notice to his assignee, the oil corporation, which occupies the same position as the original lessee.

According to the evidence, appellant Mrs. Sarah E. Ralph, whose true name is Mrs. Lovada E. Ralph, had leased the land to respondents two years before the alleged wrongful acts were committed. She testified:

"Mr. Bessho worked there all the time after I made the lease with him in 1915, and he had stuff growing there all the time."

Respondent Bessho testified he planted the carnations two years previously, which would be about April, 1916, or 18 months before McCray secured the second lease. He further testified he had the property under cultivation ever since he leased it, and raised, among other things, strawberries; that he had set out most of the sweet peas in September, 1917, two months prior to the execution of the second lease. It thus appears there were flowers growing on the premises when the second lease was made. They were planted in long beds and rows, which method of cultivation might suggest to one observing the property that they were raised for the market. The area which the respondents cultivated was apart from the portion occupied by Mrs. Ralph. McCray testified:

"I first saw the land several months before the lease was made. I was just driving along the road. * * * I was out there within a couple of weeks of the time that I got the lease. * * * The property adjoins the road that I traveled on. You could see the property from the road. I never noticed that there was anything growing on it, and never noticed any one working on it. I supposed Mrs. Ralph was the owner, and that was all there was to it. * * * And when I passed along the road adjoining this lot before I got this lease I probably could have seen anything that was growing on the lot. I did not make any inquiry as to whether or not any one was working on the lot."

[3] The oil corporation cites a number of authorities to the proposition that possession, to serve as constructive notice to a future lessee or purchaser, must be open, notorious, and visible; that it must indicate the occupant. Among these authorities is Randall v. Allen, 180 Cal. 298, 180 Pac. 941, in which it was said:

"If, for instance, the land is part of a larger tract, all of which is uninclosed, and one not the owner enters upon the particular piece under color of title and cultivates it in the same manner as the adjoining portions of the tract, there is a possession adverse to the real owner which if continued for the statutory period will ripen into title. But such possession will not constitute notice to a prospective purchaser of latent equities or of rights claimed under some unrecorded instrument."

The same case quotes the following from Cox v. Devinney, 65 N. J. Law, 389, 47 Atl. 569:

"The fact that lands are under cultivation does not, of itself, suggest that any one other than the reputed owner of the premises is in possession of them. In order to charge a purchaser with notice, the occupation must be of a character which would put a prudent person upon inquiry; it must indicate that some one other than he who appears by the record to be the owner has rights in the premises. Coleman v. Barklew, 3 Dutcher, 357."

These authorities correctly state the rule, but the facts herein do not come within its operation.

Randall v. Allen, supra, has reference to a situation where the occupier of a part of a tract cultivates it in the same manner as does the occupier of the remainder. In Cox v. Devinney, supra, the one occupant claimed that his possession, which consisted merely of cultivation, was sufficient to constitute notice. In the case at bar Mrs. Ralph was living with the children on the property reserved from the demised premises, the respondents living a short distance away. The leased land was, from about April, 1916, continuously up to the time of the trial, used for the production of flowers in large quantities. Mrs. Ralph had also reserved the fruit from the orchard. There was no similarity in the manner of the use of the respective holdings. An additional circumstance is the fact that one part was occupied by an American family and the other by Orientals. It cannot be doubted that under the circumstances shown the possession indicated the occupant to such an extent that a prospective lessee would be put upon inquiry.

[4] McCray stated he never noticed there was anything growing on the land, or that any one was working on it; that he supposed Mrs. Ralph was the owner, "and that was all there was to it." However, the question is not whether he actually noticed anything growing, but whether this particular possession was sufficient to constitute constructive notice to him; whether it would put a prudent man upon inquiry.

In Scheerer v. Cuddy, 85 Cal. 270, 24 Pac. 713, the property was an office building. The owner leased some of the rooms to a lodge. These rooms were kept locked. The purchaser assumed the lodge rooms were vacant. The court, in holding that the purchaser was to be charged with notice of the lessee's possession said:

"It was his duty to know who was in possession of the property before making the purchase, and his purchase without ascertaining the fact must be regarded as the strongest evidence of bad faith on his part. The burden of making the proper inquiry was cast upon him by the mere fact of actual possession on the part of the appellant. If it were allowed that by failure to acquaint himself with the fact of possession on the part of another than the vendor the vendee could avoid the effect of the rule above stated, he could purposely avoid any inquiry on the subject, and thereby evade the rule and its consequences entirely."

In view of all the facts it cannot be maintained there is not sufficient evidence to support the implied finding of the jury that McCray was, under the circumstances, to be charged with notice of respondents' possession.

[5] We may add, however, that it seems quite plain the oil corporation is responsible, regardless of whether McCray took the lease with or without notice of the prior lease to the respondents. Plainly, the oil corporation was responsible for the damage it did unless when it took and paid for its lease it did so in the belief that it would not be responsible for damage done by its operations to the vegetation and plants upon the land. Only in case it had that belief could it be protected as a bona fide purchaser against liability for such damage. If it did not have that belief it was not a bona fide purchaser as to such liability. That the oil corporation did not have any such belief appears beyond denial from the fact that in its lease it agreed to pay for any injury done to the trees, fruits, or other crops of the lessor. The fact that the agreement extends only to trees, fruits, or other crops of the lessor is wholly immaterial.

It would be material if the recovery sought were upon this provision of the lease. But the recovery sought is not on the lease, but on the ground that the oil corporation tortiously injured the property of the respondents. The only possible defense to a recovery on that ground was that the oil corporation took its lease as a bona fide purchaser with the belief that as lessee it had the right to injure crops upon the land without paying compensation. But the provision of the lease mentioned directly negatives any such belief.

[6] 2. The point is made by the oil corporation that the lease from Mrs. Ralph to respondents is void because, while the other tenants in common were parties to the second lease, they were not to the first. In the case of Whyler v. Van Tiger, 2 Cal. Unrep. 800, 14 Pac. 846, a woman, who had been appointed guardian of a minor, made a lease of a parcel of the ward's land in her own name. She had never taken the oath of office, and letters of guardianship were never issued to her. It was claimed the lease was invalid because she had not executed it as guardian, but the court held the lease valid, and that it gave the lessee the right to the premises against one claiming under the ward. In the case at bar Mrs. Ralph was the duly appointed guardian of the minor children. Under such circumstances, a lease made by her of the property of the wards would be valid, though signed by her only in her personal capacity, and not as guardian.

[7] The proposition is clear that a lease of an entire tract made by one tenant in common is binding on the other tenants when ratified by them, and one method of ratification is the acceptance of benefits under the lease by the cotenants. In the case of Schwartz v. McQuaid, 214 Ill. 357, 73 N. E. 582, 105 Am. St. Rep. 112, it was held that where a lease was made of the whole premises by one cotenant, and the lessee went into possession and paid rent under the lease for some time, it would be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the lease was made with the knowledge and consent of the cotenants, and in that case the lessee was held liable on the lease.

[8] The evidence shows Mrs. Ralph accounted to the court for the proceeds from the land, and that one of the children, an adult, expressly assented to the lease to the respondents. In such a situation the first lease must be held to be ratified and binding, even though the wards were parties to the second lease and not to the first.

[9] 3. We shall next consider the points specially made on behalf of Mrs. Ralph. The first of these is that there is no evidence to support the implied finding of the jury that she is jointly liable for the destruction of respondents' property. The evidence shows that Mrs. Ralph, with a full knowledge of all the facts, gave the oil corporation the second lease, thereby putting it in a position to injure the respondents. J. W. Madrill, head of the land department of the oil corporation, testified that on several occasions just after February 1 he talked with Mrs. Ralph. She said there would be some "damage to the sweet peas, or something else, that you would have to look after." F. Chappellet, field manager, who was listening, stated that: "Mr. Madrill would undoubtedly take care of whatever was right." On February 9, when the machinery was moved on the land, Mrs. Ralph, according to the testimony of Mrs. Bessho, told her "not to worry about it, and that they would pay everything. Mrs. Ralph said repeatedly that oil company will pay everything, so don't worry about it." The jury may have inferred from this that Mrs. Ralph gave encouragement to the entry, and that from this and all the other circumstances, including the fact of the making of the second lease, the conduct of Mrs. Ralph amounted to more than a passive permission on her part to the commission of the tort, but amounted to co-operation. This would render her jointly liable to respondents. This also disposes of her further contention that the court erred in refusing her motion for a nonsuit.

[10] The next point is that her acts did not constitute a breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment, and that even if an eviction and consequent breach of covenant were found, the damages assessed against her cannot exceed the amount of the proportion of the rent paid to her by the respondents from the time of the damage to the termination of the lease. The complaint does not allege, nor do respondents claim, she is liable for a breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment. This difference in rent, therefore, is not the proper measure of damages.

[11] It is urged the demurrer on the ground of misjoinder of causes of action—one arising out of a breach of covenant being joined with one arising out of a tort—should have been sustained. The allegation in the complaint is that the oil corporation "with the previous knowledge, authorization, consent, and co-operation of the said Sarah E. Ralph wrongfully * * * proceeded to * * * construct on said property an oil well derrick * * * and destroyed plaintiffs' nursery stock." Neither in this allegation, nor in any other, is relief sought on the ground of a breach of covenant. There is but one cause of action stated, and that is for the injury to the property.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; OLNEY, J.; WILBUR, J.; SLOANE, J.

SHAW, J. I concur in the judgment upon the ground that the evidence is sufficient to show that the possession and use by Bessho of all of the five acres not used in connection with the house was of such a character that it would indicate to an ordinary observer that it was not used in connection with the occupation of the house as a dwelling, but was held in possession for purposes distinct, different, and separate from the possession of the person occupying the house and yard, and hence that it was sufficient to put the lessee on notice that it was held in a different ownership.

STATE v. SAVINGS UNION BANK & TRUST CO. et al. (Sac. 2922.)

1. Courts ⊂=99(1)—Judgment ⊂=581—Reversed judgment is not conclusive in another action, and not the law of the case, the action being different.

Where a judgment in an action by an administrator to recover a bank deposit had been reversed and remanded by the appellate court and hearing denied by the Supreme Court before the trial of an action by the state against the bank to have the deposit escheated, the former judgment was not a former adjudication with respect to the issues, and did not establish the law of the case, as it was a different action.

2. Escheat ⊂=6—Judicial procedure is necessary for escheat of lands for failure of heirs.

The state cannot take possession of lands which it claims by escheat for failure of heirs without some form of judicial proceedings by which the escheat is perfected.

3. Escheat ⊂=6—Statute does not escheat bank deposit without legal proceedings.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1273, providing that all deposits in a bank which have remained unclaimed for more than 20 years after the date of the last deposit or withdrawal of principal or interest shall escheat to the state, the escheat is in the nature of forfeiture, which takes place whether the owner is living or dead, and as such it will be strictly construed, and therefore does not occur by the mere expiration of the period, but only upon judicial proceedings by the state, so that a demand by the administrator of the depositor after the expiration of the 20-year period, but before the escheat is judicially declared, defeats the right of the state.

4. Constitutional law ⊂=303—Statute escheating bank deposit without legal proceedings is contrary to due process.

A statute providing for the escheat of unclaimed bank deposits to the state without any proceedings against the depositor would divest the depositor of his property without due process of law contrary to Const. art. 1, § 1, and Const. U. S. Amend. 14.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the State of California against the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Lovett K. Fraser, of San Francisco, Herbert V. Keeling, of Lakeport, and Ornbaun & Fraser and Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb and Frank L. Guerena, both of San Francisco, for the State.

SHAW, J. This is an action begun in the superior court of Sacramento county, upon the authority of section 1273 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to obtain a judgment declaring that the sum of $12,525.52, on deposit in the defendant Savings Union Bank & Trust Company in the name of William Anderson, has "escheated to the state, and commanding said bank to forthwith deposit" said money with the state treasurer, as in that section provided. Judgment was given for the plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of the complaint.

The history of the case presents some unusual features. In 1868 William Anderson deposited money with the defendant corporation, then known as Savings & Loan Society. The account was continued until in 1891 there was $6,198.19 to the credit thereof. After that time there were no further deposits or withdrawals made. The accumulated interest up to January 1, 1917, increased the amount to $12,525.52. In 1878 Anderson settled in Lake county and there resided until his death, which occurred on August 13, 1892. He was unmarried. There was no administration had upon his estate until in March, 1917, when Mack Mathews, public administrator of that county, was duly appointed administrator thereof. On June 11, 1917, Mathews, as such administrator, began an action in the superior court of San Francisco county against said defendant corporation to recover said sum of money. On June 22, 1917, the Attorney General, on behalf of the state, intervened in that action, claiming that the fund belonged to the state of California. On July 30, 1917, the state began the present action in the superior court of Sacramento county for the purpose first above stated. Said Mathews appeared and answered, denying that there had been an escheat, and set up the defense that the action in San Francisco county to recover the money was then pending. The San Francisco case first came to trial, and judgment was given for the defendants. From that judgment plaintiff Mack Mathews appealed to the Supreme Court. While this appeal was pending the present action came to trial in Sacramento county and resulted in the judgment here appealed from. The appeal of Mathews from the judgment in San Francisco county was transferred to the District Court of Appeal, and on August 26, 1919, the judgment of that court was given reversing the judgment of the superior court therein and declaring that there had been no escheat, that the money belonged to the estate of Anderson, and that the administrator thereof was entitled to payment of the deposit. Mathews v. Sav. Union Bank & Trust Co. (Cal. App.) 184 Pac. 418. The defendant and the intervener petitioned this court for a rehearing of said cause, and their petition to that effect was denied.

Section 1273 aforesaid provides that—

"All amounts of money heretofore or hereafter deposited with any bank to the credit of depositors who have not made a deposit on said account or withdrawn any part thereof or the interest and which shall have remained unclaimed for more than twenty years after the date of such deposit, or withdrawal of any part of principal or interest, and where neither the depositor or any claimant has filed any notice with such bank showing his or her present residence, shall, with the increase and proceeds thereof, escheat to the state."

It then provides that, when the Attorney General is informed of such deposits, he shall begin an action in the name of the state in the superior court of Sacramento county against the bank in which the deposit is made and the person named as depositor therein, and that upon the trial, if it be determined that the moneys in the defendant bank or banks are unclaimed as first above stated, that court must render judgment "declaring that said moneys have escheated to the state and commanding said bank or banks to forthwith deposit all such moneys with the state treasurer," to be kept, received and paid out as "in the case of other escheated property." The facts proven bring the case within the conditions of the first clause of the section as above quoted. This section was added to the Code by the Legislature of 1915. Stats. 1915, p. 107. Section 15 of the Banking Act had previously provided that all moneys on deposit in any bank to the credit of depositors who had not made a deposit or withdrawn any part thereof or the interest for 20 years and had not filed any notice with the bank showing his or her present address should be deposited with the state treasurer as provided in section 1234 of the Code of Civil Precedure. Section 1234 is a part of the chapter providing for the voluntary dissolution of corporations, and section 1234 relates to the disposition of unclaimed moneys on deposit in savings banks and the like upon such dissolution and directs payment thereof to the state treasurer. It did not provide for any suit to declare an escheat or provide for an escheat in any manner, but it did provide that the moneys so paid in "must be received, invested, accounted for, and paid out, in the same manner and by the same officers as is provided by law in the case of escheated estates, and in section twelve hundred and seventy-two." In 1915 the Legislature amended section 15 of the Banking Act (St. 1909, p. 87) so as to provide that such moneys should "be deposited with the state treasurer after judgment in the manner provided in the Code of Civil Procedure," referring to section 1273 thereof. The aforesaid decision of the District Court of Appeal was to the effect that an escheat under these sections did not take effect until final judgment in the action, as provided for in section 1273 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the money did not escheat nor title thereto pass to the state at the expiration of the 20 years mentioned in said section.

[1] The judgment in the action before the District Court of Appeal does not constitute a former adjudication with respect to this case, because the District Court reversed the judgment and remanded it for a new trial, so that at the time the judgment in the present case was rendered there had been no judgment in the other action. The decision of the District Court is not the law of the present case because it was not rendered in the same action. The Attorney General earnestly insists that it is an erroneous statement of the law and asks that it be overruled.

Upon further consideration we are satisfied with the law as stated in that decision. Further argument renders it appropriate to make some additional observations on the subject.

The precise claim of the state is that the declaration in section 1273 that the money which has remained on deposit 20 years under the conditions therein stated "shall, with the increase and proceeds thereof, escheat to the state," accomplishes an instantaneous escheat; that the only purpose of the action therein provided for is to obtain an adjudication that the escheat had already occurred and an order for the transfer of the money from the bank to the state treasurer; that it is really for the protection of the bank against other claims to the money, and is not in any sense for the benefit of the person who made the deposit or those claiming under him; and that neither the original owner nor his heirs, assigns, or personal representatives may claim the money by virtue of a demand made after the 20 years had run. The sole questions presented are whether or not the statutes so provide, and, if they do, whether or not they are invalid for the reason that in that event they provide for the taking of property without due process of law.

[2] Under the ancient common law there were escheats of two kinds. The first included all cases where the owner of land died without competent heirs to take the property. In these cases it was said that, because there was no one else to take it, the land reverted to and vested in the king, who "was esteemed in the eye of the law the original proprietor of all the lands in the kingdom." 1 Cooley's Bl. *302; Bouvier's Law Dic. "Escheat." In this country the respective states have the attributes ascribed by the law of England to the crown in this respect, and the state is the recipient of all escheats caused by lack of heirs or otherwise. This form of escheat proceeds on the theoretical assumption that the line of descent has failed, and that there are technically no heirs in existence. There is a variation thereof where persons who would otherwise be heirs are barred from inheriting. It is, however, "a presumption of law that every intestate has left some one on earth entitled to claim as his heir, however remote." People v. Roach, 76 Cal. 297, 18 Pac. 409. Practically, therefore, omitting the variation above mentioned, it is meant that no lawful heirs can be found. The other form of escheat at common law occurred where the owner of the property had committed felony or treason and had thereby forfeited his right to hold the same. 2 Cooley's Bl. 73, 246; Bouvier's Law Dic., supra. An escheat under subdivision 9 of section 1386 of the Civil Code occurs when there are no heirs, and it is of the kind first mentioned, which does not imply or require a forfeiture as a condition precedent thereto. With respect to either kind of escheat our decisions held that some judicial procedure is necessary to perfect the escheat.

"By the civil law as well as the common law, the king cannot take upon himself the possession on an estate said to have escheated, until the fact is judicially ascertained by a proceeding in the nature of an inquest of office; and in this there is a difference from the case of a forfeiture for want of the performance of conditions precedent; for in the latter, the conditions never having been performed, the title has not vested. An alien may hold real estate against every one, and even against the government, until office found." People v. Folsom, 5 Cal. 379.

This doctrine has been repeatedly stated and followed in subsequent decisions. De Merle v. Mathews, 26 Cal. 477; Racouillat v. Sansevain, 32 Cal. 386; State v. Smith, 70 Cal. 156, 12 Pac. 121. There is some conflict of authority on this question, some states holding to the doctrine that title to an escheat vests immediately in the state upon the happening of the act which causes it (4 Kent 424), but in this state, as above shown, the other doctrine is followed.

[3] The escheat provided for in section 1273, and upon which it is here claimed that the title vested absolutely and immediately in the state, is an escheat of the second kind. It takes place whether the owner of the deposit is living or dead and is accomplished without any fault of his. Although he may be well aware that he has the deposit and may intend to keep it for his own use, the claim of the state is that he is deprived thereof at once at the expiration of the 20-year period regardless of his wishes in the matter. It is in the nature of a statutory forfeiture, and the rules applying to forfeitures are therefore applicable.

"Statutes declaring a forfeiture are not to be extended beyond their direct meaning by implication, unless such implication is imperatively necessary by reason of the subject matter or terms of the statute." Northwestern, etc., Co. v. Lambert, 166 Cal. 755, 137 Pac. 1119.

[4] It is also clear that the effect of the statute as it is claimed to be by the state would be to divest a person of his title without any proceeding against him for that purpose and would manifestly be a taking of property without due process of law. Under the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and of section 1, art. 1, of our Constitution, such taking would not be within the power of the state, and the statute purporting to provide therefor would be void.

"When a legislative provision is capable of two constructions, one consistent and the other inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution, it is a well-recognized principle of construction that the statute should be given that construction which will make it harmonious with the Constitution and comport with the legitimate powers of the Legislature." Chesebrough v. San Francisco, 153 Cal. 567, 96 Pac. 291.

In view of these rules of construction, and of the fact that the statute would be utterly void if given the meaning attributed to it by the Attorney General, we are of the opinion that the provision of section 1273 that bank deposits unclaimed for 20 years, as there stated, shall escheat to the state, must not be taken as intending to provide for an immediate escheat, but as providing that the same shall be taken over by the state as an escheat when so adjudged in the action so provided for. This is the effect of the decision in Estate of Miner, 143 Cal. 194, 76 Pac. 968, although in that case this particular statute was not considered; that case having been decided before its enactment. For these reasons, in addition to those given by the District Court of Appeal, we think the court erred in holding that the property had escheated to the state.

The judgment is reversed.

ALDEN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (L. A. 6807.)

1. Wills ⟹317—Statute prescribing issues on which jury trial can be demanded does not limit issues in probate proceedings.

The provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 1312, declaring that certain enumerated issues of fact raised by a will contest shall be tried before a jury if either party demands a jury trial, does not limit the issues of fact which can be raised in such proceeding to the enumerated issues.

2. Wills ⟹274—Petition for probate must allege testator was a resident of the county at time of death.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1300, requiring the petition for probate to set out the jurisdictional facts, and section 1294, requiring wills to be probated in the county in which decedent was a resident at the time of his death, a petition for probate must allege the residence of decedent within the county.

3. Wills ⟹274—Petition for probate is foundation for proceedings to contest a will.

Though the forms of pleading to contest probate of a will are specifically declared, the petition for probate must be taken into account as the very foundation of the proceeding, since the filing of an opposition before a will has been admitted to probate is predicated on the fact that probate proceedings are pending, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1307, 1312.

4. Wills ⟹337—Residence of testator is issue made by pleadings in probate proceedings as to which "new trial" may be granted.

In proceedings to oppose the probate of a will, the issue of the residence of testator within the county at the time of his death is an issue of fact raised by the pleadings within Code Civ. Proc. § 590, so that a new trial thereon may be granted under Code Civ. Proc. § 656, defining a new trial as a re-examination of an issue of fact, and section 657, authorizing the granting of new trials, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1714, making the Code sections relating to new trials apply to will contests.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, New Trial.]

5. Wills ⟹277—Contestant must raise issue of residence of testator or be precluded by implied finding.

A party opposing the probate of a will must raise the issue of the residence of testator within the county at the time of his death, and have it tried on its merits, or he will be estopped thereafter to raise it by a pro forma or an implied finding of the court on that issue.

6. Wills ⟹337—Fact that issue of testator's residence was tried separately does not prevent new trial thereon.

The fact that the issue of the residence of the testator within the county at the time of his death was separately tried before the contest of the will does not prevent the court from granting a new trial on that issue, after a finding for the contestant thereon which resulted in the dismissal of the probate proceedings for want of jurisdiction.

7. New trial ⟹2—Not granted on collateral questions of fact not calling for formal trial.

A new trial will not be granted after rulings of the court on questions of fact collaterally raised which do not call for formal trial, and where no provision is made for framing issues under the proceedings.

In Bank.

Petition by Lena Alden for writ of prohibition to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles. Writ denied.

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Mattison B. Jones and Jones, Wilson & Stephenson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. Petitioner is asking for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court of the county of Los Angeles from taking further proceedings in the matter of the probate of the will of William Lowell Bundy, deceased, under an order granting a new trial.

Petition had theretofore been filed in said court for the probate of the last will of said decedent, wherein it was alleged that at the time of his death said decedent was a resident of the said county of Los Angeles.

The petitioner here, Lena Alden, thereupon filed opposition to the probate of said will, denying that decedent was at the time of his death a resident of said county of Los Angeles, and averring that he was at all times a resident of the county of Sacramento, and setting up as further grounds of opposition that decedent was incompetent to make a will, and that the same was signed by reason of undue influence and duress. It was also alleged that decedent, prior to the execution of the will, had been judicially declared an incompetent person, and that such judgment of incompetency remained in full force and effect; that during all of said period one M. P. Barnes was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting guardian of the person and estate of said incompetent.

The hearing upon the petition for probate, opposition, and answer thereto was regularly set down for trial, and upon the day set, in pursuance of a previous order of the court, the issues were segregated, and the trial was had upon the sole issue of the place of residence of the decedent.

Several days were consumed in the hearing, many witnesses were examined on the part of both proponent of the will and contestant, the evidence being directed largely to the mental capacity of the decedent to choose a place of residence, during the period of his adjudged incompetency, the evidence disclosing that at the time he was declared incompetent he was a resident of Sacramento, but had been living in Los Angeles thereafter and for some time prior to and up to the time of his death.

Upon this hearing, which was had before the court without a jury, the court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law, and adjudged in pursuance therewith that decedent was at the time of his death a resident of Sacramento, and thereupon made its order or judgment of dismissal of the proceedings for want of jurisdiction in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles to entertain the same.

The proponent of the will thereafter, in due time and in manner provided by law, moved for a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and judgment of the court. The court granted the motion and ordered a new trial. It is petitioner's contention:

"That a new trial will not lie in a probate matter such as this, where the court has merely decided the question of residence which is a preliminary prerequisite to its acquiring jurisdiction to hear the issues in the case," and that the "determining of the right of the court to hear the issues in the case is not a trial of the issues, and an order dismissing the petition for want of jurisdiction is not a decision within the meaning of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes the granting of a new trial."

The fact appears that the determination of the question before us rests solely upon whether or not the trial of the dispute as to decedent's residence comes within the terms of section 656 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section defines a new trial as "a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial and decision by a jury, court, or referee." According to the provisions of section 590 of the Code of Civil Procedure:

"An issue of fact arises: 1. Upon a material allegation in the complaint, controverted by the answer; and, 2. Upon new matters in the answer, except an issue of law is joined thereon."

The proceedings here arose upon the contest of a probate of will. It is expressly provided under section 1714, Code of Civil Procedure, that the Code sections relating to new trials, so far as not inconsistent with provisions of the Code title governing probate proceedings, apply to "cases of contests of wills." There was in this case a trial of a question of fact before the court and a finding and decision thereon which resulted in a judgment of dismissal of the proceedings to probate the will, or what in an ordinary action would be termed a judgment of nonsuit. The only material matter in dispute is whether or not the issue so prosecuted was upon a material allegation presented by the pleadings.

[1] The provisions of section 1312, Code of Civil Procedure, appealed to by petitioner here, are not conclusive or even persuasive on this point. That section does not purport to define or enumerate all the issues that may be raised upon opposition to the probate of a will, but merely such issues as must be submitted to a jury if a jury is demanded. It authorizes written grounds of opposition to the probate, and declares that any issues of fact thus raised, involving the competency of the decedent to make a will, the freedom of the testator from duress or undue influence, the due execution of the instrument, or any other question affecting the validity of the will, shall be tried before a jury, if either party demands a jury trial.

There may be, and obviously are, other issues of fact that frequently are put in issue, questions of jurisdiction, of the right of the contestant to oppose the admission of the will to probate, matters which may be pleaded in abatement of the proceedings. The circumstance that these are matters which do not demand a jury trial is not significant, as a jury trial under our procedure is not a condition to a motion for new trial. All issues of fact do not have to be tried by jury. Section 592, Code of Civil Procedure, declares that in matters not otherwise directed "issues of fact must be tried by the court, subject to its power to order any such issue to be tried by a jury."

[2, 3] The matter in dispute, therefore, resolves itself into a question as to whether or not the issue of residence upon which this case was tried and determined was an issue of fact arising on the pleadings. As a matter of fact the issue is presented by the pleadings, in the petition for the probate of the will, the written opposition to the probate, and the answer to the opposition. It is true that there is no express requirement under the Code that the jurisdictional facts as to the residence of decedent at the time of his death shall be set out in the written opposition by contestant; but it is required by section 1300 of the Code of Civil Procedure that the petition for probate shall set out the jurisdictional facts, and one of the essential jurisdictional facts, as set forth in section 1294, is that wills must be probated in case of a resident of the state "in the county in which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death." The matter of contesting probate of a will is in the nature of a special proceeding, and the forms of pleading are specifically declared, but it seems clear that in such a contest the petition for probate must be taken into account as the very foundation of the proceeding, since the filing of an opposition before a will has been admitted to probate is predicated on the fact that proceedings for admitting the will to probate are pending. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1307, 1312.

[4] It may be true that it is the duty of the trial court to ascertain the facts as to residence, whether pleaded or not, but we see no reason why this circumstance should make it unnecessary to plead the issue, or render it any less an issue of fact under the pleadings when thus presented.

[5] In Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414, 73 Pac. 1070, 74 Pac. 441, in which want of jurisdiction was raised on appeal because decedent was not a resident at the time of his death of the county where probate proceedings were pending, Mr. Justice Angellotti, writing the opinion, makes a point of the fact that "there was no issue of fact made as to this in the lower court," and the court in that case holds that:

"While it is true that nonresidence is not a ground of contest, it is clear that contestant could have legally made her objection on that ground in the lower court. This court will not upon appeal review the conclusions of a trial court as to facts essential to its jurisdiction concerning which such court was vested with the power to hear and determine, at the instance of a party who has appeared in that court in the action or proceeding, and has omitted there to in any way urge his objection, but has proceeded therein upon the theory that the court had jurisdiction."

It therefore follows that it is the right of the contestant and is important that he make the question of residence an issue, and have that issue tried on its merits; otherwise he is estopped by a mere pro forma or an implied finding of the court. Estate of Griffith, 84 Cal. 107, 23 Pac. 528, 24 Pac. 381; In re Eickhoff, 101 Cal. 600, 36 Pac. 11; Estate of Dole, 147 Cal. 188, 194, 81 Pac. 534.

In matters affecting the probate of a will, the facts of the death of the testator and his place of residence at the time of his death are issues as vital to the proceedings as the facts of marriage and residence in the state and county where action is commenced are to an action for divorce; and it has long been settled that a complaint in divorce which fails to allege the marriage and statutory residence fails to state a cause of action, and that findings on these issues are required to uphold the judgment. Haskell v. Haskell, 54 Cal. 262; De Tolna v. De Tolna, 135 Cal. 575, 67 Pac. 1045; Faulkner v. Faulkner, 90 Wash. 74, 155 Pac. 404; 19 Corpus Juris, p. 107.

Yet there is the same legal duty upon the trial court to determine these questions of jurisdiction before granting a divorce as in determining the jurisdicton in the matter of the probate of a will; and in the divorce procedure there is not, or has not been until recently, any express requirement under the Code that the jurisdictional facts be pleaded as is required in a petition for probate.

This court has held (In re Bauquier, 88 Cal. 302, 26 Pac. 178, 532) that objection to the appointment of an executrix named in a will for want of integrity raised an issue of fact which could be considered on motion for a new trial, and the court in its opinion there says:

"It would be impracticable to enumerate the cases in which a motion for a new trial is appropriate in probate proceedings, but it may be stated generally that whenever the action of the court which is invoked is dependent upon the existence of certain extrinsic facts which are presented to it for determination in the form of pleadings, and are to be decided by it in conformity with the preponderance of the evidence offered thereon, an issue of fact arises which, after its decision, may be re-examined by the court upon a motion for a new trial."

While the scope of application of Code provisions relating to new trials has been restricted in probate proceedings by Code amendments since the foregoing decision (section 1714, Code Civ. Proc.), it has not in any way been limited so as to affect their application to contests of wills.

In People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 152 Cal. 261, 268, 92 Pac. 481, 484, a special proceeding under the Bank Commissioners' Act (Stats. 1903, p. 368), this court adopts and enlarges the rule laid down in the preceding citation as follows:

"The rule is that whenever, under the pleadings in a suit, an issue of fact is presented to a court, which is to be determined by the preponderance of evidence submitted on the issue, a party is entitled, after a decision or finding of the court on such issue, to have the court reexamine it upon a motion for a new trial, and this rule applies whether the action be one at law or equity, or in special cases or special proceedings. This is the general rule as to all trials where an issue of fact is involved and determined, * * * and there is nothing in the act taking away the right to move for a new trial, and nothing in the provision of the Code limiting its exercise to actions or proceedings other than special proceedings of the character here involved."

The decision of the District Court of Appeal in Estate of O'Neill, 32 Cal. App. Dec. 311, cited by petitioner, was vacated by order of this court, and a rehearing had herein, and a decision was reached upon other grounds and without passing upon the question involved here. Hardiman v. Church, 191 Pac. 1106.

In any event, while points in the O'Neill Case were raised on a state of facts very similar to those presented here, it is apparent from the argument advanced that the conclusion to the effect that the question of residence, which, as here, was tried separately and as preliminary to the attack on the will, was not an issue in the case, was largely influenced by the contention that is made here, namely, that the issues of fact which could be presented in the contest of probate of a will are limited to the objections enumerated in section 1312 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as objections which demand a jury trial.

[6] As already pointed out, issues are constantly presented in actions where the parties are entitled to a jury, which, if standing alone, could be tried without a jury, and which, where a jury trial is had, are commonly submitted to the jury with other issues of the case. Neither does the fact that for convenience of the parties and the court this issue as to residence was tried first and separately change its status as an issue in the case. It was so tried because, if decided adversely to the proponent of the will, it would determine the proceedings and make unnecessary the taking of evidence on the other issues of the case. Had the issues all been tried at once, and, after submission, decided for contestant solely on a finding that the decedent was not a resident of Los Angeles county at the time of his death, would it be contended that there had not been a trial, and that a motion for a new trial could not be predicated upon the insufficiency of the evidence to support such finding?

[7] This view of the law does not trench on the general rule that motions for new trial do not lie from rulings of the courts on questions of fact collaterally raised, and which do not call for formal trial, and where no provision is made for framing issues under the proceedings, such as proceedings supported by affidavits, applications to set apart exempt property, family allowances, and proceedings of similar character. In re Heldt, 98 Cal. 553, 33 Pac. 549; Leach v. Pierce, 93 Cal. 614, 29 Pac. 235; Shipman v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. 425, 88 Pac. 1090; Estate of Heywood, 154 Cal. 314, 97 Pac. 825; Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 265, 33 Pac. 1103; Estate of Franklin, 133 Cal. 584, 65 Pac. 1081.

It would seem good practice and good policy to sustain the right of motion for new trials upon such questions of jurisdiction as is presented in this proceeding. They are decisive of the case where the facts do not sustain the jurisdiction, and if there has been a mistrial, or the court finds the evidence insufficient to support the finding, it would seem advisable to afford a speedy opportunity for a new trial, rather than to incur the inevitable delay of a hearing on appeal.

When we consider that the point involved was conclusive of the right of proponent of the will to maintain the proceeding; that it was clearly made an issue by the pleadings; that it involved a hearing lasting several days, in which many witnesses on both sides of the controversy were examined; that evidence was taken which, by stipulation of the parties, was to be used on other branches of the contest, if jurisdiction was upheld; that the court made elaborate findings of fact, and entered a judgment of dismissal of the action thereon, it would be going far in limitation of proceedings for a new trial to hold that there had not been a trial upon "an issue of fact" in this proceeding.

The writ is denied.

CHAMBERS, State Controller, v. LAMB. (L. A. 5843.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1921.)

1. Taxation ⟸869—Community property conveyed to wife in contemplation of husband's death not exempt from inheritance tax.

The fact that property conveyed to a wife by her husband in contemplation of death was community property does not exempt any of it from the inheritance tax imposed by St. 1905, p. 341.

2. Taxation ⟸895(4) — Inheritance tax on "transfers in contemplation of death" based on value at date of transfer; "property."

Under St. 1905, p. 341, § 1, taxing transfers in contemplation of death, and section 28, defining "property" as the real or personal property of grantor "passing or transferred" to grantee, and "transfer" as "the passing of property" in possession or enjoyment, present or future, by inheritance, descent, devise, deed, etc., property conveyed to a wife by her husband in contemplation of his death, by a deed stipulating that full title, control, and enjoyment passed to her at the time of its delivery, should be valued as of the date of the delivery of the deed, not as of the date of grantor's death; for "transfers in contemplation of death" include transfers inter vivos, and the vesting in interest of the rights passing is the transfer taxed, so that an increase in value after such vesting is not part of the taxable value; § 5, as to appraisal of future, contingent, or limited estates as of the date of transferor's death being inapplicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Property; Second Series, Transfer in Contemplation of Death.]

3. Taxation ⟸879(1) — Inheritance tax on "succession" is tax on "transfer."

In view of Civ. Code, § 1383, defining "succession," the inheritance tax on transfers in contemplation of death (Stats. 1905, p. 341), not being limited to transfers effective on the transferor's death, is not a tax on the "succession" in the limited sense of the acquisition of rights on the death of another, "succession" being synonymous with "transfer," as defined by the act, section 28, including the passing of property in possession or enjoyment, present or future, by inheritance, succession, deed, or otherwise.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Succession; Transfer.]

4. Taxation ⟸887—Inheritance tax on transfer in contemplation of death attaches when transfer completed, though due and payable on death of transferor.

Under St. 1905, p. 341, § 1, imposing an inheritance tax on transfers in contemplation of death, liability for the tax attaches when the transfer is completed, though by section 7 the tax is "due and payable" on the death of the transferor, the imposition of a tax and its maturity being distinct and separate stages in the process of taxation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by John S. Chambers, as Controller of the State of California, against Elizabeth Lamb, to fix the amount of an inheritance tax. From an order fixing the amount, defendant appeals. Remanded, with directions to modify the order.

R. Y. Williams and A. W. Rutan, both of Santa Ana (Garret W. McEnerney, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

John W. Carrigan, Edwin H. Pennock, and Harold R. Smith, all of Los Angeles (Robert A. Waring, of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondent.

LENNON, J. The present appeal is taken from an order fixing the amount of an inheritance tax to be paid to the state of California by Elizabeth Lamb, defendant and appellant. At the hearing in the court below, plaintiff John S. Chambers, as controller of the state of California, and Elizabeth Lamb, defendant, stipulated as follows: In February, 1909, William D. Lamb executed and delivered to Elizabeth Lamb, his wife, a deed conveying to the latter full title to certain community property, complete dominion and control of the said real property passing from the husband to the wife at the time of the delivery of the deed. The deed was executed in contemplation of death. It was recorded in 1910, and the husband died in 1911. In February, 1909, the full market value of the property described in the deed was $194,775, but in the interval between the delivery of the deed and the death of William D. Lamb, in 1911, the value enhanced to $212,775, an increase of $18,000. The trial court decreed that the value of the property at the date of decedent's death was the valuation to be placed upon the property in computing the inheritance tax, allowed a deduction of $3,854.44 for state and county taxes for the fiscal year 1911-1912, and fixed the amount of the tax at $4,248.01. Appellant claims that the value of the property at the date of the delivery of the deed should be taken as the basis for the computation of the tax, and therefore that the amount of the tax fixed by the trial court exceeds the amount actually due from appellant by $450, or 2½ per cent. of $18,000.

[1, 2] It is conceded that the deed was made in contemplation of death, and that the imposition of the tax in the instant case is controlled by the terms of the Inheritance Tax Law of 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 341). The fact that the property conveyed to the wife was community property does not exempt any portion thereof from the inheritance tax imposed by the act of 1905. Estate of Moffitt, 153 Cal. 359, 95 Pac. 653, 1025, 20 L. R. A.

(N. S.) 207; Estate of Sims, 153 Cal. 365, 95 Pac. 655. It is further conceded that the Inheritance Tax Act of 1905 does not in exact terms prescribe whether the tax should be measured by the value of the property at the date of the transfer or at the death of the transferor in the case of a transfer in contemplation of death such, as in the present case. The portions of the act of importance for present purposes are:

"Section 1. All property which shall pass, by will or by the intestate laws of this state, * * * which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this state, or any interest therein, or income therefrom, which shall be transferred by deed, grant, sale, or gift, made in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor, or bargainor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after such death, * * * shall be and is subject to a tax hereinafter provided for; * * * and such tax shall be and remain a lien upon the property passed or transferred until paid. * * * The tax so imposed shall be upon the market value of such property at the rates hereinafter prescribed, and only upon the excess over the exemptions hereinafter granted."

"Sec. 7. All taxes imposed by this act, unless otherwise herein provided for, shall be due and payable at the death of the decedent."

Section 5 of the act, which in effect requires an appraisal as of the date of the death of the transferor, is limited to future, contingent or limited estates, and has no application to transfers, such as that in the instant case, which do not create estates of that character. Estate of Miller, 195 Pac. 413, 418.

We have, therefore, a taxable transfer inter vivos passing property the value of which changed between the date of the transfer and the death of the transferor, and a transfer tax act containing no express provision as to which valuation shall be adopted in ascertaining the amount of the tax. Which valuation is the more logical as a basis for measuring the tax is the question for solution.

Section 1 of the act of 1905 provides for a tax on transfers—

"made in contemplation of the death of the grantor * * * or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after such death." (Italics ours.)

Therefore, a transfer is taxable under the statute of 1905 when accompanied by an intention that it shall take effect immediately and irrevocably if, at the time of the transfer, the transfer is in that particular state of mind technically known as "in contemplation of death." In other words, the term "transfers in contemplation of death," as used in the act of 1905, includes transfers inter vivos. Estate of Reynolds, 169 Cal. 600, 147 Pac. 268; Spreckels v. State, 30 Cal. App. 363, 158 Pac. 549; State v. Pabst, 139 Wis. 561, 121 N. W. 351. It follows that rights acquired under a taxable transfer may vest prior to the death of the transferor.

Under the general scheme of our inheritance tax laws and the interpretation accorded them by the courts, signal significance is attached to the time of the actual vesting of rights. It is the vesting in interest of the rights passing between the parties which constitutes the transfer tax by the act. Estate of Kennedy, 157 Cal. 517, 108 Pac. 280, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428; Hunt v. Wicht, 174 Cal. 205, 162 Pac. 639, L. R. A. 1917C, 961. The death of the transferor adds nothing to the transfer if full rights have passed to the grantee prior to that time. Upon this reasoning it was held in Hunt v. Wicht, supra, that, when rights under the transfer vest prior to the death of the transferor, the law in effect at the time of the vesting of the rights, and not that in force at the date of the death of the transferor, is the law which governs the tax. Similarly, in Felton's Estate, 176 Cal. 663, 169 Pac. 392, it was held that the amount of the tax must be assessed according to the rates prescribed by the statute in force at the time the transfer took effect, and not according to the rate fixed by a later statute in force when the transferor died. In the instant case it is stipulated that full title, control, and enjoyment passed to the grantee in 1909, at the time of the delivery of the deed. In other words, as stated in Hunt v. Wicht, supra—

"The succession to the property by the grantee, which is the thing attempted to be taxed, was complete upon the delivery of the deed."

Logic and consistency compel the conclusion that the property should be valued, for the purposes of the tax, as of the date of the delivery of the deed. Any other interpretation would be contrary to the spirit of the act of 1905. Thus, section 1 of the act provides that all property transferred by deed in contemplation of death is subject to taxation and that "the tax so imposed shall be upon the market value of such property." Section 28 of the act defines "property" as—

"The real and personal property or interest therein of the * * * grantor, * * * passing or transferred to individual * * * grantees."

The word "transfer" is defined as including—

"The passing of property or any interest therein, in possession or enjoyment, present or future, by inheritance, descent, devise, succession, bequest, grant, deed, bargain, sale, gift or appointment in the manner herein described."

Concisely stated, the basis for the measurement of the tax is the market value of that which changes hands as the result of the act of transfer. Applying these provisions and definitions to the instant case, the tax is imposed upon the market value of the real property passing by the deed of William D. Lamb. $194,775 was the value of the property which thus passed to the transferee. While the property had attained the value of $212,775 at the time of the death of the transferor, the additional $18,000 was not part of the value of the property "passing" from the grantor to the grantee; it was an increase in value subsequent to the transfer, and during a period when the transferee was the owner thereof. The value of the property passing between the parties being the basis for the tax, the increase in value after the actual vesting of rights under the transfer is not to be rated as part of the taxable value.

The authorities cited by respondent in support of the contention that the property should be valued as of the date of the death of the transferor are not in conflict with the rule above announced. In Matter of Davis, 149 N. Y. 539, 44 N. E. 185, it was determined that an estate in remainder created by will must be appraised as of the date of the death of the transferor, when title vested, and not as of the date of the death of the life tenant, when possession passed. In Felton's Estate, supra, property was valued as of the date of the death of the transferor, although title passed prior thereto. It appears from the opinion in that case that the question here under discussion was not there raised, and there is nothing to indicate that the property involved in that case altered in value between the time of the transfer and the date of the death. That case cannot, therefore, be considered as passing upon the point here in issue.

[3] The argument is advanced by respondent that the cases hold that the inheritance tax is upon the succession, rather than upon the property (Estate of Kennedy, supra; Hunt v. Wicht, supra), and that "succession" can occur only upon the death of the transferor. This argument is due to a misunderstanding of the meaning of the term "succession" as used in the cases quoted. Succession is defined in section 1383 of the Civil Code as "the coming in of another to take the property of one who dies without disposing of it by will." It frequently possesses the somewhat broader meaning of "the acquisition of rights upon the death of another." As previously stated, however, the tax imposed by the act of 1905 is not limited to transfers taking effect upon the death of the transferor, but includes gifts inter vivos in contemplation of death. The statement that the tax is upon the "succession" would therefore be incorrect if that term were used in the limited sense of the acquisition of rights upon the death of another; and it is obvious that the word "succession," appearing in the cases cited, is synonymous with "transfer," as defined by the inheritance tax acts.

[4] The fact that the tax is "due and payable" upon the death of the transferor is not inconsistent with the rule that the liability for the tax attaches whenever the transfer is completed. The imposition of a tax and its maturity are commonly regarded as distinct and separate stages in the process of taxation. County of San Diego v. County of Riverside, 125 Cal. 495, 58 Pac. 81; Frost v. State, 153 Ala. 654, 45 South. 203; Westhus v. Union Trust Co., 164 Fed. 795, 90 C. C. A. 441.

The case is remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify the order appealed from in accordance with the above.

GUARANTY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES (STOWELL et al., Interveners). (L. A. 6420.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸871—Extent of review of final and interlocutory decrees stated.

Where an appeal was on the judgment roll alone, but only one decree mentioned was entered within 60 days from notice of appeal, the only effectual appeal is from that decree, and unless the preceding decrees mentioned were interlocutory, reviewable on appeal from the last decree, they cannot be considered, and, if the preceding decrees were final and the one appealed from merely for enforcement purposes, the preceding decrees may be examined only to ascertain which is the final judgment and whether the decree appealed from is supported by the record as a supplemental decree.

2. Appeal and error ⟸871 — Interlocutory and final decrees in action on tunnel assessment bonds, distinguished.

In an action on bonds for a tunnel assessment under the street improvement law, where the city failed to answer after overruling of a demurrer, a default decree declaring that the tunnel was held by the city in trust for plaintiff and others who were entitled to intervene, directing that such persons be brought in as parties, and providing that the tunnel should be sold as upon foreclosure in case the city failed to pay, held merely interlocutory; the final judgment being the one entered after the bringing in of such parties, determining the amounts due the respective parties, and purporting to determine all the issues.

3. Appeal and error ⟸871 — "Final decree" and "order" defined.

A decree which finally disposes of all the issues raised between all the parties to an action and finally settles and adjudicates all rights in controversy is "final," while an "order" is a decision made during the progress of the cause settling some point of practice or question collateral to the main issue if made before judgment, or settling some question necessary to be determined in carrying into execution a final judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Final Decree or Judgment; Order.]

4. Appeal and error ⊂⊃871—Decree may be final although future court orders necessary.

A decree is none the less final because some future orders of the court may become necessary to carry it into effect, and, if the judgment disposes of the merits of the action and terminates the controverted issues, the fact that further proceedings remain to be taken in the court to make it effective does not affect its finality.

5. Appeal and error ⊂⊃871—Supplemental decree in action on tunnel assessment bonds held merely order after judgment.

In an action on tunnel assessment bonds, where there was a final judgment determining the amounts due the respective parties and ordering the tunnel sold as upon foreclosure in case the city failed to pay, a supplemental decree, stating that the city elected to retain the tunnel and pay the money, fixing the terms of payment, etc., held merely an order of the court after judgment for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the final judgment, so that, on appeal from a later modified supplemental decree, which was the final judgment on the merits, preceding orders were reviewable.

6. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃871—Decree in tunnel assessment action held not unconstitutional as requiring city to make gift of money.

In an action on tunnel assessment bonds, a decree requiring the city to restore to plaintiffs and interveners or to the contractors money furnished such contractors for the construction of the tunnel, held not to make a gift of such money contrary to Const. art. 4, § 31, and such judgment, being given by the court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and parties, was binding and conclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action on bonds for tunnel assessment by the Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank against the City of Los Angeles; N. W. Stowell and others, interveners. Judgment for plaintiff and interveners, and defendant city appeals. Affirmed.

Charles S. Burnell, J. H. O'Connor, Harry W. McNutt, Swanwick & Donnelly, W. W. Hindman, Byron D. Seaver, W. C. Petchner, John B. Yakey, John J. Craig, Thomas C. Ridgway, and Milton K. Young, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Herbert Cutler Brown, of Los Angeles (Delphin M. Delmas, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. [1] The appellant, city of Los Angeles, filed its notice of appeal on December 9, 1919, stating therein that it appeals from the modified supplemental decree entered on October 14, 1919, and from the judgments or decrees entered respectively on January 12, 1918, March 29, 1918, July 3, 1918, August 15, 1918, and January 17, 1919, and from each of them. Inasmuch as the only decree mentioned which was entered within 60 days before the filing of the notice of appeal is that of October 14, 1919, it follows that the only effectual appeal is from the decree of October 14, 1919. The appeal is on the judgment roll alone, and we cannot on this appeal consider the validity or merits of any other decree than that of October 14, 1919, unless the preceding decrees are merely interlocutory orders or judgments of a character that makes them reviewable on appeal from the last decree. If either of the preceding decrees was the final judgment on the merits, and the decree appealed from was an order or decree made after final judgment for the purpose of carrying out or enforcing such final judgment, then the preceding decrees may be examined only for the purpose of ascertaining which one is the final judgment and whether the decree of October 14, 1919, is supported as a supplemental decree by the record on which it is founded.

The appellant contends that the decree of October, 1919, is the final decree in the case, that the previous ones are merely interlocutory decrees, and consequently that the entire judgment roll may be reviewed on this appeal. The respondents, on the other hand, contend that the decree of October 1919, is nothing more than a supplemental decree or order to carry out and enforce the final judgment in the action, which they say was the decree entered August 15, 1918. In order to determine this question it is necessary to consider the nature of the action and the subsequent proceedings leading up to the judgment of August, 1918.

The city of Los Angeles in 1912 began a proceeding under the street improvement law for the construction of a tunnel in Hill street in that city, the expenses of which were to be paid, under the proceedings, by an assessment against the property within a district established by the city for that purpose. The contract was let for the construction of the tunnel in pursuance of this proceeding; it was completed and accepted by the city in 1913, and thereupon the usual assessment for the contract price and expenses was levied upon the property within the district. A large number of owners of property within the district paid the assessment. Others allowed bonds to be issued on their property for the assessment against the same as provided by the statute under which the proceeding was conducted, and many of these bonds afterwards passed from the contractors into the hands of other persons, among them the plaintiff and several of the interveners. Thereafter, in an action which finally came to this court on appeal, it was determined that the whole proceeding for the construction of the tunnel, including the assessment and issuance of the bonds, was absolutely void. Thompson v. Hance, 174 Cal. 572, 163 Pac. 1021. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff had purchased from the contractors some of the bonds so issued, amounting to $9,095.15. It also sets forth the proceedings for the assessment, the fact that it was declared void as aforesaid, and alleges that the entire proceeding was inaugurated and carried on by the persons concerned, other than the property owners, in good faith and in the belief that it was authorized by law, and that a large number of the property owners, acting in the same belief, paid the assessment or suffered bonds to issue on their property; that all were acting under a misapprehension and mistake of law, all supposing that they knew and understood it, and making substantially the same mistake, but that others of the property owners, who did not so believe, brought the action which resulted in the decision aforesaid that the proceeding was utterly void. Plaintiff alleged that it brought the action in behalf of itself and all others who were united in interest with it and who should elect to come into the action. The prayer was that it be ascertained what amount was due to the plaintiff and other parties who might come in as interveners on account of the payments made or bonds held by them; that after such adjudication the city of Los Angeles be given 20 days in which to elect whether it would pay the amounts so found to be due, and if it announced its intention to pay, that it be given time and afforded facilities and accommodations such as its financial condition and means should render reasonable in which to pay, but that if it failed to pay or to announce its election to do so, then, either, first, that the tunnel be sold to satisfy the amount of money due, in the same manner as property is sold under a foreclosure of a mortgage, or, second, that the tunnel be decreed to be the property of the parties in whose favor the adjudication was made, and for such other and further relief as to equity may seem meet. The theory of the complaint was that the tunnel had been built with the money which the plaintiff and the several interveners had furnished to the contractors on the faith of the validity of the assessment and bonds aforesaid; that it had become the property of the city of Los Angeles without any consideration, and that in consequence thereof the city held the tunnel as property belonging to the plaintiff and the interveners and in trust for them. The object of the action obviously was to enforce this trust either by selling the property and distributing the proceeds to the beneficiaries of the trust, or by declaring the property to be the property of the plaintiff and interveners, and providing that if it desired to hold it, the city could do so by paying the plaintiff and the interveners the amounts they had paid for its construction.

The city filed a demurrer to this complaint, which was overruled by the court, and the city failed to answer. Thereupon the court entered the default of the city for failure to answer and rendered a decree declaring that the tunnel was held by the city in trust for the plaintiff and the interveners and for other persons who should be held entitled to come in, and, further, that a large number of persons were entitled to come in as interveners who had not as yet come in and whose presence as parties was necessary to a complete determination of the action, and directing that they be brought in as parties, and that for that purpose a supplemental complaint be filed and served upon them, and further ordering that when the amount to be paid to the several parties interested in the fund was ascertained the city be allowed twenty days in which to elect to retain the tunnel and pay the amount, in which case it should be given reasonable time and facilities to make such payment; that when payment should be made the several parties should receive their due proportion thereof as should be determined by the decree of the court, but that if the city failed to pay, that it should forthwith deliver to the parties adjudged to be equitably entitled thereto the tunnel aforesaid; and, further, that the city's right, title, and interest in and to said tunnel had by force and virtue of the decree passed to and vested in said parties and that since partition thereof could not be made without prejudice to said owners that the same be sold as upon foreclosure sale of a mortgage and the amount realized be distributed to the parties respectively in proportion to his right as the same should be determined by the court.

[2] This so-called judgment was interlocutory in its nature. Although it declared the rights which the court concluded the plaintiff and the parties then before the court had with respect to the tunnel, it is evident from the fact that other parties having similar rights were necessary to a complete determination of the case, and direction was given for bringing them in, that it was not intended to be final. In accordance with this direction, a supplemental complaint was filed and served upon a large number of persons who had either paid assessments or held bonds issued thereon. Such persons filed complaints in intervention, demurrers were filed thereto by the city and were overruled, and decrees or orders similar to that just mentioned were entered on March 29th and July 3d, 1918. Finally, however, on August 15, 1918, the parties ordered to be brought in having all appeared or having declined to appear, the court entered a judgment, reciting that the cause came on regularly for final hearing, all the parties being represented by their respective counsel. This judgment recites the beginning of the action, the filing of the several complaints in intervention and of the demurrers thereto, the orders overruling the demurrers, the refusal of the city to answer the several complaints; that thereupon the court determined the amounts due to the respective parties interested on account of said assessment and bonds. Then follows the judgment of the court that the city held the tunnel in trust for the plaintiff and interveners; that if it chose to do so it would be allowed to retain the tunnel by paying into court for the persons entitled thereto the sum of money so ascertained as due them, which are set out in detail, amounting to $144,526.81; that the city be granted twenty days from the entry of the judgment in which to elect whether it would pay said amount; that if within that period it announced its intention to pay, it should be given such time and afforded such facilities to make such payment as the court should deem reasonable, and that if it did pay the same, the amount should be distributed to each party according to the apportionment made in the decree; that if within the twenty days it should fail to so elect to retain the tunnel, it should then deliver the said tunnel to the parties entitled thereto, that is, the plaintiff and the interveners, and that "all its right, title, interest and claim in and to the said tunnel do by force and virtue of this decree, ipso facto, pass to and vest in said parties"; also that thereupon the tunnel be sold as upon the foreclosure of a mortgage and the amount realized be distributed among the parties according to their interest.

[3, 4] We think there can be no doubt that this judgment constitutes the final judgment in the action. It was not made until all the parties whom the court deemed necessary were brought in and made parties to the suit so that the entire controversy could be determined. It purports to and does determine all the issues presented by the pleadings of all the parties, and it ascertains and states the rights of the parties arising thereon, and the relief to be given for the enforcement of those rights. This constitutes a final judgment. "A decree which finally disposes of all the issues raised between all the parties to an action and finally settles and adjudicates all the rights in controversy is final." 2 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 65. An order "is a decision made during the progress of a cause * * * settling some point of practice or some question collateral to the main issue presented by the pleadings," if made before judgment, or settling some question "necessary to be determined in carrying into execution the final judgment," if made after judgment. The final judgment "is the determination of the court upon the issue presented by the pleadings, which ascertains and fixes absolutely and finally the rights of the parties in the particular suit in relation to the subject-matter in litigation, and puts an end to the suit." Loring v. Illsley, 1 Cal. 27, 28. "A decree is none the less final because some future orders of the court may become necessary to carry it into effect; * * * nor because, when the merits of the controversy are adjudicated upon, and the equities of the parties definitely settled, an account is directed to be taken to ascertain what sum is due from one to the other, as the result of the decision made by the court" (Freeman on Judgts. § 24); or where, as the result of the judgment, the defendant or plaintiff is required to pay money in order to have it carried out and a subsequent order is necessary for the purpose of determining that the money had been paid and the conditions complied with (Freeman on Judgts. § 28). "If the judgment stand the test of the inquiry as to whether it disposes of the merits of the action, and terminates the controverted issues, the fact that further proceedings remain to be taken in court to make it effective does not affect its finality." 2 Spelling on New Trial, § 483. See, also, Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 32, 138 Pac. 696, where the subject is elaborately treated.

The so-called judgment of January 17, 1919, recites that the city had elected to avail itself of the privilege of retaining the property and paying the amount therefor fixed by the aforesaid decree, as therein provided. Thereupon the court entered a supplemental order or decree to the effect that the proposition of the city to retain the tunnel and pay the money was accepted; that the city thereby became indebted to the respective parties plaintiff and interveners in certain specified amounts to each; and that payment thereof be made by the city in five installments as therein set forth. Thereafter, in October, 1919, the plaintiff moved the court to modify the said last-mentioned supplemental decree in certain particulars. The motion was granted, and thereupon the court, on October 14th, entered the modified supplemental decree from which the present appeal is taken. In this decree the court ordered that the plaintiff and interveners recover a certain sum which the parties had agreed to accept on account as the consideration for extending the privilege given to the city to retain the tunnel; and providing that the remainder of the sum due the parties be paid in five installments annually, and declaring that when all the payments should be made, as therein provided, the title and interest of the plaintiff and interveners in the tunnel should be extinguished and the same should become and be the property of the city of Los Angeles free and clear of any claim of the said parties thereto, but that if the city should fail to pay, as thus provided, its privilege should expire, and the tunnel should remain the property of said parties free of all claim by the city.

[5] The last-mentioned supplemental decree was nothing more than an order of the court after judgment, made for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the provisions of the final judgment entered in August, 1918. The appellant concedes that if this be the correct view of the case it has no objection to urge against this supplemental order.

[6] The main point urged in support of the appeal is that the city was never under any obligation to restore to the plaintiff and interveners, or to the contractors, the money so furnished to such contractors for the construction of the tunnel; that the effect of a judgment requiring such restoration was to compel the city to make a gift of such money to the parties claiming it; that this is forbidden by the provisions of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution, and consequently that the entire proceeding, including the final judgment of August, 1918, is absolutely void and constitutes no foundation for the supplemental decree attempting to enforce it. It is clear that there is no foundation for this claim. The entering of the judgment of August, 1918, was not a gift by the city to any person. The plaintiff and the interveners asserted their claims in a court of general jurisdiction in good faith and for the purpose of obtaining relief in that court. The court had jurisdiction of the action and of the parties thereto. It gave its judgment accordingly, declaring that the city held possession of the tunnel, but that it held the same in trust for the use and benefit of the plaintiff and the interveners and that it was the property of the plaintiff and interveners, at the same time giving the city the privilege of retaining the same on payment of the money which had been furnished by the other parties and with which the tunnel had been constructed. The judgment, being given by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties and having become final, is binding and conclusive. Such a judgment declaring that property held by a city for public use is the property of a private individual is, after it has become final, conclusive upon the city and the public. San Francisco v. Holladay, 76 Cal. 18, 17 Pac. 942; People v. Holladay, 93 Cal. 247, 29 Pac. 54, 27 Am. St. Rep. 186; Strand Imp. Co. v. Long Beach, 173 Cal. 769, 161 Pac. 975. There was a controversy between the parties over this question. The judgment determined it against the city and gave it the option to retain the property by paying certain sums of money. Its payment thereof was in no sense a gift. On the contrary, it was the consideration paid by it for the restoration of the property to which it had been adjudged to have no title except for the benefit of others.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of George E. Henning, deceased. From an order refusing probate to a letter claimed to be a will, proponent appeals. Affirmed.

Gates & Randles, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lester Wm. Roth, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an appeal from an order denying probate to a letter written by the deceased dated May 15, 1920, to his brother, the petitioner, for its probate. Like most letters, it is entirely written, signed, and dated in the handwriting of the deceased. The letter is too long to quote. The writer states that he is coming East for the purpose of getting married. He expected to leave Los Angeles on July 3d, to arrive at Thurmont, Md., July 8th, and be married July 15th, if the girl he had picked out would have him. The writer discusses his own love affair and that of Hazel, who was willing to get married, but whose "Little Slim man" is very slow about asking her. The only possible justification for the claim that this letter is testamentary in character is the following:

"If there is anny troble on the roade That is get hurt ore sick thay [Edison Company] look after me and if I should get killed there is plenty of money to put me away in fine shape. Then i want you to have everything."

From the whole letter, however, it is evident that the deceased was contemplating matrimony rather than death. The judgment of the trial court was correct.

Order affirmed.

PARKS v. GATES. (Sac. 2919.)

1. Waters and water courses ⊂=247(2)—Injunction against interference with irrigation ditch warranted.

In a suit to enjoin defendant from interfering with plaintiff's irrigating ditch over certain land, a finding that title to the land was in plaintiff, subject only to an easement in favor of defendant for road purposes, is sufficient to support a judgment for plaintiff, irrespective of whether he had a prescriptive right to use the ditch over defendant's right of way, in the absence of any showing that the maintenance of the ditch interfered with the easement.

2. Easements ⊂=12(1)—Direct grant of right of way for road conveys easement only.

Rights of way under Civ. Code, § 801, and Pol. Code, § 2631, being easements, a direct grant of a right of way for a road carries with it only an easement, nothing passing by such a grant but that which is necessary for its reasonable and proper enjoyment.

3. Deeds ⊂=97—Being read as whole, habendum may be limitation on estate granted.

To determine the effect of a deed, the whole instrument must be read together, and the habendum may be resorted to as a limitation on the estate granted.

4. Easements ⊂=12(1)—Grant of land for purpose of granting right of way held limited to grant of easement.

A fee-simple title, being presumed to be intended to pass by a grant of real property, unless it appears from the grant that a lesser was intended (Civ. Code, § 1105), and grants being interpreted as any other contract (Civ. Code, § 1066), a deed conveying a strip of land "for the purpose of granting * * * a right of way" from grantee's premises expressed an intention to limit the interest conveyed to an easement for a right of way rather than merely to indicate grantor's motive in making the grant.

5. Waters and water courses ⊂=154(1)—Easement to maintain irrigating ditch acquired as incident of conveyance.

Where an irrigating ditch was constructed over two tracts of land for the use of all the land while it was owned by tenants in common, the easement of maintaining such ditch through the portion acquired by one cotenant in severalty after division of the land between them by interchange of deeds passed to him, under Civ. Code, § 1104.

6. Waters and water courses ⊂=247(2)—Prescriptive right to maintain ditch established.

In a suit to enjoin the obstruction of an irrigation ditch, evidence held sufficient to show plaintiff for more than six years had been continuously, openly, and adversely, with full knowledge of defendant, maintaining and operating same under circumstances sufficient to establish a prescriptive right.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; W. H. Langdon, Judge.

Suit by W. S. Parks against Emery Gates. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Hatton and Hatton & Scott, all of Modesto, for appellant.

L. L. Dennett, Dennett & Zion and J. C. Needham, all of Modesto, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This appeal is from a judgment enjoining defendant from obstructing and interfering with plaintiff's maintenance and use of an irrigating ditch across a 24-foot strip of land, the fee title to which is claimed by both parties.

The history of the transaction, as appears from the record, shows that some years prior to this litigation one Hurlburt and the respondent Parks owned as tenants in common a tract of land comprising 176 acres. Later, by an interchange of deeds, Hurlburt became the owner of the north 76 acres of the tract and Parks became the owner of the south 100 acres. During the period that Hurlburt and Parks owned the entire property in common, there existed a roadway running from the northern tract, upon which farm buildings were situated, through and near the center of the southern tract, and to and connecting with a county road on the south. On October 31, 1908, about three months after the deeds between Hurlburt and Parks conveying these separate tracts in severalty, Parks executed a deed to Hurlburt of the strip of land in dispute which followed the line of this roadway, by a conveyance containing in its granting clause the following recital:

"Does grant, bargain and convey: All of that certain lot or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the county of Stanislaus, state of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows."

Here follows a description by courses and distances of this disputed strip of land, with the concluding words:

"This grant is for the ———— of granting to party of the second part a right of way from his premises to the county road."

Subsequently, by mesne conveyance from Hurlburt, the north 76 acres and the strip in dispute were conveyed by straight bargain and sale deeds to the defendant Gates.

In this connection it will be helpful to an understanding of the entire situation to also state that the irrigation ditch in question was located upon the 176 acres of land, while the entire tract was owned in common by Hurlburt and Parks, and extended from the northerly line of the tract toward the east side, across the 76-acre tract, and partly across the 100-acre tract, and then turned west and extended across this roadway into the westerly side of the 100-acre tract. It was constructed and used for conveying water from the Turlock irrigation canals for the irrigation of these lands of Hurlburt and Parks, and was used by respondent Parks thereafter during all the time subsequent to his acquiring title in severalty to the south 100 acres, and up to the time of the commencement of this action. It is for filling up and obstructing this ditch where it crosses the road, by defendant, that this injunction was sought.

The contention of appellant is that the deed of October 31, 1908, vested in him the title in fee to this strip of land. Respondent contends that the deed only conveyed an easement for right of way for road purposes, and that in any event he has acquired the right to maintain his irrigation ditch thereon by adverse user, and by reason of the fact that an easement was created in his favor to maintain such ditch as an incident of the conveyances between himself and his co-owner, Hurlburt. The trial court found in favor of respondent on both propositions. First:

"That the deed of October 31, 1908, grants to the defendant and his predecessors in interest a right of way or easement for a road to the land therein described reserving to plaintiff the title in fee to said land."

Second:

"That irrespective of the deed the plaintiff has a prescriptive right to run water through the said ditch, over, through, and across said right of way."

[1] The finding that the title to this strip of land is in the plaintiff, subject only to an easement in favor of defendant for its use for road purposes, is sufficient alone to support the judgment and injunction in plaintiff's favor, if it correctly interprets the deed, and in the absence of any showing that the maintenance of the irrigation ditch interferes with defendant's easement for a road.

[2] We think the finding of the court as to the effect of this deed is right. There is no dispute under the authorities that a direct grant of a "right of way" for a road carries with it only an easement in the land. Rights of way are classified as easements by section 801 of the Civil Code and section 2631 of the Political Code. Nothing passes by a grant of a right of way "but that which is necessary for its reasonable and proper enjoyment." Smith v. Worn, 93 Cal. 206, 215, 28 Pac. 944, 946; 3 Kent Com. 419, 420; Patchett v. Pac. Coast Ry., 100 Cal. 505, 35 Pac. 73.

[3, 4] It may be conceded that in this instrument the grantor used apt words to convey a fee title if we refer only to the language of the granting clause including and preceding the description of the land affected. But a deed is to be construed as any other contract, from its four corners; and when we find in the granting clause, immediately following the words of grant, bargain, and sale, and the description, the declaration of the grantor that "this grant is for the purpose of granting to party of the second part a right of way from his premises to the county road," there can be no question but that the expressed intention is to limit the interest conveyed to an easement for a right of way. (The word "purpose" does not appear in the deed in the connection given in the above quotation, but in construing the language used both parties seem to concede that such was the purport of the omitted word, and there can be no doubt from the context that such was the fact.)

Under the rules of construction, the whole instrument must be read together to determine the effect of a deed, and the habendum may be resorted to as a limitation upon the estate granted. Section 1105 of the Civil Code declares that "a fee-simple title is presumed to be intended to pass by a grant of real property, unless it appears from the grant that a lesser estate was intended," and grants are to be interpreted as any other contract. Civ. Code, § 1066.

In Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 37 Pac. 1049, it is said:

"The intention, it is sometimes said, is to be gathered from the four corners of the instrument, and in case of a grant the habendum, as well as any other portion of the instrument, is to be considered. The ordinary use of the habendum is to define or limit the quantity of interest, or the estate which the grantee is to have in the property granted, and, although usually made a separate portion of the instrument, is not necessarily so, but may be wholly omitted, and the interest or estate granted may be defined or limited in the premises or granting part of the conveyance. Montgomery v. Sturdivant, 41 Cal. 290. * * * 'It is in such case to be considered as an addendum or proviso to the conveyancing clause, which by a well-settled rule of construction must control the conveyancing clause or premises, even to the extent of destroying the effect of the same.'"

Misconception of the effect of the qualifying language used in this deed has doubtless resulted from failing to distinguish between the use of the words "for the purpose of granting a right of way" as a limitation upon the interest conveyed, and the use of the words in cases cited by appellant merely expressing the purpose of making the grant, as indicating the grantor's motive, as in an unlimited grant of described land "for a road to and from said premises." Soukup v. Topka, 54 Minn. 66, 55 N. W. 824; Eldridge v. See Yup Co., 17 Cal. 45; Fitzgerald v. County of Modoc, 164 Cal. 493, 129 Pac. 794, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1229; Cooper v. Selig (Cal. App.) 191 Pac. 983.

There is a vast difference between a grant for purposes of "right of way" for a road and a grant of land "to be used for a road." The latter grant may be entirely consistent with the conveyance of a fee-simple title, as a road may be maintained as readily on land held in fee as under an easement; but the grant of land as a right of way recognizes nothing but an easement.

[5] Of course, under the construction given this deed by the trial court, with which we are in accord, the finding of plaintiff's prescriptive right to maintain his water ditch across this strip of land becomes immaterial; but we may say that we think the evidence in support of such finding is ample. In the first place, the easement to maintain this ditch apparently passed to plaintiff with the division of the land between himself and his cotenant, the evidence disclosing that the ditch was constructed over both tracts for the use of all the land while it was owned in common.

"A transfer of real property passes all easements attached thereto, and creates in favor thereof an easement to use other real property of the person whose estate is transferred in the same manner and to the same extent as such property was obviously and permanently used by the person whose estate is transferred, for the benefit thereof, at the time when the transfer was agreed upon or completed." Civ. Code, § 1104; Quinlan v. Noble, 75 Cal. 250, 17 Pac. 69.

[6] Moreover, the evidence shows without contradiction that the plaintiff for upwards of six years prior to bringing this action had been continuously, openly, and adversely, with full knowledge of the defendant, maintaining and operating this ditch, and under circumstances justifying the finding of the court that such use and possession was sufficient to establish a prescriptive right.

The judgment is affirmed.

DE MOULIN v. MAGNESITE REFRACTORIES CO. et al. (Sac. 2973.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1921. Rehearing Denied July 7, 1921.)

1. Corporations ⇐482(5)—Finding warranted that assignment of mortgage to wife by company's president was not effective when mortgages were authorized.

In suit to foreclose mortgages given by a corporation to its president's wife to secure a claim of the president against the company, evidence held to justify the trial court's finding that the assignment of the indebtedness to the wife by the president had not become effective at the time of the adoption of the resolution of the directors of the company authorizing the mortgages.

2. Corporations ⇐298(5)—Mortgages executed pursuant to resolution of directors, one of whom interested, invalid.

Where the president of a company, one of the two directors present and voting at a meeting which authorized mortgages, was directly interested in the passage of the resolution authorizing such mortgages to secure a claim due to him from the company, which he intended subsequently to convey to his wife, his vote on the resolution was of no avail, the resolution was unauthorized, and the mortgages pursuant thereto were invalid.

3. Corporations ⇐480—Attachment had priority over unauthorized corporate mortgage subsequently ratified.

An attachment levied on a corporation's lands had priority over a mortgage previously executed without proper authority from the board of directors, but subsequently ratified by them after levy of the attachment.

4. Assignments ⇐79—Notes and mortgages given for prior indebtedness transfer indebtedness, though instruments void.

The assignment of notes and mortgages given for a precedent indebtedness has the effect to transfer the prior indebtedness, even if the notes and mortgages are void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by U. S. De Moulin against the Magnesite Refractories Company and others and Paul Milanovich, who filed cross-complaint. From the judgment, plaintiff and the cross-complaining defendant appeal. Affirmed.

William H. Fuller, of Los Angeles, and N. F. Bradley, of Visalia, for appellant.

F. J. Schuhl, Middlecoff & Feemster, of Visalia, Max B. Jamison and J. T. Fuller, both of Porterville, and Chas. E. Putnam, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. On August 20, 1917, the defendant corporation was indebted to Ed De Moulin, its president, in the sum of $8,890.32. At that time it was indebted to Paul Milanovich, the defendant, in the sum of $3,463.83. On August 20, 1917, Ed De Moulin and W. H. Fuller, two of the three directors of the defendant corporation, purporting to act as such directors at a special meeting of such board, authorized the execution of three mortgages to A. J. De Moulin, wife of Ed De Moulin, to secure said claim of $8,890.32; one mortgage covering the real estate belonging to the corporation in Tulare county, another covering the personal property located in said county, and the third covering the personal property located in Los Angeles county, valued at $1,998.30. The mortgagee assigned the mortgages to plaintiff, U. S. De Moulin, who is a brother of Ed De Moulin, who brought this action to foreclose the three mortgages above mentioned, but subsequently dismissed the third count for the foreclosure of the chattel mortgage upon the property in Los Angeles. The defendant corporation made default, and Paul Milanovich appeared and by way of answer and cross-complaint asserted that the mortgages in question were fraudulent and void as to him, and asked to have his claim established as a superior lien on all the real and personal property of the corporation. The personal property in Los Angeles county was sold after the commencement of this action for $1,998.30, which sum had been paid to plaintiff. Defendant Milanovich sought by his cross-complaint to have such sum applied to his claim. Milanovich brought an attachment suit on the 27th day of August, 1917, and the writ of attachment was levied against all the real and personal property of the defendant corporation in the county of Tulare, but was not levied upon the personal property covered by the chattel mortgage in the county of Los Angeles. Judgment was rendered by the trial court, giving Milanovich a prior lien as to the real and personal property in Tulare county, and denying his prayer that the proceeds derived from the sale of the personal property in Los Angeles county be applied to his claim. The plaintiff appealed from that portion of the judgment giving Milanovich a prior lien, and Milanovich appeals from that portion of the judgment refusing to direct the application of the proceeds of the personal property in Los Angeles to his claim. Both appeals were taken upon the judgment roll, including a bill of exceptions, and are now before us for consideration.

The trial court found as a fact that the corporation was insolvent at the time of the execution of the mortgages in question, and it clearly appears from the pleadings and the evidence that the indebtedness of the corporation was vastly in excess of its assets. At the time in question 40 cars of worthless rock and dirt supposed by the defendant corporation to be magnesite ore were en route to a consignee in New York, who, subsequently discovering the character of the shipment, refused to receive or pay for it. It is clear that at the time in question the corporation was actually insolvent, although the directors may have believed that the shipment in question was worth $30,000, as it would have been, had it consisted of magnesite ore, in which event the corporation would have been solvent.

[1-3] The trial court found that at the time of the adoption of the resolution authorizing the mortgages in question, the corporation was not indebted to A. J. De Moulin. It is conceded that the corporation was indebted on and prior to August 20, 1917 to its president, Ed De Moulin, in the sum of $8,890.32 as above stated. The plaintiff's claim is that Ed De Moulin assigned his claim against the corporation to his wife, A. J. De Moulin, on the 20th day of August, 1917, prior to the time when the purported meeting of the board of directors was held. There is sufficient, however, in his evidence to justify the finding of the trial court that the assignment of said indebtedness had not become effective at the time of the adoption of the resolution authorizing the mortgages. Ed De Moulin testified that the written assignment offered in evidence was made out by him on the evening of August 19th, was brought by him to the office on August 20th, that he believed that his wife was not present in the office at any time during that day, and that after the passage of the resolution and the execution of the notes and mortgages in question he took said notes and mortgages and delivered them to his wife at her residence, receiving in consideration therefor a surrender of his note for $4,500, theretofore executed and delivered by him to his wife by way of gift the preceding April. He does not testify that the assignment was delivered to her prior to the meeting of the board of directors, and the circumstances indicate that it was delivered afterward, although he did testify in general terms that he assigned his claim to his wife previous to the passage of the resolution in question.

This being true, it follows that it is unnecessary to consider the contention of the defendant that the meeting of the board of directors was apparently held without any previous notice of such meeting, because the president, one of the two directors present and voting at the meeting, was directly interested in the passage of the resolution authorizing the execution of the mortgages to secure a claim due to him which he intended subsequently to convey to his wife. His vote upon the resolution was therefore of no avail, the resolution was without authority, and the mortgages executed in pursuance thereof were invalid. Curtin v. Salmon River, etc., Co., 130 Cal. 345, 62 Pac. 552, 80 Am. St. Rep. 132. It is claimed that the same two directors met on the 3d of September, 1917, at a regular meeting, at a time and place fixed in the by-laws and passed a resolution ratifying and confirming the execution of said mortgages. Assuming for a moment that this meeting was properly constituted, the act of ratification would be unavailing as to the real and personal property in Tulare county, because Milanovich had caused an attachment to be levied thereon, which attachment would have priority notwithstanding the attempted ratification, and for the reasons hereinafter stated it is unnecessary to determine the validity of the chattel mortgage on the property in Los Angeles county. Civ. Code, § 2313.

[4] The District Court of Appeal reversed that portion of the judgment of the trial court which denied the application of Milanovich to have the $1,998.30 received from the sale of the personal property in Los Angeles county applied to his claim, on the ground that the plaintiff had no valid obligation against the corporation, and therefore held that sum for the corporation. It was because of our doubt as to the correctness of this conclusion, particularly in view of the recent decision of this court upon a similar question in Ellison v. Henion, 190 Pac. 793, 11 A. L. R. 444, that the rehearing was granted. Under that decision, and Goldman v. Murray, 164 Cal. 419, 129 Pac. 462, the assignment of the notes and mortgages given for a precedent indebtedness would have the effect of transferring the prior indebtedness even if the notes and mortgages were void. Applying that principle to the case at bar, we find that after the execution of the notes and mortgages in question the prior indebtedness which they were given to secure was transferred to A. J. De Moulin, and her subsequent transfer of the mortgages and notes carried the indebtedness with it, and thus the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant corporation to the extent of $8,890.32, and the corporation having consented to the sale of the personal property of the corporation in Los Angeles county, and to the application of the proceeds to that indebtedness, the defendant and cross-complainant, Milanovich, is not entitled to complain of that action unless he had a lien thereon prior to the sale.

The trial court found that the chattel mortgage upon the Los Angeles personal property was not recorded. It is contended that there is no evidence to support this conclusion, and it is asserted in the brief that it was in fact recorded. This, however, is immaterial, because the cross-complainant, Milanovich, never secured a lien thereon by attachment; therefore the application of the proceeds of the sale to a valid indebtedness of the corporation then owing to the plaintiff was a proper application of the assets of the corporation.

The judgment is affirmed.

WRIGHT v. WRIGHT. (Civ. 3597.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 6, 1921.)

1. Divorce ⊂=133(1) — Declarations two months before trial that husband would not return does not establish that separation was desertion.

The husband's declaration two months before trial that he was through with his wife, with whom he had not been living for some time, does not show that the separation amounted to desertion for the statutory period within Civ. Code, § 99.

2. Divorce ⊂=37(6)—Separation beginning by consent does not amount to desertion.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 99–101, relating to desertion, continuation of a separation beginning by consent of both spouses does not amount to desertion on the part of the husband who left the wife, until some withdrawal of the consent or the occurrence of some act, or the making of some declaration indicating a change in the attitude of the parties.

3. Divorce ⊂=37(14)—Wife held not entitled to divorce on ground of desertion, though husband ceased to provide during absence.

Where a wife consented to her husband's leaving her and going to a foreign country, and after some period of time he ceased to make remittances, and the parties ceased correspondence, yet where there was no showing that the wife ever withdrew her consent to the separation, and the only thing indicating desertion was that two months before trial the husband stated he would not return, the wife was not entitled to the divorce on the ground of desertion, particularly as Civ. Code, § 175, declares that a husband is not liable for the support of his wife living separate from him, unless the agreement for separation so provides.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action for divorce by Ida Frances Wright against Stanton MacDonald Wright. From a judgment denying the relief sought, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Davis, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to secure a divorce upon the claimed ground: First, that she had been deserted by her husband; and, second, that the husband had failed to provide her with the necessaries of life, alleging that the desertion and the failure to provide had continued for more than one year prior to the commencement of the action. Defendant was personally served with the summons and complaint, but made no appearance in the action. Upon his default being entered the court proceeded to hear the testimony of plaintiff and her witnesses, and entered a judgment denying the relief prayed for. Plaintiff has appealed.

The testimony of the plaintiff was to the effect that at a time about five years prior to the commencement of the action her husband left the marital domicile, which was then in the city of New York, and went to Paris; that she knew where he was going at the time of his departure and that there had been no trouble between the two up to that date; that the husband sent money to her for several years amounting to about $60 per month, and that a little more than a year prior to the commencement of her action he ceased to send money or make any provision for her support; that up to about the time that he ceased to send money he had written letters to her and she had responded thereto. In that connection she testified as follows:

"Q. And when did you find out he was going to leave you? A. Well, I commenced to suspect it. His letters, about may be a little over a year after he left, his letters came fewer and fewer between and didn't mention my going to where he was and didn't mention coming to where I was, so I commenced to think that perhaps he wouldn't come back. Q. Did you say anything about that in your letters to him? A. No, sir. Q. How did it come you didn't write to him about it? A. Because I didn't think it was my place. I thought if he wanted to come back he would come. Q. Did he finally cease writing to you altogether? A. Yes; he did. Q. Did you finally cease writing to him also? A. Yes; I didn't answer letters that I didn't receive. Q. You never wrote him except to answer his letters? A. That was all. Q. Have you any of those letters with you? A. I have nothing; no."

The testimony further of the plaintiff was that for more than a year prior to the commencement of the action she had been living with and been supported by her mother. The mother of the plaintiff, as well as the mother of the defendant, gave testimony corroborative of this statement of the plaintiff, and both of the last-mentioned witnesses also corroborated the plaintiff as to the fact that she and the defendant had not lived together for more than one year prior to the commencement of the action. Another witness testified that the defendant was at the time of the trial living with him, and that about two months before the trial the defendant had said that "he was not going back home any more, he was through there."

[1-3] The statement to which the latter testimony referred, being made within the year prior to the commencement of the action, was not sufficient to show that the desertion of the defendant began at a date remote enough to mark the commencement of the statutory period. Section 99, Civ. Code. Appellant in her brief admits that the separation of husband and wife, at the time it occurred, when the husband went to Paris, was by the consent of each party. Under the initial condition then affecting the separation, the continuance of that separation would not give rise to a cause of action for divorce on the ground of desertion until the consent of one or the other of the parties was withdrawn, which withdrawal would necessarily have to be shown by the occurrence of some act or the making of some declaration indicating a change in the attitude of one or the other of the parties. Section 100 of the Civil Code provides as follows:

"Absence or separation, proper in itself, becomes desertion whenever the intent to desert is fixed during such absence or separation."

Civil Code, § 101:

"Consent to a separation is a revocable act, and if one of the parties afterwards, in good faith, seeks a reconciliation and restoration, but the other refuses it, such refusal is desertion."

Accepting the admission of appellant, which is borne out fully by her testimony, that there was a separation by consent in the first instance, it must be concluded, we think, that the trial court was altogether justified in holding that no showing was made of the occurrence of anything from which it was proper to infer that the husband intended to desert his wife. The declaration made by the defendant two months before the trial as to his intentions was insufficient for the reasons already given. Counsel's main reliance is placed upon that testimony given by the plaintiff in which she stated that the defendant's letters and remittances to her had ceased for more than a year prior to the commencement of the action. The statute, however (section 175, Civ. Code), provides that a husband is not liable for the support of his wife when she is living separate from him by agreement "unless such support is stipulated in the agreement." There was no attempt to show that at the time the defendant left for Paris he made any promise to support the plaintiff, and the plaintiff made no contention that there existed any such agreement on his part; in fact, the circumstances surrounding the departure of the defendant from the house of the couple in New York were not given to the court, and the plaintiff's testimony touching that matter was such as to suggest that she preferred to leave the court in the dark as to the reasons for the separation. Under the circumstances of the case, and considering the evidence as it was presented to the trial judge, we think that the judgment adverse to the prayer of plaintiff's complaint was the only one proper to be entered.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LESSE. (Cr. 515.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 15, 1921.)

1. Indictment and information ⟹110(3)—Information for criminal syndicalism, where following the statute, is sufficient.

An information for criminal syndicalism under St. 1919, p. 281, is sufficient where it follows the statute, and not subject to demurrer, because failing to state the details of the offense with sufficient particularity.

2. Criminal law ⟹133, 134(2)—Defendant's showing for change of venue held insufficient.

In a criminal prosecution, where no sufficient notice of intention to move for change of venue was given the district attorney as required by law, and there was no affidavit showing that there existed any bias or prejudice against the defendant or that he could not get a fair and impartial trial in the county, and the affidavit used refers only to another defendant, the showing is wholly insufficient to justify granting the motion; there being no presumption that bias or prejudice shown to exist against one of two or more persons jointly charged exists against any of the others.

3. Criminal law ⟹1158(2)—Decision of trial court on conflicting affidavits for change of venue is conclusive.

On motion for change of venue, where the affidavits and counter affidavits as to bias or prejudice against the defendant are conflicting, the trial court is vested with authority to determine the conflict, and the appellate court is bound by its ruling.

4. Criminal law ⟹434—Where defendant, prosecuted for criminal syndicalism, admitted membership in I. W. W., a book of such organization held admissible.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism under St. 1919, p. 281, where defendant admitted that he was at the time charged in the information a member of the I. W. W., defined by leading dictionaries and encyclopedias as being an organization advocating criminal syndicalism, revolutionary violence, and sabotage, it was not error to read in evidence portions of a book entitled "The New Unionism," admitted to expound the doctrines of such organization; a reference to such book being found among papers in defendant's possession at time of arrest.

5. Jury ⟹105(1)—Jurors stating that they would act fairly notwithstanding adverse opinions of organization to which defendant belonged not subject to challenge.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, where the defendant admitted membership in the I. W. W., which advocates such doctrine, where jurors on voir dire admitted they entertained unfavorable opinions of such organization, but were wholly unacquainted with defendant and knew nothing about him and had no bias or prejudice against him, and knew none of the facts of the case, and stated that their opinions were formed from reading public journals, and that they could and would, if sworn as jurors, act fairly and impartially notwithstanding such opinions, such showing was sufficient for the swearing of such jurors under the express terms of Pen. Code, § 1076.

6. Jury ⟹105(1)—Merely because juror was not favorably inclined toward the I. W. W., of which accused was a member, is no ground for challenge; "criminal syndicalism."

Defendant, prosecuted for the crime of criminal syndicalism, which means, among other things, direct action and sabotage implying willful, malicious, and systematic injury to and destruction of property to injure the employer, was entitled to a jury that would try him fairly and impartially upon the facts of his case, but not to a jury who would excuse or condone unlawful acts of violence because he might make the pretense of believing or might believe that they were right, and where he was charged under St. 1919, p. 281, § 2, subd. 4, with being a member of a syndicalistic organization known as the I. W. W., he could not expect to have jurors excused because they were not favorably inclined toward such well-known organization.

7. Jury ⟹133—Defendant is precluded from reopening matter on juror's voir dire to show the same identical adverse opinion.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, where defendant had questioned a juror as to his opinion of the I. W. W., of which defendant was a member, and made his challenge and invited a ruling thereon, he was precluded from reopening the same matter in order to show the same identical opinion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Charles Lesse was convicted of the crime of criminal syndicalism under St. 1919, p. 281, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. G. Lawlor, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. The appellant was convicted of the crime of criminal syndicalism, as defined in the act of April 30, 1919 (Stats. of 1919, p. 281). The information against him charges a violation of each of the five sections of the act.

[1] He urges the point on demurrer that the information fails to state the details of the offense with sufficient particularity.

The information follows the statute and this has been held to be sufficient. Every question raised on demurrer has been raised in each of the several cases based upon this statute that have reached the appellate courts of this state, and in each case the points have been decided adversely to the contentions of appellant. This renders unnecessary any extended examination of his claims. We need only to direct attention to the cases of People v. Taylor, 34 Cal. App. Dec. 414,[1] People v. Steelik, 33 Cal. App. Dec. 594,[1] and People v. Malley, 194 Pac. 48, where these points are fully discussed.

[1] Held for hearing by Supreme Court.

[2] 2. The appellant moved for a change of venue. The motion was properly denied. No sufficient notice of intention to make the motion was given to the district attorney as required by law. There was an abortive attempt to give a notice of a similar motion in the case of People v. Golden, another defendant informed against in the same information. The district attorney, without waiving his claim that the notice was insufficient, stipulated that the papers used on the motion in the Golden Case might apply to this case. The showing was wholly insufficient to justify the motion. There was no affidavit, and no pretense of one, showing that there existed any bias or prejudice against this appellant or showing that he could not get a fair and impartial trial in the county of Humboldt. The affidavit actually used refers only to the defendant Golden. There exists no presumption that a bias or prejudice shown to exist against one of two or more persons jointly charged exists against any of the others.

[3] But, even if the affidavits on behalf of Golden could be held to apply to appellant, still the showing was insufficient. Counter affidavits were filed. These affidavits refer to the appellant, and they show that there existed at the time no bias or prejudice against him. At most, the evidence on the point was conflicting, and the trial court was vested with authority to determine the conflict. We approve the conclusions of the trial court, but, if it were otherwise, we would be bound thereby under a well-established rule.

[4] 3. The appellant insists that the court erred in permitting the district attorney to read to the jury certain portions of a book entitled "The New Unionism." This book relates to and expounds the doctrines of a syndicalistic organization commonly called the "I. W. W." Appellant admits that he was at the time charged in the information a member of this organization. The book purports on its face to be a publication made under authority of that organization. A reference to the book as I. W. W. literature was found among the papers in the possession of the appellant at the time of his arrest. It will be seen that the appellant (page 233 of reporter's transcript) admits that it is listed as an I. W. W. book by authority of that organization. On page 240 he admits that it is circulated by the same authority. There was no error in its admission.

But in truth its disclosures as to the purposes of the I. W. W. are a part of the current history of the day—a part of the history of the times. We are informed by the magazines, encyclopedias, and dictionaries of the day that the organization advocates criminal syndicalism, revolutionary violence, and sabotage. The book really informed the jury of nothing that they cannot read as a part of current history. The supplement to the International Encyclopedia issued in the year 1916, at page 330, speaking of the I. W. W., says:

"It favors direct action, including sabotage and the direct strike, favors industrial unionism in opposition to trade unionism, opposes resort to customary political methods, preaches industrial revolution and the immediate confiscation of capital goods."

Merriam's Webster's New International Dictionary—the very recent edition—shows under the word "syndicalism" in the addenda that it—

"aims to abolish the present political and social system * * * by means of the general strike and direct action, which is any kind of action that is directly effective, whether it be a simple strike, a peaceful public demonstration, sabotage, or revolutionary violence."

The New International Encyclopedia is one of the most recent reference works and general histories on the market. Under the title "Industrial Workers of the World," in expounding the principles of the organization, it states:

"It is the duty of the workers to injure the employer wherever possible. In accordance with its underlying philosophy, the tactics of the I. W. W. is that of guerilla warfare. * * * Such methods of injuring the employer are known as sabotage. Sabotage may consist in throwing the progress of production out of order, through tampering with machinery, improper use of materials, or loitering at work."

[5] 4. Several jurors stated on their voir dire that they entertained unfavorable opinions of the I. W. W., and one juror, in answer to a question as to the quantity of evidence that would be required to remove his unfavorable opinion, answered that it would take "enough." The appellant complains that these jurors, thus unfavorably inclined to this organization of which he is a member, could not give him a fair and impartial trial. We are not inclined to coincide in this view. These jurors answered that they were wholly unacquainted with the appellant; that they knew nothing whatever about him; that they entertained no bias or prejudice against him; and that they knew none of the facts of his case. Furthermore, each of them stated that their opinions were formed from reading public journals, and that they could, and if sworn as jurors would, notwithstanding such opinions, act fairly and impartially upon the matters to be submitted to them. This showing, under the express terms of section 1076 of the Penal Code, justified the court in accepting them as jurors.

[6] Moreover, these opinions were not adverse to the lawful rights of the appellant. He was, of course, entitled to a jury that would try him fairly and impartially upon the facts of his case, but he was not entitled to a jury who would excuse or condone unlawful acts of violence by him because, forsooth, he might make the pretense of believing or might in fact believe that they were right. Subdivision 4 of section 2 of the act under which he is prosecuted reads as follows:

"Any person who * * * becomes a member of any organization * * * organized or assembled to advocate, teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism" is guilty of a felony.

Criminal syndicalism means, among other things, direct action and sabotage.

This last word implies willful, malicious, and systematic injury to and destruction of property for the purpose of thereby injuring the employer.

All jurors who read must know in a general way all about the I. W. W. Those who cannot read are not competent jurors anyway.

It is not too much to say that it is to-day impossible to select a thoughtful reading man or woman as a juror who does not know the general purposes of the organization. The situation is quite unlike that of a juror who has formed adverse opinions concerning a mere conspiracy or other cabal local to a given case. In such case both the existence of the conspiracy and its unlawful purposes are facts of the particular case. Here we have to deal with an organization whose existence and purposes are matters of history. We do not excuse jurors because they do not believe in arson, rapine, and sabotage. The fact that these jurors are not favorably inclined to the I. W. W. neither legally nor morally disqualifies them where it fully appears, as it does here, that they can and will give the accused a fair and impartial trial.

5. Objection is made to certain remarks by the district attorney during his argument to the jury. These remarks were not unfair and were quite within the limits of permissible comment. His arguments were legitimate deductions from the facts proved. We find no error therein.

[7] 6. One further point remains to be noticed. One L. D. Graeter was called as a juror. After several questions concerning his opinions of the I. W. W. he was challenged for entertaining an unfavorable opinion of that organization. Like the other jurors, he testified that his opinions were founded upon what he had read in the public journals. He further stated that he could, and if sworn as a juror would, notwithstanding such opinions, act fairly and impartially upon the matters to be submitted to him. The challenge was overruled. Thus far his case is not unlike that of the other jurors.

However, after the court had passed upon his challenge, the appellant sought to reopen the same matter for the purpose of supporting his claim that the juror was biased against the I. W. W. He sought (appellant's brief, page 20) to show "whether or not his opinion was based upon other grounds." The court held that, having once questioned the juror as to his opinion of the I. W. W. and made his challenge and invited a ruling thereon, he was precluded from reopening the same matter in order to show the same identical opinion. In this the court was right.

The court was evidently willing to permit further examination as to other and distinct matters, for it wound up the colloquy on the subject with these words:

"You lay your foundation for the challenge and then make it."

In People v. Stonecifer, 6 Cal. 405, the court says:

"The first error assigned by the appellant is the refusal of the court below to allow him to re-examine the juror Knox, after he had been called and examined, first by the prisoner and afterwards by the state. The appellant contends that by this ruling he was forced to a peremptory challenge, when, if he had been allowed to examine him further, he might have been excluded for cause. * * *"

The court sustained the action of the trial court. A similar ruling was sustained in People v. Collins, 105 Cal. 512, 39 Pac. 16.

But as to all these jurors the court had not been advised by any evidence, statement, or suggestion during the trial and up to that time that the appellant was a member of the I. W. W.; hence there would have been no error in excluding questions touching that organization. The information did not charge appellant with being an I. W. W. There was no reference in the affidavits for a change of venue from which it could be inferred that he was such, even if such reference would have been sufficient to advise the court that this fact would be any part of either the prosecution or defense.

Moreover, the historical matter which we have quoted from standard works should be considered with reference to these questions to the jurors and their privilege of opinion as good citizens concerning the unlawful purposes and activities of the I. W. W. We have carefully examined the evidence and the whole case, and we are satisfied that no alleged error has resulted in any miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCHMIDT v. MILLER et al. (Civ. 3790.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 4, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 30, 1921.)

1. Corporations ⊂⊃269(3)—Evidence in action to enforce stockholders' liability held to show advancement for certain repayment.

In an action to recover from defendants their proportionate share of their mining corporation's indebtedness on a note to plaintiff, who had advanced money to defendants to develop asbestos mining claims owned by the corporation, in which plaintiff and his brother received about 200,000 of the capital stock of 500,000 shares, evidence held not to show that plaintiff was an associate in a joint adventure, showing rather that he had advanced the money to be repaid at all events, and not only out of profits.

2. Corporations ⊂⊃269(3)—Evidence in action to enforce stockholders' liability on note held to show no undue influence, menace, or fraud.

In an action to recover from defendants their proportionate share of their mining corporation's indebtedness on a note to plaintiff, who had advanced money to defendants to develop asbestos mining claims owned by the corporation, in which plaintiff and his brother received about 200,000 of the capital stock of 500,000 shares, finding that there was no undue influence, menace, or fraud exerted on defendants by plaintiff in procuring the note held sustained by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by H. H. Schmidt against Ella M. Miller and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and Cyril Appel, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Wm. H. Schooler, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover from the defendants their proportionate share of an alleged indebtedness of a corporation in which defendants were stockholders. Plaintiff recovered judgment, imposing upon defendants a stockholder's liability in the sum of $58,170.15, together with costs, and defendants appeal.

Four causes of action are set forth in the amended complaint. The first cause is predicated upon a promissory note by which the corporation promised to pay to plaintiff on demand the sum of $143,679.50. The second and third causes declare in assumpsit for the same amount, and by the fourth plaintiff claims that he laid out and expended for the use and benefit of the Trinity Asbestos Mining Company at the special instance and request of that corporation the sum of $3,017.03. By an amended answer defendants denied the indebtedness of the corporation, and denied that at the time the advances were made by plaintiff they were made pursuant to any promise to repay other than a promise that they should be repaid when the mine was developed and placed upon a paying basis. The execution of the note is admitted, and the amount thereof represents the result of an account stated. A portion of this sum was found by the trial court to be barred by subdivision 1 of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No contention is here made as to the correctness of the amount of the judgment, assuming a liability to exist.

[1] The main contention urged upon this appeal for reversal is that the evidence shows plaintiff to be an associate in a joint adventure to carry out and effectuate the purposes of which all of the members thereof had organized a close corporation, and that under such circumstances one of such persons cannot obtain the advantage of a stockholder's liability to the prejudice of his coadventurers. We see no merit in this contention. From the evidence it appears that certain of the defendants discovered and located a number of asbestos mining claims in Trinity county, Cal. In order to develop this property defendants entered into negotiations with plaintiff and his brother, Peter Schmidt, which culminated in the formation of a corporation known as the Trinity Asbestos Mining Company, with a capital stock of 500,000 shares, 200,000 of which were allotted to plaintiff and his brother. Thereafter plaintiff advanced about $30,000 to develop the mine, a sum he had been assured would put the property on a paying basis, but, this sum proving inadequate, upon the earnest and repeated solicitations of defendants he continued to advance large sums of money from time to time until the total, with interest, amounted to the sum of $143,679.50. The mine produced nothing; and plaintiff, being dissatisfied with the manner in which his funds were being applied, finally decided not to make any further advances, and thereupon demanded a note from the company to cover the amount mentioned. The note was given, and it is the instrument here sued on. The contention that plaintiff advanced the money with the understanding that it was only to be paid out of the profits of the mine is disposed of by the finding of the trial court that such was not the fact, and this conclusion finds support in the evidence. Aside from the other evidence on this subject the demand note itself negatives any such intention on the part of the parties. Nor is there any merit in the claim that plaintiff agreed or intended to waive his right to a stockholder's liability. The record does not support this contention.

[2] Equally untenable is the argument that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that the note was not procured by undue influence, menace, and fraud. In this behalf it is argued that plaintiff threatened defendants with vexatious litigation unless the corporation executed the note, and that the note was executed in consideration of plaintiff's making further advances, and to prevent a sale of the corporate property in payment of its debts. It is perhaps true that defendants all indulged the secret hope that plaintiff would continue to supply the corporation with funds, but the record fails to show that he ever obligated himself to do so. The finding that there was no undue influence, menace, or fraud is amply sustained by the evidence.

Other points do not require consideration. The judgment is affirmed.

ROSENBERG et al. v. ROGERS. (Civ. 2250.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 9, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1921.)

1. Trial ⊜194(11)—Instruction held on the weight of the evidence.

In an action for breach of contract to deliver a fig crop, where defendant contended she was released by plaintiffs' notification that they would not accept certain figs, an instruction that the contract released the defendant of her obligation to deliver any fruit owing to its destruction by frost or other unavoidable casualty was improper, because on the weight of the evidence, and invading the province of the jury, it appearing that the figs were not destroyed, but only damaged.

2. Sales ⊜421—Instruction on interpretation of contract erroneous.

In an action for a seller's failure to deliver a portion of a fig crop, where the only question in issue was whether the buyers had released the seller, an instruction interpreting the contract with respect to the right of the buyers to reject damaged figs was improper.

3. Sales ⊜421—Instruction on interpretation of contract held misleading.

In an action for failure of the seller to deliver a portion of a fig crop, where the seller contended she was relieved by the buyers' notice that they would not accept, an instruction that the contract provided that any fruit tendered which did not conform with the conditions stated might, at the option of the buyer, be rejected or taken without relieving the seller from the obligation to deliver any other portion of the fruit, was improper, because it might mislead the jury into believing that the buyers might take damaged figs without payment, the buyers merely having the option to accept and pay for damaged figs or reject them.

4. Appeal and error ⊜1176(1)—Where the evidence raised an issue of defense, appellate court cannot direct entry of judgment.

In an action for breach of contract for the sale of figs, where the evidence raised a substantial issue of defense, the appellate court cannot, at the instance of plaintiffs, who appealed from an erroneous judgment for defendant caused by error in instructions, direct that judgment be entered in plaintiffs' favor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Abraham Rosenberg and others against S. M. Rogers. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Terry W. Ward, of Merced, for appellant.

F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from the judgment in favor of defendant. The case was here before, and the judgment in favor of defendant was reversed. 186 Pac. 366. The action was to recover damages for the failure of defendant to deliver a portion of her crop of figs to plaintiffs, and was based upon a written contract executed by the parties on January 29, 1918. The terms of that contract, as far as applicable to the controversy herein, are set out and construed in said decision of this court, and the discussion needs no repetition. However, we may quote from that decision the following statement:

"The cause was tried by the court upon the theory that defendant was under no obligation to deliver any figs that did not measure up to the standard fixed by the contract, and specifically was under no obligation to tender any figs that were of poor quality, off color, dark, and defective and not in good merchantable condition."

This court held that such theory was entirely contrary to the express provision of the contract, and for that reason reversed the cause. Upon the second trial respondent relied upon the defense that she was released from any obligation to deliver or to tender the damaged figs by reason of the fact that appellants notified her that they would not accept said figs. There is evidence in the record to support her contention as to said notification, and, although controverted, it presented a question for the determination of the jury. No reason has been suggested why it was not competent for appellants to thus relieve respondent from any obligation to deliver or tender said damaged fruit. In other words, the consideration involves a question of fact, and not of law. It is true that, at the request of plaintiffs, the court gave this instruction to the jury:

"Under the terms of said contract the only condition by which defendant could be released from her obligation to deliver to plaintiffs said figs was the destruction thereof by frost, or other similar unavoidable casualty."

This must be read, however, in connection with the following, given at the request of defendant:

"Defendant admits that she did not deliver all the figs raised on her place in the year 1918, and contends that she offered to deliver to plaintiffs all the figs raised on her place, but plaintiffs refused to accept the ones in question; if, from the evidence you find this to have been the case, you will find for the defendant."

Thus considered, it substantially amounted to a charge that it was the legal duty of defendant to deliver the figs unless she was excused from the delivery by the refusal of plaintiffs to accept them.

[1] But an insuperable difficulty in the way of affirmance of the judgment is injected by this instruction given on request of respondent:

"The contract in this case expressly releases the seller, defendant herein, from her obligation to deliver any portion of the fruit contracted for, owing to its destruction by frost or other unavoidable casualty, to wit, rain."

If the jury followed this instruction, there was nothing to do but to find a verdict for the defendant, regardless of what they believed from the evidence. The instruction would not have been more objectionable if it had been couched in these words:

"The defendant is released by the terms of the contract from her obligation to deliver any portion of the fruit, for the reason that it was destroyed by frost or other unavoidable casualty, to wit, rain."

By said statement the court in effect instructed the jury that the defendant is released from any obligation under the contract in consequence of the destruction of the fruit. If the court had stated that under the terms of the contract the defendant would be released from any obligation to deliver any portion of the fruit that might be destroyed by frost or rain, it would be a proper interpretation of the intention of the parties; but even this might have been misleading, since there was no evidence that the figs were destroyed.

But, as given, the instruction involved an invasion by the court of the exclusive province of the jury to determine the weight of the evidence. It was for them to find whether the conditions were such as to relieve the defendant from any obligation under the contract. This, of course, will not be disputed. If the evidence had shown, without conflict, that the figs were destroyed by frost or rain, it could be held that the instruction was not prejudicial; but the evidence disclosed, on the contrary, that they were not destroyed, but only damaged.

Nor can we say that the instruction was cured by the giving of any other instruction on the subject. Assuming that in another instruction the determination of the question was left to the jury, we would have an irreconcilable conflict without being able to say which instruction the jury followed. It would also be impossible to conclude that the jury based their verdict solely upon the theory that defendant was absolved from liability by reason of the refusal of the plaintiffs to accept the figs. We might so hold, if the evidence as to that had all been in favor of respondent; but, as before indicated, there was a sharp conflict, and it cannot be said that the jury adopted respondent's theory.

[2, 3] Another instruction given by the court at the request of the defendant was as follows:

"The contract in this case provides among other things as follows: 'It is agreed that should any fruit tendered on this contract not conform with the above terms and conditions (the same having already been stated to you) it shall be optional with the buyer to reject same, or take such fruit in, assort and weigh back at seller's expense, and reject any portion of the lot not so conforming without in either case relieving seller from the obligation to deliver any other portion of the fruit herein contracted for.'

"I charge you that the plaintiff in this action was under no obligation to receive or pay for any figs of defendant which did not conform with the terms and conditions of the contract."

Under the evidence introduced, the jury were really not concerned with the proper interpretation of that part of the contract. The obligation of appellants was not in question. The only issue related to the liability of the defendant to deliver the figs, and whether she was relieved by the refusal of appellants to accept them. Besides, as we view it, the instruction was erroneous because it carried the implication that appellants might receive or accept the figs and then refuse to pay for them. In other words, the jury might justly infer from said instruction that appellants could deprive her of the damaged figs, and decline to pay anything for them. So believing, they would readily agree that the contract was unjust, and would not be disposed to hold her to an observance of its requirement as to said delivery. The truth is, however, that plaintiffs simply had the option to accept and pay for the damaged figs or to reject them. They could not keep the figs and the money. In fact, they could not act capriciously in rejecting the figs. The law would exact of them good faith and fair dealing in exercising their option as to the fruit which might not conform to the terms of the contract.

[4] Appellants ask the court "not only to reverse the judgment of the trial court, but to order the trial court to enter judgment for plaintiffs for the whole amount prayed for, together with all costs." We cannot direct such judgment in favor of appellants. We might do so if there were no legal defense presented by the answer; in other words, if plaintiffs were entitled to judgment upon the pleadings, but such is not the case, as we view it.

We think the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

52 Cal. App. 519

STEPHAN v. LAGERQVEST et al.
(Civ. 3315.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 5, 1921.)

1. Evidence ⊂=442(1)—Parol evidence admissible to show instructions upon which securities were delivered where receipt merely stated they were received in escrow.

Writings evidencing a sale of a restaurant on terms therein specified, and a receipt signed by the seller's agent for six war savings certificates received from the buyer, "to be held by us in escrow * * * for 10 days," did not show the complete agreement between the parties where they failed to show the terms under which the certificates were to be held, and evidence dehors the writings showing the instructions under which the seller's agent took the certificates might be looked to, especially as receipts are not conclusive, and may be explained or even varied by other proof.

2. Evidence ⊂=442(1)—Whether writings are complete is question of law, and when not complete other evidence admissible.

Whether writings which passed between parties contained the complete contract made by them is a question of law to be determined from the face of the instruments, and when an inspection of them shows that they are incomplete other evidence may be received for the purpose of supplying the missing matter.

3. Pledges ⊂=4—Delivery of war savings certificates as security held "pledge," and not "escrow."

Where a contract for the sale of a restaurant provided for a cash payment and a further payment of $500 within 10 days, the delivery of war savings certificates to the seller's agent as security for the making of the first deferred payment amounted to a "pledge," under Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2986, and 2987, and not a delivery in "escrow," though the receipt given for the certificates stated that they were to be held in escrow, as the character of a document or transaction does not depend upon misnomer, but must be determined from the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Escrow; Pledge.]

4. Pledges ⊂=26—Pledgee's right to possession of securities not affected by agent's delivery to another in violation of duty.

Where, to secure defendant's obligations to plaintiff under a contract of sale, defendant delivered war savings certificates to plaintiff's agent, but the agent, to avoid liability in defendant's suit for rescission, delivered the certificates to a bank, which, however, made no superior claim thereto, and held them as the agent held them, the question of plaintiff's right to recover possession of the certificates was not affected by this violation of duty by the agent.

5. Pledges ⊂=11—Pledgee's agent may act as pledge holder.

Under Civ. Code, § 2993, providing that a pledgor and pledgee may deposit the property pledged with a third person, called the pledge holder, a pledgee's agent may be the pledge holder for the taking and retention of the securities pledged.

6. Pledges ⊂=26—Pledgee not entitled to possession as against third person acting as pledge holder.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 2986–3011, defining the rights of a pledgee on default of the pledgor on the secured obligation, where pledged securities were delivered to the pledgee's agent as pledge holder, and there had been no demand upon or refusal by the agent to enforce the pledgee's rights, the pledgee was not entitled to recover possession of the pledged securities from a bank with which the pledge holder had deposited them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth J. Stephan against P. Lagerqvest and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hocker & Austin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert G. Payne, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action for the recovery of the possession of certain war savings certificates issued by the United States government. The defendants had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals.

The facts of the case are of a complex character. Appellant was the owner of a restaurant, and, acting through one E. W. Elder, her agent, sold the place to respondent Lagerqvest. Elder conducted his negotiations in the name of Business Investment Company. The sale was evidenced by three certain writings. One of these, in the form of a letter addressed to Business Investment Company and signed by both parties to the sale, was, in part, as follows:

"I hand you herewith check for $250 as part payment on purchase price of restaurant. * * * Full purchase price to be $3,000, balance as follows: $500 on or before ten days from date, and balance of $2,250 to be paid in monthly installments of $200, and interest, purchase lease or chattel mortgage back on restaurant. * * * Possession to be given upon payment of the $500 above mentioned, to be paid on or before ten days."

Another of the instruments was in the form of a receipt, signed by Business Investment Company and Elder, and was in these words:

"Received of P. Lagerqvest $250 as part payment on purchase price of restaurant, * * * full purchase price to be $3,000, balance as follows: $500 on or before ten days from date, and balance of $2,250 to be paid in installments of $200 per mo., and interest. Secured by chattel mortgage or purchase lease back on restaurant and equipment."

This was the form of the third paper, signed by Business Investment Company, per Elder:

"Received of P. Lagerqvest six war saving certificates to be held by us in escrow for Mr. Lagerqvest for ten days."

It is upon a determination of the meaning and effect of this writing that the outcome of the appeal principally depends.

Some time after the passing of these three writings, respondent Lagerqvest wrote a letter to Elder and to one Vandewater, whose interest in the transaction does not clearly appear, a fact, however, which is not material. The letter follows, in part:

"I agree not to sue you or make you a party to any action, in connection with, or growing out of the sale of the Lafayette Cafe, * * * if you will deposit the one hundred and twenty (120) war saving stamps delivered you by [me?] as collateral security, in said transaction and which is now held by you as such collateral security, in the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank. * * * That said deposit shall state and be accepted by said bank to be held in trust as such collateral security, until the said dispute between the said P. Lagerqvest and Elizabeth J. Stephan is arrived at by written agreement, or determined by a judicial decision of the Courts, and not otherwise. * * * That nothing in this agreement shall be taken to affect the rights of the said P. Lagerqvest, as to the ownership of said stamps or their rights of possession thereof."

Thereafter, a letter was written to the bank, over the signature of Business Investment Company and Elder, containing the following:

"We hand you herewith one hundred twenty United States war saving certificates, of $5.00 denomination, * * * which you are instructed to hold subject to our order, and pending the outcome of that certain action * * * entitled 'P. Lagerqvest v. Elizabeth J. Stevens, No. B67504,' at which time you will receive further orders from us."

In the meanwhile respondent Lagerqvest had served upon appellant a notice of rescission of the contract for the sale of the restaurant. The notice stated certain alleged misrepresentations as a basis for rescission, and contained the following:

"I * * * demand that you pay me back the said $250.00 I paid you * * * and also demand that you deliver to me the six war savings certificates, face value of $500.00. * * * Said above named certificates are known as United States of America war savings certificates."

Thereafter respondent commenced his action for a rescission, it being numbered B 67504, as stated in a letter above set forth. The complaint contained a copy of the notice of rescission, and alleged, after setting up the terms of the contract for the sale of the restaurant:

"That in order to secure the fulfillment of the first payment to be made, to wit: $500 the plaintiff herein deposited with defendants 120 United States of America war savings certificates, * * * and the same is now being holden by said defendants."

The pleading also contained an allegation that defendants had failed, neglected, and refused to return the $250, and "to deliver to the said plaintiff the said 120 United States of America war savings certificates." The prayer demanded, in part, that the defendants be "directed and commanded to deliver to the said plaintiff the aforesaid 120 United States of America war savings certificates now held by them by reason of said contract." The answer, in effect, admitted the allegations of the complaint which we have quoted.

In due time the action for rescission came on for trial, and the plaintiff there, respondent Lagerqvest here, was nonsuited. Appellant thereafter commenced the present action, and at the trial, which resulted in the judgment from which this appeal is prosecuted, there were introduced in evidence all the writings from which quotation is above made, including the complaint in the rescission action. At the trial, also, Elder testified that he was to hold the war savings stamps for respondent Lagerqvest "pending the 10 days necessary to send them to Washington and get the money out of them," however impossible the testimony may appear to be.

[1-3] It is at once obvious that the three writings evidencing the sale of the restaurant do not show the complete agreement between the parties. The paper given in the form of a receipt, to the effect that the war savings certificates were delivered by respondent Lagerqvest to the agent to be held "in escrow" for Lagerqvest, is manifestly incomplete. It fails to show the terms under which the certificates were to be held. What were the instructions under which the agent for appellant took the certificates from the opposite party to the sale? This question must be answered from evidence dehors the three writings, and that such evidence may be looked to is certain. Whether writings which pass between parties contain the complete contract they have made is a question of law and is to be determined from the face of the instruments (Gardiner v. McDonogh, 147 Cal. 314, 81 Pac. 964); and when an inspection of them shows that they are incomplete other evidence may be received for the purpose of supplying the missing matter (Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 518, 32 Pac. 571; Daly v. Ruddell, 137 Cal. 671, 70 Pac. 784; Blahnik v. Small Farms Imp. Co., 181 Cal. 379, 184 Pac. 661). Also, the paper concerning the savings certificates, being in the form of a receipt, was peculiarly open to explanation by extrinsic evidence, for writings of that type are not conclusive, and may be explained, or even varied, by other proof. Snodgrass v. Parks, 79 Cal. 55, 21 Pac. 429; San Pedro Lumber Co. v. Schroeter, 156 Cal. 158, 103 Pac. 888; Channel Commercial Co. v. Hourihan, 20 Cal. App. 647, 129 Pac. 947. Applying these rules, and taking into account all the evidence in the record on the subject without again reciting it, it appears to have been established without contradiction or dispute that the savings certificates were taken by Elder as security for the payment of the $500, the first deferred payment mentioned in the writings. The delivery of the obligations to him clearly amounted to a pledge (Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2986, 2987), and the fact that the receipt termed the delivery a delivery in escrow did not make the certificates an escrow, for the character of a document or of a transaction cannot be made to depend upon misnomer, but it must be determined from facts (McDougald v. Hulet, 132 Cal. 154, 64 Pac. 278; Bledsoe v. Stuckey, 190 Pac. 217).

[4] The true nature of the transaction concerning the savings certificates thus being made manifest, the only remaining question is whether appellant was entitled to judgment for their possession. The fact that Elder, in order to avoid liability in the suit for rescission, shamefully violated his duty as the agent of appellant, or as a pledge holder owing an equal fidelity to appellant and to respondent Lagerqvest, does not affect the question. Respondent bank urges no superior claim to the certificates, and, making no such contention, it holds the obligations as Elder held them. Indeed, the letter from respondent Lagerqvest to Elder, by which the delivery of the certificates to the bank was requested, seems to have contemplated that the status of the certificates should not be changed by the delivery. The sole remaining question is, then, did Elder, holding the certificates as security, so hold them as the agent of appellant, to whose call he must have responded; or did he retain them as a pledge holder, subject to the rights which appellant might enforce against him in that capacity under the law of pledge?

[5] "A pledgor and pledgee may agree upon a third person with whom to deposit the property pledged, who, if he accepts the deposit, is called a pledgeholder" (Civ. Code, § 2993); and there is no reason why Elder, agent of appellant though he was in the sale of the restaurant, may not have been made a pledge holder for the taking and retention of the war savings certificates. In fact, the authorities are unanimous to the effect that even an agent or servant of the pledgor may, by agreement between the parties, be made a pledge holder (21 R. C. L., p. 648, par. 13; note to In re Succession of Lanaux, 25 L. R. A. 577; note to First Nat. Bank v. Bradshaw, 39 L. R. A. [N. S.] 892); and, under special circumstances, the pledgor himself may be allowed to retain possession of the pledged property without affecting the validity of the pledge (21 R. C. L., p. 648, par 13; note to First Nat. Bank v. Bradshaw, 39 L. R. A. [N. S.] 892). The very essence of the principle of pledge, without citation of authority upon the subject—and upon a somewhat cursory examination there seems to be none—lends itself to the idea that the agent of the pledgee may be the holder of the pledge.

[6] The rights of a pledgee, on the default of the pledgor upon the obligation secured by the pledge, are defined by the Civil Code (§§ 2986-3011), and there is nothing in the sections covering the subject which confers upon the pledgee the right to insist, as against the pledge holder, upon the possession of the property pledged. In truth, the statute seems to contemplate that the possession shall remain in the pledge holder pending the exercise by the pledgee of the right to subject the pledge to the liquidation or discharge of the main obligation, for "a pledge holder must enforce all the rights of the pledgee, unless authorized by him to waive them" (§ 2996); "* * * a pledge holder for reward, assumes the duties and liabilities of a depositary for reward" (§ 2997); and "a gratuitous pledge holder assumes the duties and liabilities of a gratuitous depositary" (§ 2998). Whether the rights of appellant might be different if it were shown that demand had been made upon Elder, or upon respondent bank, to enforce the rights of appellant (§ 2996), and the demand has been refused, we, of course, need not consider. It is apparent that appellant has mistaken her remedy, and that she was not entitled to judgment for the possession of the pledged property. Because of the conclusion we have reached on that question, it is not necessary to consider other points made by the appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

ITALIAN-AMERICAN BANK v. CANEPA et al. (Civ. 3753.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. May 13, 1921.)

1. Husband and wife ⊜267(4) — Husband's deed of trust to community property for valuable consideration good against him.

Even under Civ. Code, § 172, giving the husband the management and control of community property, but providing that he cannot convey it without a valuable consideration, unless the wife consents in writing, a deed of trust, executed by the husband without a valuable consideration, is good as against him; the wife only having a right to complain.

2. Ejectment ⊜135—Evidence held to support finding of rental value.

In an action of ejectment, evidence held sufficient to support the finding of the court as to the rental value of the property.

3. Ejectment ⊜132—Defendant liable for rental value, though property difficult to rent.

On depriving the owner of real estate of its use and value is liable for its rental value when sued in ejectment, though the owner might have had difficulty in renting it to some one else.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Italian-American Bank against Luigi Canepa and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

M. H. Hernan, of San Francisco, for appellants.

D. Freidenrich and H. C. Reyman, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him in an action in ejectment. The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and filed a cross-complaint setting up title to the property in himself.

From the findings, it appears that on February 9, 1917, the defendant executed and delivered to A. Sbarboro and A. E. Sbarboro, as trustees for Italian-American Bank, a deed of trust of the property involved here, to secure the payment of $5,000 loaned to defendant by the bank, for which amount he executed his promissory note. It was provided in said deed of trust that, if default should be made in the payment of the note when due, that the trustees, on demand of the bank, should sell the property at public auction. Default was made in the payment of the note; the property was sold in accordance with the terms of the deed of trust. The bank purchased the property at the sale, and received a deed from the trustees therefor. At the time of the execution of the deed of trust, the defendant was a married man, and the property was community property.

It is argued by appellant that the defendant could not pass title to the property by the deed of trust, because the property was community property, and the consent of the wife was not secured. Section 172, Civil Code, is the one applicable to the case, as the property was conveyed by defendant before section 172a became operative. Section 172, Civil Code, provides that the husband has the management and control of the community property, with the absolute power of disposition, other than testamentary, as he has of his separate estate; provided, however, that he cannot make a gift of such property, or convey the same without a valuable consideration, unless the wife consent in writing thereto.

[1] Appellants urge that the proof is not sufficient to show that the defendant received a valuable consideration for the execution of this deed of trust. The deed of trust was in evidence, and recites a consideration of $5,000, evidenced by a promissory note. The defendant admitted the execution of the deed of trust, and did not contradict its recital as to consideration. Apart from this fact, even if the conveyance had been made without consideration, the transfer is good as against the husband, even under the provisions of section 172, Civil Code. The only person, in any case, who has a right to complain is the wife. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170; Dargie v. Patterson, 176 Cal. 714, 169 Pac. 360. The wife is not a party to this action and, according to the testimony, she died before its commencement.

[2, 3] The appellant contends also that the finding of the court that the rental value of the property was $70 a month is not sustained by the evidence. There is no merit in this contention. The only evidence on this subject was that of two real estate agents, produced by plaintiff, who testified that they were familiar with the property involved in the action, and were familiar with rental values in that district; that the property consisted of two stores and two flats, and had a rental value of from $70 to $75 a month. The defendant himself testified that one store and flat were rented by him at $35 a month; that he lived in the other flat, and considered its rental value $10 a month, and that he had placed some of his property in the remaining store; that when that store, so occupied by him, was rented, it had been rented for $25 a month. It is true he testified that it was difficult to rent the store he was occupying, because there was not a great demand for stores in the neighborhood; but that fact is immaterial. If he deprived the plaintiff of the use and value of its property, he is liable for its rental value, and cannot argue that the plaintiff might have had difficulty in renting the store to some one else. The court found that the rental value of the property was $70 a month, which is in accordance with all of the testimony on the subject, including the testimony of the defendant himself.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WILLIAMS. (Cr. 955.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 12, 1921.)

1. Rape ⟸52(2)—Description of act held sufficient.

On a trial for rape on a girl under 16, testimony describing the act of sexual intercourse with sufficient definiteness to leave no doubt in the minds of the jury was sufficient.

2. Criminal law ⟸785(8)—Witnesses ⟸340(3)—Instruction that delinquency of prosecutrix cannot be considered as affecting credibility held proper.

On a trial for rape of a girl under 16, an instruction that her moral delinquency is not to be considered as affecting her credibility was proper.

3. Rape ⟸59(1)—Instruction held not to preclude consideration of question of malice in making charge.

Where defendant, charged with the rape of a girl under 16, claimed that he had caused her arrest when found in bed with another man, and that the charge against him was due to animosity, and the court specifically charged that, in passing on the credibility of witnesses, it was the duty of the jury to consider any motive which might impel a witness to testify, etc., a further instruction that the girl's moral delinquency was not to be considered as affecting her credibility did not preclude the jury from considering whether she was actuated by malice in making the charge.

4. Criminal law ⟸1171(1)—Argument that acquittal would send prosecutrix into street held not to require reversal.

On a trial for rape of a girl under 16, where the district attorney called the jury's attention to the fact that her misconduct with another man occurred after the crime of which defendant was accused, and argued that her conduct in her future relations with men was influenced by her early experience with defendant, his remark that an acquittal would send "that little girl practically upon the street" did not require a reversal, where the jury was bound to convict if they believed the girl's testimony, and could not have reached their verdict unless they believed such testimony.

5. Criminal law ⟸1171(1)—Remark in argument concerning irrelevant matter held not ground for reversal.

On a trial for rape of a girl under 16, the remark of the district attorney in his argument concerning a matter of routine of army life held not ground for reversal under the evidence.

6. Criminal law ⟸1055, 1129(1)—Remarks of counsel, not assigned as error, need not be reviewed.

Remarks of the district attorney are not reversible error, where no assignment of error is made thereto, and no request is made for an instruction to disregard the remarks.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Allan E. Williams was convicted of an offense, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Austin Lewis and William F. Cleary, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. Defendant was convicted of a violation of subdivision 1 of section 261, Penal Code. The prosecuting witness was a girl of the age of about 14 years at the time of the commission of the offense. The defendant was her stepfather.

[1] Appellant objects that the evidence is insufficient, because the language used by the prosecuting witness in giving her testimony is not sufficiently definite and specific in describing the act of sexual intercourse. In cases of this character it is rare, indeed, that children use scientific or precise anatomical terms. The argument made by appellant is that the prosecuting witness is not an ordinary child, but that her experience in sexual matters at the time of the trial, as disclosed by the record, made it possible for her to have described the occurrence with absolute exactness. Her experiences, as disclosed by the record, would have no effect upon the precision of her language. It is unnecessary to set forth her testimony here. It is sufficient to say that it is unambiguous and much more definite than usual in cases of this character. It assuredly left no doubt in the minds of the jury.

[2, 3] Appellant objects to an instruction given by the trial court:

"You are further instructed that the moral delinquency of the girl complainant is not to be considered as affecting her credibility."

This instruction states the law. People v. Wilmot, 139 Cal. 103, 72 Pac. 838; People v. Cruse, 24 Cal. App. 497, 502, 141 Pac. 936; People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 Pac. 622. But appellant points out that the testimony in this case shows that some time after the commission of the act charged against the defendant, but before the arrest of the defendant, the prosecuting witness had been found in bed with a young man at the home of her mother and the defendant; that the defendant, upon so discovering her, had called the police and had the mother, the girl, and the young man taken to the city jail. Appellant argues that this action of defendant caused a hatred of him by the girl, and that this animosity later caused her to make this accusation against him. It is contended that the instruction complained of prevented the jury from taking into consideration any animosity engendered in the prosecuting witness by this experience. The instruction complained of does not preclude the jury from considering whether or not the prosecuting witness was actuated by malice in making the charge against the defendant. The court specifically instructed the jury that in passing upon the credibility of the witnesses it was their duty—

"to consider any motive which may impel a witness to testify, to consider the interest which a witness may have in the result of this trial, and whether or not such witness may be moved in so testifying by any hopes or fears, by any friendship or animosity."

[4] Appellant assigns as error the remark of the district attorney in his closing argument to the jury, wherein he states that if a verdict of acquittal is given, the jury is "sending that little girl practically upon the street." The district attorney called the attention of the jury to the fact that, according to the testimony, the misconduct of the girl with one other than the defendant occurred after the crime of which the defendant is accused. It was argued that the conduct of the girl in her future relations with men was influenced by this early experience with the defendant. While it is, of course, true that the defendant is responsible only for his own offense, and not for the offenses of others, we do not consider this remark such as to warrant a reversal of this judgment, where there is such positive testimony in the record against the defendant. The jury could not have reached its verdict unless it believed the testimony of the girl. If it did believe that testimony, it was bound to convict the defendant, regardless of whether or not the girl's future life had been influenced by his act. The verdict of the jury puts the stamp of truth upon the testimony of the prosecuting witness, and that is all that is necessary for a conviction in a case like this. The extent of the consequences of the crime is immaterial here.

[5, 6] The same may be said of the objection of the appellant to the remark of the district attorney recalling to the jury a matter of routine with respect to the soldiers at the Presidio—that after roll call they were free. Also, as to this remark, there was no assignment of the same as misconduct, and no request of the court to instruct the jury to disregard it.

The judgment is affirmed.

BOLAN et al. v. GALLAGHER et al.

(Civ. 3515.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 4, 1921.)

1. Action ⟹45(1)—For partition of real and personal property not bad for misjoinder of causes.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 752, and section 752a, added by St. 1919, p. 73, under which real and personal property may be partitioned in the same action, a demurrer to a complaint for such partition on the ground of misjoinder of causes of action was properly overruled.

2. Pleading ⟹193(6)—Demurrer to complaint for partition of real and personal property on ground of misjoinder of causes of action insufficient, on allegation same not separately stated.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 5, permitting a demurrer on the ground that "several causes of action had been improperly united or not separately stated," and section 431, requiring that it distinctly specify the ground of objection, a demurrer to a complaint for the partition of real and personal property on the ground of "misjoinder of causes of action" was insufficient.

3. Appeal and error ⟹707(2)—Omission from judgment of promissory note described in complaint not prejudicial variance, in absence of record showing evidence on which based.

Though a promissory note, described in the complaint as being a part of property to be partitioned, was not included in the decree, there was no such inconsistency as amounted to prejudicial error; the record not showing the evidence on which the judgment was based.

4. Appeal and error ⟹931(1) — Presumption in favor of judgment.

The presumptions are in favor of the judgment, in the absence of an affirmative showing in the record that the decision is erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Lilly Bolan and others against William Davis Gallagher and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Nathan Newby, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

D. Z. Gardner, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants who are the appellants here demurred to the complaint of the plaintiffs and, their demurrer being overruled, no answer was filed and the judgment followed as a matter of course.

[1,2] It is claimed here that the court erred in overruling the demurrer. The action was brought to secure a decree for the partition of real and personal property. Sections 752 and 752a (added by St. 1919, p. 73) Code of Civil Procedure, provide for such relief and the latter section provides that "real and personal property may be partitioned in the same action." Appellants particularly insist that their demurrer should have been sustained because the alleged causes of action were not separately stated. It is true that the property sought to be partitioned, both real and personal, was described in the single cause of action alleged in the complaint. However, appellants' demurrer did not include the ground which is sought to be given effect here. Subdivision 5 of section 430, Code of Civil Procedure, which section enumerates the various grounds for demurrer, provides that objection may be taken:

"5. That several causes of action have been improperly united, or not separately stated."

Ground 2, as stated in appellants' demurrer is:

"That there is a misjoinder of causes of action, to wit: A cause of action for the partition of real property and a cause of action for the partition of personal property."

Section 431, Code of Civil Procedure, declares, in part, as follows:

"The demurrer must distinctly specify the grounds upon which any of the objections to the complaint are taken. Unless it does so, it may be disregarded. * * *"

[3] The demurrer as presented to the court was properly overruled. We find no merit in the contention that, because a certain promissory note described in the complaint as being a part of the property to be partitioned was not included within the terms of the decree, there is an inconsistency between the allegations of the complaint and the judgment, which amounts to a prejudical error entitling the appellants to complain. The record on appeal does not show what evidence was heard which furnished to the court the data upon which to base the judgment. It may well have been, as respondent states, that such evidence showed that the promissory note referred to had been sold prior to the making of the decree, in which case it was properly excluded from the terms of the latter.

[4] The presumptions are in favor of the judgment in the absence of an affirmative showing in the record that the decision is erroneous.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BARRIOS. (Cr. 555.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 6, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1172(8)—Charging larceny in burglary information not prejudicial, where jury convicted of burglary.

The fact that an information for burglary contained a charge of larceny did not prejudice accused, so as to entitle him to reversal of the conviction, where the jury expressly found him guilty of burglary, though it might have rendered the offense uncertain if the verdict had been merely guilty as charged.

2. Burglary ⟸41(5)—Evidence held sufficient to show entry was in nighttime.

Evidence that a store was locked at 6 o'clock in the evening, which was a few minutes before sunset, and was thereafter entered before the next morning, is sufficient to show an entry in the nighttime, though it does not demonstrate that the entry was not made before sunset.

3. Criminal law ⟸517(4)—Evidence introduced before defendant's confession held to establish corpus delicti.

Evidence introduced before defendant's confession, which showed that a store was broken and entered after 6 in the evening and before next morning, and that, when he was arrested before daybreak next morning, defendant was wearing a coat taken from the store, and other stolen property was found in a room designated by him, is sufficient to establish the corpus delicti and render his confession admissible.

4. Criminal law ⟸519(5)—Confession, when testifying on behalf of codefendant, held voluntary.

Where defendant appeared as a witness on behalf of those jointly charged with the offense, and was examined by the attorney for the codefendants, who was also his attorney at that time and at his subsequent trial, his testimony was voluntary and might be used against him at his trial as a confession.

5. Witnesses ⟸255(2)—Official reporter can refresh memory from shorthand notes.

The official court reporter in testifying to the testimony given by defendant at another trial can refresh his memory by referring to his shorthand notes.

6. Burglary ⟸47—Form of verdict convicting of second degree held properly refused.

Where the information charged that the burglary was committed in the nighttime, so that a verdict of burglary in the second degree would have been void, it was not error to refuse to give the jury a form of verdict of burglary in the second degree.

7. Criminal law ⊂=854(1) — Women jurors need not be separated from men during deliberations.

Pen. Code, § 1135, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1033, requiring a separate room for the female members of the jury from that provided for the male members, must be read in connection with the amendment of Pen. Code, § 1128 (St. 1919, p. 304), made at the same session, providing for separate rooms for men and women jurors when it becomes necessary for them to retire for the night, and does not change the law that the jurors must be kept together during their deliberations.

8. Criminal law ⊂=730(16)—Answer by prosecuting attorney to attacks on himself held not prejudicial, in view of charge.

Where defendant's counsel had argued that the statement of the prosecuting attorney to defendant, before he testified on behalf of codefendants, that he would send defendant to the penitentiary for perjury, made defendant's confession at the former trial involuntary, the prosecuting attorney's statement that the evidence showed his statement to defendant referred merely to the portion of defendant's testimony exonerating his codefendants, and that he then believed and still believed that such portion of the testimony was false, was not prejudicial to defendant's rights, where the court on defendant's request instructed the jury to disregard all statements made by counsel on either side which were not related to the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Arthur Barrios was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and he appeals from the judgment, and from the orders denying his motions in arrest of judgment and for new trial. Affirmed.

Terry W. Ward, of Merced, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant and M. Jiminez, Ignacio Blanco, and Jacinto Tappio were jointly charged with the burglary "in the nighttime" of the merchandise store of L. A. Reid at Atwater, in Merced county. The information charges, in appropriate language, that the alleged entry by the defendants was made with intent to commit grand larceny, and then, in the same count, it is averred that the defendants "did then and there take, steal, and carry away from said store goods, wares, and merchandise belonging to said L. A. Reid of the value of $1,100." Jiminez entered a plea of guilty. The defendant and Blanco and Tappio demurred to the information on the ground, among others, that it charges more than one offense in a single count. The demurrer was overruled. Blanco and Tappio were tried jointly and acquitted. Thereafter the defendant Barrios was tried and convicted of "burglary in the first degree." The defendant duly moved in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, both of which motions were denied. On his appeal the defendant assigns many alleged errors.

[1] 1. The information charged larceny in the same count with the charge of burglary. No confusion of issues at the trial resulted from the double charge. The defendant was tried on the charge of burglary. The jury returned a verdict of "guilty of burglary in the first degree." Had the jury found the defendant guilty "as charged," without designating the crime, the duplicity complained of would present a more serious question. Under a charge of burglary with intent to commit larceny, it is always permissible to show a consummated larceny in proof of such intent. Therefore the averment of larceny could in no wise prejudice the rights of the defendant, because proof of such larceny would properly have been made in the absence of such allegation. Judgments are not to be set aside for mere technical errors not resulting in a miscarriage of justice.

[2, 3] 2. Independent of the defendant's confession, the evidence shows the following facts: The building entered was closed and the doors locked at 6 o'clock on the evening of September 10; at 7:30 the next morning the screen of a window, intact the evening before, was found cut and the window open, the rear door open, and large quantities of merchandise, in place at the time the store was closed as stated, were missing; the defendant was arrested in the city of Fresno at 3 o'clock in the morning of September 11, and then had on his person a mackinaw which had been taken from the building, and he remained silent when asked where he obtained the mackinaw; at the time of his arrest the defendant was in the company of Jiminez, who also had on one of the stolen mackinaws; the defendant and Jiminez told the arresting officer that they were going to a certain room to sleep, and about half an hour later the officer found three more of the stolen mackinaws in the room designated; the greater part of the stolen goods were found in a ditch eight miles north of Fresno. This evidence abundantly shows that a burglary was committed and tends strongly to connect the defendant with the crime. It does not demonstrate that the entry was not made during the few minutes between 6 o'clock in the evening and sunset of September 10. Demonstration, however, is not required. Proof of the time of entry in this case is more certain than that in the case of People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 579, 119 Pac. 920, where it is stated that the claim of insufficiency of the evidence to show entry in the nighttime was without foundation. The foregoing testimony was all produced before the admission of the defendant's alleged confession, and hence disposes of the contention that it was error to admit the confession before proof of the corpus delicti.

3. Counsel for defendant in this case conducted the defense of Blanco and Tappio on their trial on the same charge. During the progress of that trial, on the order of the court, and at the request of counsel for Blanco and Tappio, the defendant Barrios was brought into court from the county jail, where he was confined, for the purpose of testifying. The defendant Barrios thereupon, in response to questions propounded by his present counsel, testified in detail to the commission of the burglary and his own part in it. The testimony so given was taken down in shorthand by the official reporter, who at the trial of Barrios, and over the objection of his counsel, was permitted to relate such testimony to the jury. It is objected that this was in effect compelling the defendant to be a witness against himself, and that, treating the testimony as a confession of guilt, it was not shown to have been voluntary. If the testimony was voluntarily given, it was a waiver of the constitutional privilege, so that the two objections are in effect the same.

As stated, at the trial of his codefendants, Barrios was called and examined by his then and present attorney. During his examination the following occurred:

"Mr. Ward: Q. Since you have been in the county jail, have you had any inducements or threats made to you, if you gave testimony in this case? A. No, sir. Q. Nobody told you you would get probation if you testified? A. No, sir; I was told by the district attorney here Tuesday morning, the 12th, he called me up to the office, and he told me if I was going to testify here in court. I told him I was; then I told him what I was going to testify to. I told him I was going to testify to the truth and he told me, What was that? Then I began telling him what was the truth; he told me, if I would say that, he was going to have me charged with perjury and send me up on two different counts, one to fourteen for burglary and one to fourteen for perjury. Q. He told you, if you testified that Blanco and Tappio were not with you, that he would have you prosecuted for perjury; is that it? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did you say to him about that? A. I told him I did not care; I was going to tell the truth, if they sent me up for life; I did not care."

He was cross-examined as follows:

"Q. (by Mr. Landram). I believe, Mr. Barrios, as you have testified in response to Mr. Ward, that no promises have been made to you by me, in order to get you to testify in this case, promises of reward or anything of that kind? A. No, sir; I have not been promised any reward. The sheriff had me out there one day, and he said to me; of course, he asked me what I was going to do; of course, it seems like he wanted me to say that Tappio and Blanco were with us when we committed this burglary. I told him they were not; so he told me, why was I protecting them and be sent to the penitentiary? that I had not good health, me and Jiminez were in poor health and why I would want to go to the penitentiary, just in order to protect somebody else."

[4] The testimony seems to have been given voluntarily and with the knowledge that it would probably result in his own conviction and sentence to the penitentiary. Since his testimony was given in response to questions by his own attorney, it must be assumed that he had been fully advised as to his constitutional privilege.

[5] 4. There was no error in permitting the official reporter to refresh his memory from his shorthand notes. People v. Sexton, 132 Cal. 39, 64 Pac. 107.

[6] 5. The failure of the court to give the jury a form of verdict of burglary of the second degree was not error. The information charged the commission of the burglary in the nighttime and, hence, a verdict of burglary of the second degree would have been void. People v. Smith, 136 Cal. 207, 68 Pac. 702.

[7] 6. Failure to provide separate rooms for the male and female jurors, if there was such failure, cannot be held to have prejudiced the rights of the defendant, in the absence of a showing to that effect. The law requires that the jurors be kept together during their deliberations. People v. Adams, 143 Cal. 208, 76 Pac. 954, 66 L. R. A. 247, 101 Am. St. Rep. 92. Since the Adams Case was decided, section 1135 of the Penal Code has been amended (St. 1919, p. 1033), by adding the provision that the "board of supervisors shall provide a room for the female members of the jury which shall be separate and apart from the room provided for the male members." This amendment, however, must be read in connection with the amendment made at the same session of the Legislature (St. 1919, p. 304) to section 1128 of the Penal Code which provides:

"That when the jury is composed of both men and women, in the event that it shall become necessary to retire for the night, the women must be kept in a room or rooms separate and apart from the men."

There is no conflict between these amendments, and, read together, they are in harmony with what has always been the law, that jurors must be kept together during their deliberations. The record further shows that separate rooms were provided for the men and women on the jury in the event of their retirement for the night.

[8] 7. Exception is taken to the statements made by the district attorney in his closing argument to the jury. The record discloses the following:

"Mr. Landram: I want to mention briefly a few of the circumstances of the case, and before I go further I want to make some reference to a statement by Mr. Ward, with reference to a conversation had by myself and Mr. Barrios in the county jail; Mr. Ward's statement was, that I said to Mr. Barrios, 'If you tell the truth, I will send you up for perjury.' You remember, though, in the reading of that testimony Mr. Ward himself by his question limited the matter with reference to the perjury to the statement made 'If you testify that Tappio and Blanco were not there, he would send you up for perjury.' And that, ladies and gentlemen, is a fact; Tappio and Blanco, I believe the evidence in that case showed conclusively, were there, and I believe, when this defendant testified in that case they were not there, he was deliberately perjuring himself—

"Mr. Ward (interrupting): I assign that statement as misconduct and ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard the statement.

"The Court: The jury have already been instructed; they are not bound by any statement made by counsel on either side. Of course, this is a mere conclusion of the district attorney. If he attempts to state anything outside of the record, it is merely a conclusion and it is not binding. The jury are to make their own conclusions, received from the evidence, and they are not bound by any conclusions of any one else.

"Mr. Landram (continuing): I am not trying to enforce my opinion in that regard upon any of you jurors. This is a matter for you; thinking as I do it would have been my duty, if that jury convicted these men, to have charged this man with perjury—

"Mr. Ward (interrupting): I assign that as misconduct, and ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard it.

"The Court: Well, the jury will disregard all statements, made by counsel on either side, that have nothing to do with this case."

The district attorney seems to have made such statements in defending himself against charges by counsel for the defendant, who had said that the district attorney had told the defendant that—

"If he testified upon the trial of that case, he would send him up for 14 years for burglary and 14 years for perjury; now, in what sense was the testimony of the witness voluntary, or made without any threats or intimidation?"

The district attorney was apparently trying to show that counsel's charge was not supported by the evidence. The question whether the defendant's testimony had been voluntarily given was a legitimate subject of argument before the jury. In view of the evident purpose of the district attorney, which the jurors must have understood, and the admonition of the court, it does not appear that the defendant's rights were prejudiced by the statements.

The other assignments of error are incidental to those discussed, and are sufficiently disposed of without further consideration.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

52 Cal. App. 644

SEXSON v. SEXSON. (Civ. 3606, 3607.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1. California. May 17, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1011(1)—Findings final when evidence presented conflict.

In a wife's action to establish her ownership of real estate conveyed to her husband on the theory that it was conveyed to give him a credit, and on his agreement to reconvey it after such purpose had been served, where the husband's testimony that the deeds were given for a valuable consideration merely presented a conflict with the wife's evidence, which was sufficient to support the findings, the conclusions of the trial judge on the facts must be treated as final.

2. Limitation of actions ⊂⊃66(7), 103(2) — Does not run against right to reconveyance until demand made or trust repudiated.

Where a wife conveyed land owned by her to her husband to give him a credit, on his agreement to reconvey after any credit so obtained had been satisfied, she parted only with the naked legal title, and the husband received it as trustee, subject to the wife's right to a reconveyance, and limitations did not commence to run against such right until a demand was made on the husband that he reconvey, or until his repudiation of the trust.

3. Trusts ⊂⊃365(2)—Defense of laches without merit when trustee not prejudiced by delay in suing to establish title.

In a wife's suits to establish her ownership of real property conveyed by her to her husband to give him a credit, on his agreement to reconvey after any credit so obtained had been satisfied, the defense of laches was without merit where no circumstances appeared showing that the husband was prejudiced by the mere lapse of time occurring between the time of the conveyance and the dates of the commencement of the actions.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Two actions by Elizabeth M. Nagle Sexson against Oliver V. Sexson were tried together. Judgment for plaintiff in each action, and defendant brings separate appeals. Affirmed.

Adam Thompson and Renwick Thompson, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Titus & Macomber, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Two actions were brought in the superior court by the above-named plaintiff against the above-named defendant, in each of which judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Separate appeals were taken by the defendant from the judgments. The cases were tried together in the superior court, and by stipulation the appeals are presented in the same way.

The actions of the plaintiff were brought for the purpose of having it determined that she was owner of certain real property situated in the city of San Diego. The general allegations of the two complaints were similar, except that the property involved was of different descriptions. For the sake of brevity we will designate the property described in action 3606 as the Horton's Addition lot, and that described in action 3607 as the Hillcrest lot. The plaintiff first alleged that she was, and for a long time prior to the occurrence of the matters stated in her complaint had been, the wife of the defendant; that she was the owner of both of the lots mentioned in her sole and separate right; that in November, 1913, she deeded to the defendant an undivided one-third interest in the Horton's Addition lot, and in April, 1918, transferred the legal title to the Hillcrest lot to the defendant. She alleged that these transfers were made without consideration of any kind, and were made—"for the purpose of establishing an immediate and temporary credit for said defendant, and under the agreement and promise of the defendant to use said property for such purpose, and no other, and with the specific understanding and agreement between plaintiff and defendant that defendant would deed said property to plaintiff upon her request after any credit obtained by the defendant by virtue of holding said property had been satisfied."

Demand was alleged to have been made upon the defendant on or about the 1st day of November, 1919, that he deed the property back to the plaintiff, and that such demand had not been complied with. In a second cause of action alleged in each of the complaints it was set out that the deeds of the plaintiff to both parcels of realty had been obtained by fraud and undue influence; that defendant had great influence over the plaintiff on account of the relationship existing between the two, and that the plaintiff had great confidence in the defendant, and great reliance upon statements made by him; and by reason thereof, upon his representing and agreeing that he would deed back the property to her at her request, she made the transfers hereinbefore referred to. She alleged further that defendant, at the time of the making of said representations, did not intend to deed the property back to her in accordance with his agreement, but intended to defraud plaintiff out of her real property. Allegation was also made that plaintiff did not discover the "said fraud of said defendant until she demanded that defendant deed said property to her, to wit, on or about the 1st day of November, 1919."

[1] The parties to the actions were married in 1909. The defendant was then employed as driver for a transfer company, and earned an amount which, according to his testimony, varied from $125 to $140 per month. He continued steadily at this employment up to about April, 1916, when he ceased to work for a period of about one year, and then secured employment in the sheriff's office in San Diego county, in which position he was employed at the time of the trial of the action. In the fall of 1919 he ceased to live with plaintiff, and in 1920 the two actions here concerned were brought, one on February 27th and one on April 7th.

It is shown by the evidence that at the time of her marriage plaintiff owned the Horton's Addition lot, which was a lot about 50 by 100 feet in dimensions, located in the downtown district of the city of San Diego. According to some testimony offered at the trial, this lot in 1913 was worth, exclusive of improvements, about $25,000. In 1910 it was decided by the plaintiff and defendant that a garage building should be erected on this lot. Plaintiff did not possess the necessary funds to pay the construction cost. The defendant owned in his separate right a lot in another part of the city and besides had in cash about $1,000. (His wife testified the amount was $600.) He arranged to deed to the contractor who was to construct the garage building the lot owned by him at an agreed valuation of $2,100, and added to that the amount of money which he had. Mrs. Sexson had several hundred dollars in cash, and enough more money was borrowed to make up the contract price of the garage building, which was $7,500. Upon its completion the building was immediately rented, and continued thereafter to be steadily occupied by a tenant. The rents were collected by the defendant and placed in an account at the bank, which was first kept in the name of the defendant only, but later was in the joint names of the plaintiff and defendant. Out of this money the several indebtednesses incurred on account of the construction of the garage were satisfied in installment payments, except that it was the contention of the defendant that he never was reimbursed out of that money for his contribution toward the building of the garage, which contribution, taking the admission of the plaintiff as to the amount, was the sum of $2,700.

The earnings of the defendant in his employment were used to satisfy the living expenses of the family. From the time the garage was built in 1910, up to November, 1913, defendant had not received from the plaintiff any written evidence showing the amount of money from his separate estate that he had contributed toward the building of the garage. It was on November 20, 1913, that the wife deeded to defendant an undivided one-third interest in the garage property. The circumstances attending the whole matter of the building of the garage and the use of the defendant's separate funds in that enterprise are persuasive, as the story is read from the printed page, as affirming the truth of defendant's claim, and as indicating that when the deed of the one-third interest was made it was executed for the purpose of adjusting the separate interests of the husband and wife in the garage property.

In suggesting this conclusion, however, we are here met with the condition that the plaintiff made a sworn declaration as to a totally different understanding and agreement. She testified that for the money advanced by the husband it was agreed that he would reimburse himself from the rents afterward collected. A statement of the amounts of rent which were collected by the defendant and deposited in the account referred to in the bank was received in evidence, and it does appear that the income was of such a sum as, deducting taxes and allowing for payment of the outside indebtedness, would leave enough money to have satisfied defendant's claim for the amount contributed by him toward the construction of the building.

Admitting a sharp conflict to have existed between the sworn testimony of the plaintiff and defendant, it must, nevertheless, be said that the findings, upon all of the issues as to the facts set out in the first alleged cause of action as asserted by the plaintiff, find support in the evidence. The court was not assisted by having presented in complete detail a schedule of the various expenditures made on behalf of both of the parties during the time that they lived together as husband and wife. Such tangible evidence as bank accounts and canceled checks was not produced, nor books of account, to show how and for what purpose the joint or separate incomes were expended. The Hillcrest property was purchased after the marriage of the parties. Mrs. Sexson testified that her husband asked her to deed it to him—

"for the same purpose, to establish a credit, and I gave it to him for the same purpose. He wanted to go on a cattle ranch and he said he had to have a credit and a prestige."

One other witness testified to having heard the defendant express a desire to go into the ranching business. The defendant testified that the deeds to him were for a valuable consideration. He denied all of the assertions made by the plaintiff as to alleged conditions affecting the transactions. As we have noted, however, such testimony presented a conflict in the evidence. Under such a state of the record the conclusions made by the trial judge as to the facts must be treated as final.

[2, 3] In what has been stated as to the sufficiency of the evidence we refer more particularly to that affecting the cause of action first alleged in plaintiff's complaint. The court in its findings determined that all of the allegations of the complaint as amended were true. The cause of action first alleged was one presenting a case where the defendant received the title to the real property involved in the two actions in trust, to be held subject to the conditions stated. Under the circumstances alleged and shown, plaintiff parted with the naked legal title only to her property, and the defendant received the same as trustee, subject to the right of the plaintiff to have that title revested in her by conveyance from the defendant after it had served the agreed purpose. The statute of limitations would not commence to run against the plaintiff's right until demand was made of defendant that he reconvey, or until the repudiation of the trust by the trustee. Taylor v. Morris, 163 Cal. 717, 127 Pac. 66. This statement we make in answer to the contention of appellant that his demurrer urging the bar of the statute of limitations should have been sustained. There was no evidence tending to show any repudiation of the trust at such a time prior to the commencement of the action as would make applicable either of the particular statutes pleaded. Plaintiff's demand for reconveyance was made within less than a year before the date of the commencement of the actions. The defense of laches, which was further interposed by the defendant in his answer, was without merit under the facts as they were asserted by the plaintiff to be. No circumstances were disclosed such as to show that the defendant was prejudiced by the mere lapse of time occurring between the date of the conveyance and the dates upon which the two actions were commenced. See Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 78 Pac. 467; Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 81 Pac. 516.

We have referred particularly to the contentions made in the brief of appellant as against the cause of action first asserted in plaintiff's complaint. This because, as we have already noted, that cause of action was sufficiently sustained by the evidence. The relief sought, as depending upon the two causes of action, was the same; hence, if the evidence sustained the first cause, it becomes immaterial as to whether the evidence was sufficient to support the findings upon the second alleged cause of action. Under the condition suggested, the judgment would necessarily have to be sustained; hence a discussion of appellant's points as urged against the cause of action for alleged fraud could serve no useful purpose.

The judgments appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KEPFORD et al. (Cr. 554.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 5, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⊂⊃342—Absence of motive favorable to accused.

A motive for the commission of a crime may be shown as a circumstance tending to show guilt, and the absence of motive may be considered as a circumstance favorable to the accused.

2. Trespass ⊂⊃88—Evidence defendants had permission to use another car admissible to show absence of motive.

In a prosecution for taking an automobile without the consent of the owner, in violation of the motor vehicle act, Stats. and Amdts. 1905, p. 185, P. C. § 499b, where defendants claimed they rode in the car as guests of another, whom they thought the owner, evidence that they had permission from their brother to use his machine was admissible to rebut the state's theory as to the willfulness of their use of the car.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃1170(2)—Exclusion of merely cumulative evidence not prejudicial error.

In a prosecution for taking an automobile without the owner's permission, in violation of the Motor Vehicle Act, P. C. § 499b, it was not prejudicial error to exclude defendant's testimony that he had permission to use his brother's car, where the latter and a codefendant testified, without objection, that he had such permission, the evidence being merely cumulative.

4. Criminal law ⊂⊃1166½(12)—Court's remark implying taking automobile without consent sufficient to convict not reversible error, in view of instructions taking must be willful.

In a prosecution for taking an automobile without the owner's permission, in violation of the Motor Vehicle Act, where defendant sought to show absence of motive by testimony that he had permission to use his brother's car, the court's remark, "that is wholly immaterial and taking time" was not reversible error, any implication that the taking of the machine without consent was sufficient to justify conviction, though not willful, being removed by subsequent instructions that the taking must have been willful and felonious, that if defendants rode in the machine with another, whom they believed had a right to use it, they were not guilty, and fully instructing as to burden of proof, reasonable doubt, and presumption of innocence.

5. Trespass ⊂⊃88—Evidence held to justify disbelief of defendants' claim to have ridden in car with one they believed was owner.

In a prosecution for driving an automobile without the consent of the owner, evidence held sufficient to justify the jury in believing that a person with whom defendants claimed to have ridden in the car, believing him the owner, was mythical.

6. Witnesses ⊂⊃359—Unnecessary to show judgment of conviction to impeach witness where latter testified he pleaded guilty.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, providing that a witness may be impeached by showing by his examination or by the record of the judgment that he had been convicted of a felony, where a witness, in answer to a question as to whether he had been convicted of a felony, stated that he plead guilty, it was unnecessary to produce the record of conviction, his plea of guilty being equivalent to the verdict of a jury, which constitutes a conviction under Pen. Code, § 1151.

7. Criminal law ⊂⊃730(8)—Remark of state's attorney to consider accused's criminal tendency held harmless in view of instruction to consider same for purpose only of weighing testimony.

In a prosecution for driving an automobile without the consent of the owner, a remark of the district attorney, in his argument, that "we might consider the tendency of" defendant "from his past history" was not prejudicial error, in the absence of bad faith or an attempt to take an unfair advantage, he having corrected it when his attention was called to it, and the court having instructed the jury to consider such tendency only for the purpose of weighing testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Clyde Kepford and another were convicted of driving an automobile without the consent of the owner, in violation of the Motor Vehicle Act, and they appeal. Affirmed.

E. P. Foltz, of Stockton, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendants were convicted of violating the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1905, p. 185), in that they—"did on or about the 14th day of May, 1920, in the county of San Joaquin, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously drive and operate and cause to be driven and operated a motor vehicle, to wit, an automobile, not their own nor the property of either of them, on the public highway, to wit, the Lockeford-Lodi road, and at the time of so driving and operating and causing to be driven and operated said automobile as aforesaid, the owner thereof, one Allen M. Sherfey, was not then and there present, and did not consent to having said automobile above mentioned driven and operated and caused to be driven and operated as aforesaid by said defendants, Clyde Kepford and Edward Kepford, or either of them."

No objection is made to the sufficiency of the information, nor is it claimed that the evidence did not warrant the verdict of the jury. The instructions are unassailed, and the regularity of the proceedings is not questioned except in three particulars, which we proceed to notice.

In their brief appellants declare:

"Both defendants at all times admitted being in the Sherfey machine. They claimed from the first and at the trial that a fellow who gave his name as Ryan was bootlegging at the picnic (a picnic near Lockeford where Sherfey had parked his machine), and took them in the Sherfey machine, which they believed to be Ryan's, several times to Lockeford and back of the Lockeford hotel in a field where he had some booze hid, and sold some to the boys and others until it was gone. * * * The defendants claim that Ryan was going to another place where he claimed to have liquor hid when the accident (referring to the breaking of the car) happened."

In view of this defense on the part of appellants, they claim that error was committed by the trial court in its—

"refusal to allow evidence of want of motive for the crime by showing that the defendant, Ed Kepford (Clyde could not operate a machine) had permission from his brother, Sydney, to use his machine that night."

In reference to this ruling the record shows the following:

"Q. Did you have any conversation with him (referring to his brother Syd.) that night about running it that night?

"The Court: The court will limit further inquiry along that line. That is wholly immaterial and taking time.

"Mr. Foltz: That is an important matter, the motive for running the machine. If a man has a machine of his own it is not reasonable he would go and steal somebody else's machine.

"The Court: The question is whether he took this machine. It is not a question of motive at all."

[1, 2] In this connection attention is called by the Attorney General to the fact that there was no claim of accident, nor was it contended by appellants that they believed they were taking their brother's machine; but their whole defense was that they had the right to ride in this particular machine and, hence, it is asserted, that the proposed evidence was immaterial. Manifestly, it would have no tendency to excuse or justify their conduct in riding with Ryan. In fact, they needed no justification further than their own explanation, but, unfortunately for them, the jury rejected it. But the real purpose of the evidence was to support the probability of their story, and to weaken the contention of the people that they had willfully taken Mr. Sherfey's machine.

It is a familiar rule that a motive for the commission of a crime may be shown as a circumstance tending to show guilt, and the absence of motive or reason for the commission of the alleged offense may be considered as a circumstance favorable to the accused. People v. Brown, 130 Cal. 591, 62 Pac. 1072; People v. Bauweraerts, 164 Cal. 696, 130 Pac. 717. Having, therefore, the permission of their brother to use his machine, they claim it would be less probable that they would willfully take some other machine without permission. Being able, in other words, to accomplish their purpose lawfully, it is argued that they would be less likely to resort to unlawful means. If they had contended that they did not use Sherfey's machine at all, or that they supposed they were taking their brother's machine, the materiality of the proposed evidence would be quite apparent. However, in aid of their plea of not guilty, and to rebut the theory of the prosecution, they had the right to introduce any evidence that might logically relate to the question of guilty knowledge. The force of the claim as to the willfulness of the use of Sherfey's machine might be impaired if the jury believed that appellants had permission to use their brother's machine. This upon the theory, of course, that men do not ordinarily commit crime when they can just as easily accomplish their purpose in a lawful manner. We think, therefore, the evidence was admissible for what it was worth.

[3] However, the evidence would have been cumulative, merely, as the other two brothers testified, without objection, that defendants had permission to use said machine—presumably for a proper purpose. There was no dispute as to that, and the refusal to allow additional evidence of the same kind, if erroneous, was without prejudice.

[4] If it may be said that the court's said remark might be considered as implying that the taking of Sherfey's machine by defendants without consent was sufficient to justify conviction in the absence of willfulness, it is sufficient to answer that the effect of such implication was entirely removed by the subsequent instructions of the court. For instance, the jury was directed substantially that the taking must have been willful and felonious to warrant a conviction. The theory of appellants was specifically covered by this instruction:

"If you have a reasonable doubt from the evidence whether the defendants operated the machine as charged or rode with one Ryan, believing Ryan had a right to use the machine, you must find the defendants not guilty."

The jury was also fully instructed as to the burden of proof, the doctrine of reasonable doubt, and the presumption of innocence. In fact, every principle of law germane to the situation was properly presented, and the jury must have had a comprehension of the legal aspect of the case.

[5] As far as the facts are concerned, it may be added that the jurors were entirely justified in believing that Ryan was a mythical person originating in the exigent need of appellants to fabricate a defense.

[6] The second and third objections of appellants are based upon the following showing: Defendant Ed Kepford was cross-examined by the district attorney as follows:

"Q. You were previously convicted in this county of a felony on August 2, 1915? A. Yes sir—not that I know of, a felony, no sir.

"Q. You plead guilty to a charge of burglary which was for the taking of an automobile? A. I plead guilty, yes. They told me I could get out of it; that is the way, only way, I could get out of it.

"Q. For the taking of a Japanese automobile? A. Yes, sir; from about 30 feet from my place, standing up against a locust tree."

Then, in the argument to the jury by the district attorney, this appears:

"We might consider the tendency of Ed Kepford from his past history.

"Mr. Foltz: We assign that as error, 'the tendency of Mr. Kepford.'

"The Court: I think, Mr. Van Vranken, you can only consider that for the purpose of weighing testimony.

"Mr. Van Vranken: That is the purpose. I was in error, your honor.

"The Court: Only for that purpose. I will have to instruct to that effect."

It is claimed that it was incumbent upon the people to show a judgment of conviction either by a production of the record or by an interrogation of the witness to that effect. In some instances the term conviction is used as including not only a verdict but also the judgment which follows. But that a verdict of guilty constitutes a conviction within the contemplation of section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that "a witness may be impeached by the party against whom he was called, by contradictory evidence or by evidence that his general reputation for truth, honesty, or integrity is bad, but not by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown by the examination of the witness, or the record of the judgment, that he had been convicted of a felony," is positively determined by the Supreme Court of this state in People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 66 Pac. 372. Therein it is said:

"It is contended that at the time the witness testified he had not been 'convicted of a felony;' that, to sustain the ruling of the court, it must be assumed, as a matter of law, that the verdict of guilty constituted a 'conviction.' That such verdict does constitute a conviction, within the ordinary as well as the technical meaning of the word, seems to be well settled."

See, also, section 1151 of the Penal Code. The district attorney elected to take the usual course and ask the witness, first, if he had been convicted of a felony, adopting the language of the statute. This was an entirely proper question. The answer was somewhat equivocal, and it was followed by the question as to his pleading guilty to a charge of felony. The answer of the witness to the question showed that he had been convicted of a felony—his plea of guilty being equivalent to the verdict of a jury. In view of his answer, it was, of course, unnecessary to produce the record of conviction.

[7] As to the objectionable remark of the district attorney, it is to be observed that when his attention was called to it he immediately corrected it, and the court properly instructed the jury as to the purpose for which said conviction might be considered. There is no claim that the district attorney acted in bad faith, or that he sought to take an unfair advantage of the defendants. Under such circumstances, the inadvertent statement must be regarded as harmless.

Appellants seem to have been fairly tried and justly convicted, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action by Salvador Espinosa against Z. B. Stuart and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Hocker, C. W. Byrer, and Z. B. Stuart, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, and R. C. McComish, of San Jose, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant to quiet his title to lands in Monterey county. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The controversy arose out of a transaction which took place between the plaintiff, as client, and the defendant, as his attorney and legal advisor.

Carlos Espinosa was the owner of large tracts of land, including the lands in suit. In January, 1865, he died, leaving him surviving a widow, Josefa Boronda de Espinosa, and eight children, including the plaintiff. The father left a will, written in the Spanish language, which was admitted to probate. While the probate proceedings were still pending, one of the daughters, Narcisa Duarta, induced the plaintiff, in consideration of certain moneys which had already been paid to him, and of certain other moneys which were thereafter to be paid to him, to convey to her his interest in the estate. Later, in 1879, the estate was distributed by a decree which found that the mother was the sole legatee. In 1916 the widow was negotiating a lease of a large tract to the Spreckels Sugar Company, but before the lease was executed some of the children, appearing through the defendant as their attorney, commenced an action attacking her title, on the 23d day of September, 1916. Later, September 25, 1916, the widow commenced a counteraction to quiet her title against all of the children, including this plaintiff. The defendant appeared in that action as attorney for several of the children. Later, but as early as October, 1916, negotiations were commenced looking toward a settlement of both of the cases just mentioned. Early in those negotiations Mr. Lacey, attorney for the widow, advised Mr. Stuart, attorney for several of the children, that the mother had made her will (which he held in his safe), and, litigation or no litigation, all of the property would, at her death go to the children, share and share alike. A written agreement of compromise was not signed until March 29, 1917; but the record contains testimony to the effect that that paper contains in writing the proffered compromise discussed between Mr. Lacey and Mr. Stuart, the defendant, in the month of October, 1916.

For many years the plaintiff had been absent from Monterey county. In the fall and winter of 1916–17 the defendant was busy trying to locate the plaintiff. Finally, on February 16th or 17th, Mr. Stuart succeeded in calling on the plaintiff at Davis, Yolo county, California. While at Davis defendant asked this plaintiff to employ him as an attorney. While there the defendant told the plaintiff that the court had directed him to get together all of the heirs of plaintiff's father. Together they went to Salinas on February 17, 1917. The next day the plaintiff orally consented to employ defendant as his attorney. An agreement compensating defendant for services was signed, defendant says, "along the latter part of February, 1917." This agreement, although often called for during the protracted trial, was never produced, notwithstanding the defendant often said he thought he had it. The defendant actually commenced to act as the plaintiff's attorney, as early as March 29, 1917. On April 12, 1917, the plaintiff signed a grant, bargain, and sale deed to defendant conveying one-third of his interest absolutely. By a subsequent deed he conveyed the remaining two-thirds of his interest in the lands in dispute. This later instrument refers to another paper "of even date herewith." It was not produced at the trial. All of these papers were dictated to Miss Castro. She was not produced at the trial, nor were her notes.

The agreement of employment, it was claimed, took place before the plaintiff's two sisters. One sister was not produced, and the other was not questioned on the subject. The absence of the witnesses not called was not accounted for. The absence of the writings claimed to have been executed, but not produced, was never accounted for. There is evidence that the defendant never informed his client, this plaintiff, that the plaintiff's deed to Mrs Duarta conveyed no title; nor that there was a standing offer of compromise which afforded this plaintiff all the rights he could acquire by any litigation; nor that, as this plaintiff had already been made a party defendant to the pending suits, the parties litigant necessarily must protect his rights in their attempt to protect their own rights; nor that this defendant must do all the work which he subsequently did do, whether the plaintiff employed him or not. In addition to numerous acts of weak-mindedness shown in the record in numerous small matters, it appears that as early as March 29, 1917, this plaintiff was adjudged incompetent, and thereafter appeared through the duly appointed guardian of his person and estate.

On March 29, 1917, the plaintiff deeded to the defendant properties of the value of $15,000; on the 12th day of April he deeded to him properties of the value of $25,000, and on the same dates he signed contracts assigning to the defendant rents amounting to several thousand dollars. The trial court found that the value of the services rendered for the plaintiff by the defendant was $500. There was evidence in the record supporting each of said valuations. There is testimony to the effect that before the plaintiff signed any of said papers he talked to two or more laymen as to the advisability of so doing. There is no evidence that any of such persons knew of the aforesaid facts which the defendant had failed to state to his client. Yet such independent advice is the sole showing which the defendant made tending to relieve him of the charge of undue influence.

Before taking up the points made by the appellant, it will work in the interest of clearness for us to notice two different rules of law. The first rule to be noticed is stated in section 951 of Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, as follows:

"Where there is no coercion amounting to duress, but a transaction is the result of a moral, social, or domestic force exerted upon a party, controlling the free action of his will and preventing any true consent, equity may relieve against the transaction on the ground of undue influence, even though there may be no invalidity at law."

Still referring to that same rule, the learned author, in section 955, says:

"In the various instances described in the preceding paragraphs there has been an actual undue influence consciously and designedly exerted upon a party who was peculiarly susceptible to external pressure on account of his mental weakness, old age, ignorance, necessitous condition, and the like. The existence of any fiduciary relation was unnecessary and immaterial. The undue influence being established as a fact, any contract obtained or other transaction accomplished by its means is voidable, and is set aside without the necessary aid of any presumption."

The second rule to be noticed is stated by the same author in section 955, in words as follows:

"The single circumstance now to be considered is the existence of some fiduciary relation, some relation of confidence, subsisting between two parties. No mental weakness, old age, ignorance, pecuniary distress, and the like, is assumed as an element of the transaction; if any such fact be present it is incidental, not necessary—immaterial, not essential."

Our Civil Code, §§ 1575 and 2235, states the same rules. That the relation of attorney and client is specially subject to these rules has been directly passed on. Metropolis, etc., Sav. Bank v. Monnier, 169 Cal. 592, 147 Pac. 265. In that case, at page 598, of 169 Cal., on page 268 of 147 Pac., the court said:

"Assuming that, upon another trial, the defense of undue influence will be within the issues, it is proper to point out that a prima facie case in support of this defense would be made out by proof that Mr. Patton, prior to and at the time he took the note and mortgage, was acting as attorney for Mrs. Monnier. The relation of attorney and client is of a fiduciary character, and the Civil Code (section 2235) clearly provides that all transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary during the existence of the trust, by which he obtains any advantage from his beneficiary, 'are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration and under undue influence.' This does not mean that a trustee may not deal with his beneficiary. But if he does deal with him in such manner as to obtain an advantage, the trustee has the burden of showing by evidence that the transaction was fair. Certainly, the obtaining of a note for $20,000, secured by mortgage, is an advantage, and the attorney, or those claiming under him, cannot safely rest, as they did in this case, without affirmative proof of the facts surrounding the transaction. On the question of the applicability of the presumption declared by section 2235, it is sufficient to refer to Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 523, 105 Pac. 981, and authorities there cited. See, also, Cooley v. Miller, 168 Cal. 120, 142 Pac. 83, 88.

[1] The appellant makes 11 points. The first point he makes is that the trial court erred in overruling his demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint. The plaintiff set forth his grievance in three counts: (1) A count, in the ordinary form, to quiet title; (2) and (3) counts as for a breach of trust. The defendant Stuart demurred "to the complaint" on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient, and on the ground that several causes of action had been improperly joined. Clearly, the first count was entirely sufficient, and therefore the demurrer was not good as to that count. This being true, the trial court was justified in overruling the demurrer "to the complaint" in so far as it was an attack on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient. Pfister v. Wade, 69 Cal. 133, 136, 10 Pac. 369.

The second count commingled and combined allegations showing (1) a cause of action for actual undue influence (sections 951 and 955, Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence), and (2) a cause of action for implied undue influence as for an advantage gained by an attorney over his client after such relation had been created (section 955, Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence). The second count is not a model of good pleading, but we cannot say that it is subject to the attack that it did not state facts sufficient. De Pedrorena v. Hotchkiss, 95 Cal. 636, 30 Pac. 787.

[2] The third count was dismissed, and we need not dwell on it. As all three counts involved the transfers from plaintiff to defendant, the second ground of attack, an improper joinder of causes, is without merit. Such combinations are permissible since the addition of subdivision 8 to section 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Morris v. Judkins, 36 Cal. App. 413, 414, 415, 172 Pac. 163; Lathrop v. Francis, 180 Cal. 182, 180 Pac. 1 and 2.

[3, 4] The defendant complains that the trial court failed to find on a material allegation of the count to quiet title. As the trial court based its judgment on the allegations of the second count in the complaint, the attack is not sound if the court fully found on the issues presented by the second count. Furthermore, the allegation in question was not denied, and there was no issue thereon.

Again, the defendant contends that "the judgment is not supported by the findings, and is contrary to law." In this behalf the defendant argues that the trial court failed to make a finding on a material issue. This point we have just discussed, and it does not require further consideration.

[5] Another point is that—

"The judgment is not supported by the findings in that: It is not true that the plaintiff is now or ever was the owner of the undivided one twenty-fourth of said real property hereinabove referred to."

The answer is that the finding is in the defendant's favor. Also, it is a finding on an issue presented by the first count and the trial court did not rest its judgment in whole or in part on such count.

All of the remaining attacks are to the effect that the findings are not supported by the evidence. No one of these attacks is supported by the record. Taking up first the findings made responsive to issues tendered by the complaint, assignments of insufficiency 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 are not well founded. As to some minor matters, the evidence was conflicting; but as to no single one of those findings can it be truly said there was no evidence. As to issues tendered by the defendant's answer, he complains in points 8 and 9 as to the findings made thereon. It suffices to say that the evidence abundantly supports the findings.

As stated above, the plaintiff pleaded in his second count a combined charge of (1) actual undue influence and (2) a violation of fiduciary relations. There is evidence in the record supporting that count when weighed by the calls of either rule.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

BONIFACIO v. STUART. (Civ. 3713.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 3, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 30, 1921.)

1. Action ⊜45(4)—Causes of action held not improperly united.

A cause of action to set aside a conveyance and a cause of action to recover money had and received by defendant held not improperly united, the action being in equity, in which the court takes jurisdiction for all purposes.

2. Equity ⊜38—When equity takes jurisdiction, it does so for all purposes.

When equity takes jurisdiction, it does so for all purposes.

3. Attorney and client ⊜123(2) — Attorney has burden of showing client's conveyance to him to be fair.

In client's action to set aside conveyance to attorney on ground of improper advantage taken of client by attorney, the attorney had the burden of showing that transfers to him by the client were fair and adequate, and that the client was fully advised as to his rights and as to his liabilities at the time he executed such papers.

4. Attorney and client ⊜123(2)—Client, suing to set aside conveyance to attorney for services, not required to prove value of services.

In client's action to set aside conveyance to attorney made in payment for services, the client was not required to produce opinion testimony as to the value of the attorney's services, nor was the trial judge bound to ask for such testimony, the attorney in such case having the burden of showing that the transaction was fair, a fiduciary relationship existing between them.

5. Appeal and error ⊜1011(1)—Conflict in testimony was for trial court.

A conflict in the evidence was for the trial court.

6. Appeal and error ⊜1071(2)—Error in misstating fact cured by decree following finding.

Error of court in misstating in conclusions of law fact stated by findings of fact was corrected by the decree following the finding.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Suit by John J. Bonifacio against Z. B. Stuart. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Hocker, C. W. Byrer, and Z. B. Stuart, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, and R. C. McComish, of San Jose, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant in the trial court has appealed from an adverse judgment as to his title to a fractional interest in certain lands in Monterey county. The defendant acted as attorney for the plaintiff in the case of Espinosa v. Bonifacio et al., No. 6436, records superior court, state of California, in and for the county of Monterey, that being the same litigation referred to in Espinosa v. Stuart (No. 3711) 199 Pac. 66, this day filed, and which is hereby referred to for additional facts. In his complaint the plaintiff alleged that he was the owner of an undivided one thirty-second interest in certain lands, describing them; that the defendant claimed some interest, which was without right; that the defendant acted as attorney for this plaintiff for a long period in a suit entitled Espinosa v. Bonifacio et al., and in other matters; that during all that time plaintiff had full confidence in defendant; that during said time said attorney asked said client to sign two papers, saying they were papers to clear the title to the lands in dispute in Espinosa v. Bonifacio et al.; that, in truth, one of said papers was a deed by which plaintiff conveyed to defendant three-tenths of his one thirty-second interest; that the other paper was an assignment of three-tenths of plaintiff's rentals, aggregating $500 per annum; that the aforesaid statement of said attorney to said client was false; that plaintiff believed and acted on it; that plaintiff did not receive any consideration for said interests; that the defendant had collected $200 of the rentals so assigned; and that the plaintiff had no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law.

[1, 2] The defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that several causes of action had been improperly united, and not separately stated, viz.: A cause of action to set aside a certain conveyance, and an action to recover the sum of $200 money had and received by the defendant. The demurrer was overruled. The ruling was not erroneous. The plaintiff alleged a cause in equity. When equity takes jurisdiction it does so for all purposes. Murphy v. Crowley, 140 Cal. 141, 73 Pac. 820. The defendant argues the point as though the plaintiff had combined an ordinary action to quiet title and an action for money had and received. An examination of the allegations quoted above will show that plaintiff's basic action was something more than an action to quiet title.

[3, 4] The complaint pleaded more fully than necessary a cause of action for an advantage taken by an attorney of his client. The plaintiff showed by the evidence that the relation of attorney and client arose through a written contract, executed September 12, 1916; that said writing called for a fee measured at two-tenths of the plaintiff's share; and that, on March 30, 1917, the defendant took from the plaintiff transfers measured at three-tenths. The burden of proof shifted to the defendant to show that such excessive transfers were fair and adequate, and that the plaintiff was fully advised both as to his rights and as to his liabilities at the time he executed said papers. Metropolis, etc., Sav. Bank v. Monnier, 169 Cal. 592, 598, 147 Pac. 265. The defendant did not so take up the burden of proof, but now complains because the plaintiff did.

In this behalf he complains that the trial court erred in making a finding "that said one thirty-second interest was and is of the value of $25,000," whereas the pleadings did not expressly allege any value thereof. If it was a finding without the issues, it was nugatory, and cannot hurt the defendant. Again, he contends that there was no evidence of the value of his services or of the services of his associates. The trial court awarded the defendant $150, apparently to pay defendant's associates, whom he had employed. No burden rested on the plaintiff to produce opinion testimony on the value of an attorney's services, nor was the trial judge bound to ask for such testimony. Zimmer v. Kilborn, 165 Cal. 521, 522, 132 Pac. 1025. The defendant, in effect, contends that the findings are not supported by the evidence. In this behalf the defendant says, "Can a written instrument be contradicted by a man, who simply says that he did not know what he was signing—that he did not read it?" The answer is, "Most certainly, when a fiduciary relation has been shown to exist." Barron Estate Co. v. Woodruff Co., 163 Cal. 561, 576, 126 Pac. 351, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 125. As to the sufficiency of the evidence, it is enough to state that the plaintiff took the stand as a witness in his own behalf, and that, by the documents he produced, or by his oath, he substantiated all the allegations contained in his complaint as hereinabove set forth.

[5] In point 4 of his brief the defendant argues that the plaintiff took independent advice, and he quotes witnesses to that effect. The plaintiff testified that he did not do so. The conflict was for the trial court.

In point 7 the defendant asserts that the plaintiff did not prove any overt acts of, or constituting, undue influence. In making this attack the defendant is clearly confusing a case of actual undue influence with a case for violation of the duties arising out of a fiduciary relation. Goodwin v. Goodwin, 59 Cal. 560, and Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135, 25 L. Ed. 807, are cases of the first class; Simpson v. Dalziel, 135 Cal. 599, 67 Pac. 1080, was of the latter class, but it involved the duty of a client after the relations between himself and his attorney had been terminated.

[6] The last attack which appellant makes is based on the fact that in the conclusions of law the court uses the fraction seven-tenths instead of eight-tenths. The findings of fact uses eight-tenths, and the judgment uses eight-tenths. The error, if any, was corrected by the decree. Spencer v. Duncan, 107 Cal. 423, 40 Pac. 549.

The written contract between the parties, dated September 12, 1916, contained a clause which would have warranted a claim by the attorney for reimbursement for cash expended; but he introduced no accounts or vouchers showing that he had any claim under that clause. Again, he claimed a subsequent alteration had been made in the contract of employment, but he did not show a new consideration which would support such a claim (Main St., etc., Co. v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 129 Cal. 301, 305, 61 Pac. 937), nor did he show, nor did the court find, that there was a subsequent written agreement nor an executed oral agreement (Civ. Code, § 1698).

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action by Gudelia E. Bouton against Z. B. Stuart. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Hocker, C. W. Byrer, and Z. B. Stuart, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, and R. C. McComish, of San Jose, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant in the trial court has appealed from an adverse judgment as to his title to a fractional interest in certain lands in Monterey county. The case is closely allied in its facts to the cases entitled Bonifacio v. Stuart (No. 3713) 199 Pac. 69, and Espinosa v. Stuart (No. 3711) 199 Pac. 66, this day filed; therefore we state only those facts necessary to a determination of this case.

[1, 2] In her amended complaint the plaintiff sets forth allegations showing that certain transfers were obtained by the defendant Stuart while acting as her attorney in certain litigation; that some of the property so transferred had been by the defendant Stuart transferred to the other defendants, Frank Shurtz and David Wallace; and that the defendant Stuart had collected under said transfers certain rentals amounting to $550 claimed by the plaintiff to be her property. The defendants interposed a demurrer alleging that the plaintiff had improperly united and had not separately stated two causes of action, a cause of action to set aside a deed and a cause of action to recover $500 (sic $500) moneys had and received. The demurrer also alleged that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant because the action to set aside the deed was addressed to all of the defendants and the cause of action for money had and received was addressed to the defendant Stuart only. The trial court overruled the demurrer. There was no error in the ruling.

[3-5] The plaintiff showed by the evidence that the relation of attorney and client arose through a written contract executed September 12, 1916; that said writing called for a fee measured at two-tenths of the plaintiff's share; and that on March 30, 1917, the defendant took from the plaintiff transfers measured at three-tenths. The plaintiff also introduced testimony tending to prove each of her allegations; thereupon the defendant introduced some testimony to the effect that the plaintiff had been advised as to the contents of the papers which she signed; thereupon, and in rebuttal, the plaintiff called the county assessor, and, over the objection and exception of the defendant, the assessor testified that the whole tract, of which the property in dispute was a part, had a value of $800,000. There was no error in receiving the testimony. The burden of showing that the transfers were fair and that the consideration was adequate rested on the defendant. True, he had not introduced any evidence showing that the consideration was adequate, but if he had wanted to cover the omission in his proof he could have made the request. By failing to meet the burden of proof he may not complain because the plaintiff did not rest her case on the presumption in her favor as expressed in the statute (Civ. Code, § 2235).

[6] Points 3, 4, 5, and 6 attack certain findings as not being supported by the evidence and the complete answer is that the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to support each and all of her allegations. The defendant introduced some evidence to the contrary. The conflict was for the determination of the trial court. The plaintiff testified that three papers were together in the form of a book; that the lease from Mrs. Espinosa and all of her children to the Spreckels Sugar Company was read to her; however, that paper is not here involved. She also testified that the other two papers were not read to her; that all of the papers were in English, and that she could not read English. While on the stand as a witness the defendant testified that all of the papers were attached together. Two other witnesses who were present at the execution of the papers testified that they saw two separate papers—a lease and something else. But, as stated by both the plaintiff and the defendant, there were no two separate papers but all three were attached together. The only question for the trial court to determine was as to whether the plaintiff was advised as to the assignment measured at three-tenths of her interest instead of being measured at two-tenths, according to the terms of her written contract. The defendant says she was so advised. The plaintiff says she was not. The conflict in this testimony has been decided by the trial court in favor of the plaintiff.

[7] It does not appear from the record that the defendant Z. B. Stuart had transferred to the defendant Frank Shurtz or to the defendant David Wallace any specific parcels of the lands involved in this case. It is immaterial, therefore, that those two persons were originally named as defendants and that the action was later dismissed as to them.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

52 Cal. App. 637

BANDUCCI v. SRESOVICH. (Civ. 3273.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 14, 1921.)

1. Pleading ⊂=214(3) — Plaintiff assumed on demurrer to have complied with provision of contract.

Though a contract by defendant to construct a building for plaintiff required plaintiff to exercise all reasonable diligence in the discovery and report to the contractor as the work progressed unsatisfactory materials and labor, where the complaint in plaintiff's action for breach of the contract alleged that he had performed all the covenants contained in the contract on his part, it must be assumed on demurrer that he complied with such provision.

2. Contracts ⊂=305(1) — Under building contract failure to express dissatisfaction during work held not waiver of defects.

Under a building contract providing that the payment of the progress payments should not be construed as an absolute acceptance of the work done up to the time of the payment, but that the entire work was to be subject to inspection and approval when claimed to be completed, and that the architect, superintendent, or owner should exercise all reasonable diligence in the discovery, and report to the contractor as the work progressed unsatisfactory materials and labor, the mere failure of the owner during the progress of the work to express dissatisfaction therewith, or direct the contractor's attention to omissions, could not be deemed a waiver of his right to a structure of the dimensions, and constructed of the materials, called for by the contract.

3. Contracts ⊂=332(2)—Complaint in action for breach of building contract not demurrable.

In an action against a building contractor for breach of the contract, a complaint, which, though awkwardly drawn, showed the making of the contract, the performance by plaintiff of all the conditions thereby imposed on him, defendant's breach of the contract and the resulting damages, for which, upon proof of such facts and the absence of any sufficient defense, plaintiff would be entitled to judgment, was not subject to general demurrer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Action by Louis J. Banducci against Joseph Sresovich as administrator, substituted for D. Ashbury Evans, deceased. From a judgment for defendant on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. A. Klein, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Wetherhorn, Hoyt & Jones, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

SHAW, J. By this action plaintiff sought recovery of damages for defendant's alleged breach of a contract to construct a building in accordance with his agreement so to do. A general demurrer interposed to the complaint was sustained and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals.

It appears that defendant, pursuant to a contract, set out in the complaint, erected a building for plaintiff; that by the terms of this contract the building was to be constructed in accordance with plans and specifications referred to therein, and under the supervision of the architect named or superintendent agreed upon by the parties, and payment therefor made, subject to approval of the architect, as the work progressed. The contract contained a provision as follows:

"Ninth: The payment of the progress-payments by the owner shall not be construed as an absolute acceptance of the work done up to the time of such payments; but the entire work is to be subject to inspection and approval of the architect, superintendent or owner at the time when it shall be claimed by the contractor that the contract and works are completed; but the architect, superintendent or owner shall exercise all reasonable diligence in the discovery, and report to the contractor, as the work progresses, materials and labor which are not satisfactory to the architect, superintendent or owner, so as to avoid unnecessary trouble and cost to the contractor in making good defective parts."

While inartificially drawn, the substance of the complaint is that plaintiff on his part performed all of the terms and conditions of the contract but that defendant on his part, in completing the house, failed and neglected so to do; that on or about October 1, 1918, plaintiff, in writing directed to defendant, specified various defects, omissions and substitutions in the construction of the building, and, in writing, requested that he comply with the contract; but, notwithstanding such notice and request, defendant has failed, neglected, and refused to comply with the provisions of his agreement, by reason of which fact the building as completed does not comply with the plans and specifications pursuant to which defendant agreed to construct it. In addition to the above, the complainant specifies the particulars wherein the building as completed fails to comply with the terms of the agreement, together with the damage alleged to have been sustained by reason of such noncompliance.

[1, 2] It was, as claimed by respondent, the duty of plaintiff, during the progress of construction, to "exercise all reasonable diligence in the discovery, and report to the contractor" as to materials and labor which were not satisfactory. Since, however, it is alleged in the complaint that plaintiff performed all the covenants contained in the contract on his part, we must, upon the demurrer, assume that he did comply with this provision. However, the question of whether plaintiff complied with this provision is unimportant, since by the terms of the contract the entire work, upon the claim of completion made by the contractor, was to be subject to the approval of the architect, superintendent, or owner, regardless of whether or not the owner or architect, during the progress of the work, had expressed dissatisfaction therewith. In other words, the mere failure of plaintiff, during the progress of the work, to express dissatisfaction therewith, or direct the attention of the contractor to omissions, could not upon the facts shown be deemed a waiver by plaintiff of his right to a structure of the dimensions, and constructed of the materials, called for by the contract, and for which he paid the price. Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 310, 38 Pac. 740. This being true, and since, as alleged in the complaint, defendant failed to construct the building in accordance with the plans and specifications therefor, but in doing the work used materials other than those called for by the contract, and omitted the doing of work specified therein, it follows that it is sufficient to state a cause of action.

[3] However awkwardly drawn the complaint may be, it is not obnoxious to the general demurrer interposed. It shows the making of the contract, the performance on the part of plaintiff of all the conditions thereby imposed upon him, the breach of the contract by defendant, and the resulting damages, for which, upon proof of such facts and the absence of any sufficient defense, plaintiff would be entitled to judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

VOINICH et al. v. POE, County Clerk.

(Civ. 2235.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 11, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1921.)

1. New trial ⊂155—Stipulation of parties cannot keep alive motion for new trial.

As Code Civ. Proc. § 660, declares that the power of the court to pass on a motion for new trial shall expire within three months after the verdict of the jury, and that if such motion is not determined within three months, it shall be deemed denied, and section 939 allows 30 days for an appeal after entry of the order determining a motion for a new trial or other termination, the time within which the trial court may determine the motion for new trial is restricted to the three-month period, and cannot be extended by a stipulation of the parties.

2. Appeal and error ⊂349—Death of counsel held not to extend time for appeal.

Where on the day defendants' counsel died, the 30-day period allowed for an appeal by Code Civ. Proc. § 939, after termination of motion for a new trial had expired, the fact of counsel's death will not extend defendants' time for appealing under section 286, providing that when an attorney dies, the party to the action for whom he was acting must be required by the adverse party to appoint another attorney before further proceedings can be had, for there was nothing further for plaintiff who had recovered judgment to do; the appeal being a proceeding by defendants; hence a notice of appeal thereafter filed was ineffectual.

3. Mandamus ⊂57(1)—Clerk will not be compelled to make transcript where appellate court would have no jurisdiction of appeal.

Where the time for an appeal had expired, so that the appellate court would be without jurisdiction, and an attempted notice was wholly ineffectual, the clerk cannot, by mandamus, be required to make a transcript.

Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Petition by Martin Voinich and others for a writ of mandate against A. W. Poe, County Clerk, to compel preparation of a transcript. From a judgment for respondent after an order sustaining a demurrer to the petition, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Joe Huberty, of San Andreas, for appellants.

Snyder & Snyder, of San Andreas, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. On February 1, 1917, a complaint was filed in the superior court of Calaveras county, wherein Rose Rolleri was plaintiff and Martin Voinich, Nick Voinich, Mitchell Voinich and Pave Voinich were defendants. The cause came on regularly for trial on June 28, 1918, Messrs. Snyder and Snyder appearing as attorneys for the plaintiff and Will A. Dower as attorney for said defendants. Judgment was entered in said action on the 1st day of October, 1919, in favor of the plaintiff therein, and notice thereof was served upon the defendants and filed with the clerk on October 10, 1919. On the 20th day of said month the said defendants caused to be served and filed their "notice of intention to move for a new trial." On account of the illness of Mr. Dower, said attorney for the defendants, the parties entered into certain stipulations for the continuance from time to time of the hearing of said motion, the last stipulation being as follows:

"It is stipulated and agreed by and between the respective parties to the above-entitled action that the hearing of defendants' motion for new trial may be continued to and including the 25th day of February, A. D. 1920, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard. Dated this 9th day of February, 1920. Snyder & Snyder, Attorneys for Plaintiff."

The day this stipulation was signed and filed the said Will A. Dower died, and on June 8th following said defendants, petitioners herein, without any written notice or request by the adverse party, appointed Joe Huberty, Esq., as their attorney, for the purpose of seeking relief from said judgment in favor of said Rose Rolleri. On said June 8 said Huberty, as attorney for said defendants, caused to be filed with A. W. Poe, clerk of said superior court, substitution of attorney for said defendants, notice of appeal and the necessary undertaking to perfect the appeal in said cause. The following day, June 9, notice to the clerk was filed, requesting and directing him, as county clerk, to make up and prepare, for the purposes of appeal, a full and complete transcript of all the records and proceedings in said action. Said clerk refused, and ever since has refused, to comply with said notice. Thereupon, said defendants, as petitioners herein, began an action in said superior court for a writ of mandate to compel said Poe, as clerk of said court, to prepare said transcript. A demurrer to said petition, or complaint, was interposed by said Poe and sustained by the court, and from the judgment following said order this appeal has been taken.

[1] The first question is whether the stipulation of the parties was operative to keep alive the motion for a new trial. Section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The power of the court to pass on motion for new trial shall expire within three months after the verdict of the jury or service on the moving party of notice of the decision of the court. If such motion is not determined within said three months, the effect shall be a denial of the motion without further order of the court."

It cannot be doubted that this provision is mandatory and jurisdictional. The trial court has no legal power to grant a motion for a new trial after the expiration of the time limited by said statute. It is equally plain that, if the court fails to act upon the motion within said period, by operation of law said failure is equivalent to a denial of the motion on the last day of said three months. If there were any doubt about the meaning of that statute it would be set at rest by the decision of the Supreme Court in Lancel v. Postlethwaite, 172 Cal. 326, 156 Pac. 486. Therein it is said:

"In other words, a trial court is empowered to grant a new trial, upon a motion duly made to that end, at any time within three months after the verdict of the jury or service on the moving party of notice of the decision of the court, but not thereafter; and its failure to determine within such time any such motion regularly made is a denial of such motion and a 'termination in the trial court' within the meaning of section 939 of the proceedings in such motion."

Said section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"An appeal may be taken from any judgment or order of a superior court from which an appeal lies under any provision of this Code, or of any other Code, or under any other statute, within sixty days from the entry of said judgment or order. * * * If proceedings on motion for a new trial are pending, the time for appeal from the judgment shall not expire until thirty days after entry in the trial court of the order determining such motion for a new trial, or other termination in the trial court of the proceedings upon such motion."

In Bidwell v. Sonoma County Transportation Co., 39 Cal. App. 330, 178 Pac. 722, the question arose whether said section 660 was affected by section 12, providing for the exclusion of the last day in which an act may be done if that falls on a holiday. In holding that said section 12 does not qualify said section 660 the court said:

"The latter section [section 12] is general in its terms as applied to the time within which an act may be performed; but section 660 is specific as to the time within which the court may pass upon a motion for a new trial, and in the most positive terms confines the power of the court to perform that particular act to the period named, and, going even further, provides that, failing action by the court within said time, the motion is automatically deemed denied."

The trial court's authority being thus limited, it manifestly cannot be extended by any stipulation of the parties. Land v. Johnston, 156 Cal. 253, 104 Pac. 449; Marin M. W. District v. North Coast Water Co., 178 Cal. 324, 173 Pac. 473. The foregoing decisions reassert the familiar principle that jurisdiction cannot be conferred by consent. In the former it is said:

"Statutes limiting the time of appeal are jurisdictional and mandatory, and as the time within which a notice of appeal may be filed is fixed by law it cannot be enlarged by stipulation of the parties or order of court."

[2] The motion for a new trial in the case of Rolleri v. Voinich et al. having been automatically denied on January 10, 1920, an appeal from the judgment therein in order to be effective had to be taken on or before February 9, 1920, unless the time was extended by reason of the death of the attorney for the defendants; and that brings us to the second question in the case.

It is the claim of appellants that the time was thus extended by virtue of section 286 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing:

"When an attorney dies, * * * a party to an action, for whom he was acting as attorney, must before any further proceedings are had against him, be required by the adverse party, by written notice, to appoint another party, or to appear in person."

Under a fair construction of this section, since Mr. Dower was the attorney for the defendants in said action, and since he died on the last day in which an appeal could be taken if he were living, the plaintiff would have been required to serve said notice before taking any further proceedings in the case against said defendants. But the section has no application here, for the simple reason that said plaintiff took no further proceedings against said defendants. Plaintiff had already secured her judgment, and had the benefit of the denial of the motion for a new trial made by the defendants. The proposed appeal was not, of course, a proceeding against the defendants, but a proceeding by the defendants against the plaintiff.

If any authority were needed for a proposition that seems so plain, we may find it in the decision of the Supreme Court in Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 154 Pac. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D. 670. The question arose over a motion to dismiss an action because not brought to trial within five years, as provided by section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Plaintiff claimed that the five-year period was extended by reason of the death of said plaintiff's attorney, but the Supreme Court, in commenting upon said section 286, said:

"Clearly this section has no application here. It means no more than it plainly says, viz. that no proceedings may be had against him, no judgment or order or other step in the action taken, until he appoints an attorney, unless the prescribed notice be first given. The mere running of this five-year period, which had commenced to run prior to the death of Mr. Isaacs, was not a 'proceeding' had against the plaintiff, even under the very liberal definition given that term as used in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 43."

With equal propriety it may be said herein that the running of this 30-day period in which an application could be taken by Mr. Dower's clients was not and could not be extended by his death.

It is further to be observed that in the Larkin Case the Supreme Court expressed disapproval of the construction placed upon said section by the District Court of Appeal of the Second District in Troy Laundry Co. v. Drivers' Co., 13 Cal. App. 115, 109 Pac. 36.

[3] It necessarily follows that the notice of appeal filed by petitioners herein on June 8, 1920, was entirely ineffectual, and the appellate court would be without jurisdiction to review the cause upon its merits. The transcript, therefore, would be of no benefit to petitioners, and the court would not compel the clerk to perform the wholly idle and useless act of preparing a transcript that could not be available. In Spotton v. Superior Court, 177 Cal. 719, 171 Pac. 801, it is said:

"This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the settlement of a bill of exceptions to be used on appeal from final judgment. Unless there is an appeal on which the bill of exceptions can be used, mandate will not issue, for such a writ will not issue where it would be of no benefit to the applicant, or to enforce a mere abstract right, unattended by any substantial benefit to the petitioner. Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 147."

We think there is no doubt that the lower court was right in sustaining a demurrer to the petition, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA POWER CO., CONSOLIDATED, v. FLOOD.

(Sac. 2942.)

1. Waters and water courses ⊂=152(8)—Evidence of prescription sufficient.

In an action to quiet title to a water ditch and the right to divert water, evidence held sufficient to show that defendant acquired a prescriptive right against plaintiff to use water from such ditch and the right to the use of the ditch.

2. Waters and water courses ⊂=143—Prescription limited to quantity of water beneficially used.

The right to the use of water of a stream may be acquired as against others entitled thereto, by taking and beneficially using the same adversely and continuously, under a claim of right for five years, but such right extends only to the quantity put to beneficial use, and the fact that one has a ditch running through his land, which he keeps full of water diverted from a stream, gives him no right to such water, against others having rights therein, and the use of all the water in the ditch, or a specific portion thereof, for only part of the time, is insufficient to give title to that quantity continuously.

3. Frauds, statute of ⊂=129(8)—Parol sale of water right valid.

A parol sale of a quantity of water flowing in a ditch accompanied by payment and possession is valid.

4. Waters and water courses ⊂=154(1)—Water in ditch appurtenance to land.

Water running in a ditch from a natural stream to a parcel of land to be used for beneficial purposes thereon is a species of real property, and the right to take and so use it is an appurtenance to the land.

5. Waters and water courses ⊂=151—Prescriptive title not lost by nonuse for less than statutory period.

A prescriptive title to water in a ditch acquired by continuous use for five years is not lost by subsequent interruption for less than five years, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 811, 1007.

6. Waters and water courses ⊂=137—Continuity of use essential to prescription.

A right to the use of water for irrigation may be acquired by prescription without showing that it is actually running on the land all the time, but its use by claimant when necessary and under a claim of right, without molestation, and with the knowledge, actual or implied, of others interested, is sufficient with respect to continuity of use, though there may be days or weeks during which he does not use it at all; and if he has used it continuously for a certain period each day long enough to acquire a prescriptive right to such use, he has the right only for that period, and cannot object to the use of the flow by others during the intervening time.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; J. E. Barber, Judge.

Action by the Northern California Power Company, Consolidated, against Mollie Flood. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for appellant.

Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, John H. Tolan, of Oakland, and Albert C. Agnew, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The complaint states a cause of action to quiet title of the plaintiff in and to a certain water ditch known as the "Asbury ditch," and in and to the right to divert into said ditch from Mill Seat creek sufficient water to fill the ditch, and the right to use said water for beneficial purposes and carry the water in said ditch and its connecting waterways to the place of use.

The defendant in answer alleged that she was the owner of 160 acres of land and the owner of a right by prescription to use for beneficial purposes thereon one-fourth of the water diverted into and flowing in said ditch, and the right to maintain and use said ditch for the purpose of conducting that portion of the waters thereof from said creek to her said land.

The findings are that the plaintiff and defendant, as tenants in common, are the owners of said ditch and of the right to divert into the ditch the waters of Mill Seat creek to the extent of a flow of 1,400 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure; that defendant is the owner of the right to use one-fourth thereof, which is found by the court to be the equivalent of 350 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure, during the irrigating season of each year for beneficial purposes on her said land. It is further found that for 20 years next before the beginning of the action defendant and her predecessors in interest, under claim of right, and continuously during the irrigating season of each year, had used all of said 350 inches of water on said 160 acres of land now belonging to her, and that the use thereof was and is necessary for the proper cultivation of said land and for the raising of crops thereon. It further appears that the plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land known as the Myers place, situated on said ditch below the land of defendant, and that after the defendant had used so much of said 350 inches as she desired on her said land the surplus was allowed to run down the ditch for use on said Myers place. The evidence shows that the Myers place contains 200 acres of land.

The judgment declared that plaintiff and defendant were owners in common of the Asbury ditch, that plaintiff had the right to take all the waters therein, at all times, except that during the irrigating season of each year the defendant had the right to have flow down in said ditch through her land water from said creek amounting to 350 inches, as aforesaid, and to use said 350 inches on her land, but that she should allow whatever remained after such use to flow down the ditch to the said Myers place for the use of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff claims that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the defendant is the owner of or entitled to use the 350 inches of water as aforesaid.

[1] The evidence shows that the Asbury ditch, and its connecting waterways extended from a headgate on Mill Seat creek down to and through the land belonging to the defendant and from thence on down to, through, and beyond the said Myers place. Without detailing the evidence at length, it is sufficient to say that it shows that the defendant has acquired a prescriptive right against the plaintiff and its predecessors in interest to use water of said creek from said ditch on her land, and the right to the use of the ditch as a means of conveying said water from the headgate of the ditch in the creek to said land. The only important question on the point of her water right is as to the quantity of water to which she is entitled.

With respect to the quantity of water used by the defendant the evidence is altogether indefinite and uncertain. Indeed, there was no attempt to prove the use of any specific quantity of water for any particular time. The evidence was sufficient to show that the ditch running through the defendant's land was kept running full of water during the irrigating season, but how much thereof, or how many miner's inches thereof, was taken out by her and applied to her land was neither shown nor attempted to be shown. The evidence shows that the total amount of land irrigated for crops was 20 acres, including about 18 acres of alfalfa and an acre and a half of orchard. There was no use of the water other than for irrigation, watering stock, and domestic purposes. There is some evidence that when water was not used on the alfalfa or orchard it was allowed to run over some 8 or 10 acres of pasture land for the purpose of making the grass grow for pasture. There is nothing to the effect that these uses required that the 350 inches of water should flow out of the ditch and upon the fields during the whole season. The defendant seems to have assumed that a perfect right to the water could be established by proof that the ditch was kept running full during that period. There was no testimoney directed to the purpose of establishing the quantity of water taken and actually used on the land.

[2] The right to the use of waters of a stream may be acquired, as against others entitled thereto, by taking and beneficially using the same adversely and continuously under a claim of right for a period of five years. But in such a case the right, with respect to the quantity of water therein, extends only to the quantity actually put to a beneficial use. The fact that one has a ditch running through his land which he keeps full of water diverted from a stream does not give him any right to such water against others who have rights therein. In order to gain a right to the water the diverter must actually use it, and the quantity used measures the extent of his right. The use of all the water in the ditch, or a specific portion thereof, for only a part of the time, is not a sufficient use to give title to that quantity of water continuously. For example, if 20 acres of land requires irrigation once a month during the irrigating season and the entire flow of the ditch for two days is necessary to accomplish one irrigation, the fact that the claimant has used the water in that manner once a month during every irrigating season does not give him the right to the entire flow during the intervals of nonuse. If others are using the water during such intervals of nonuse by him, his right would include only one-fifteenth of the full flow of the ditch. We emphasize this point because we have found that in recent cases the question of the duty of water seems to have received very little attention. From comparison with many other cases on the subject, we are disposed to doubt whether a continuous flow of 17½ miner's inches of water for each acre irrigated can ever be necessary, or can ever be otherwise than excessive and wasteful.

There are some other questions which deserve notice.

[3, 4] The evidence tended to show that the water right of the defendant was acquired originally by one King from Asbury, the original appropriator, by a verbal agreement for the sale of 30 inches of the water flowing in the ditch, and that thereafter King and his successors in ownership of the Flood tract, claiming under said purchase, used upon the land such part of the waters flowing in the ditch as they deemed necessary from time to time, and that this use was made with the knowledge of Asbury and his successors. Such a use by King and his successors claiming under the verbal agreement would be adverse to Asbury and to others holding under him, and if continued uninterruptedly for five years it would create a prescriptive title to the quantity actually used, even if the sale of water by parol agreement were invalid. The evidence in this case indicates that a prescriptive title had been acquired in that manner. Such parol sale, however, is not invalid. Water running in a ditch from a natural stream to a parcel of land, to be used for beneficial purposes thereon, is a species of real property, and the right to take it and so use it is an appurtenance to the land. The purchase money for the thirty inches was paid in full, and King at once took possession of the right by taking and using the water in pursuance of the sale, and he and his grantees have ever since continued to do so, except as interrupted after the year 1909, by the wrongful acts of the plaintiff and its predecessors in interest. Consequently the defendant has a complete equitable title as against the plaintiff to the 30 inches so purchased by King from Asbury.

[5] With respect to the claim to a greater quantity it may be further stated that there was evidence of use for a period of five years, continued in such a manner as to create a prescriptive title. Such title would not be lost by subsequent interruption for less than five years. Such a right constituted a servitude upon the original title of Asbury, and the nonuse thereof would not extinguish it unless the nonuse continued for the period of five years. Civ. Code, § 811, subd. 4; Id. § 1007.

[6] A right to the use of water for irrigation of land may be acquired by prescription without showing that the water is actually kept running upon the land all the time. Irrigation, as usually practiced, is required only at intervals during the season. If the claimant takes the water and uses it at the time when it is necessary to do so and does this under claim of right, without molestation by others interested in the stream or ditch, and with their knowledge, actual or implied, it will be sufficient with respect to the continuity of use, although there may be many days or weeks during which he does not use it at all. The evidence leaves the question of the use of the water during the nighttime uncertain, not showing clearly whether the continuous use spoken of was during the day only or both day and night for the entire irrigating season. The value of water for irrigation is too great in this state to allow a landowner to gain a right thereto for the entire 24 hours of each day by using the same for only a half or any other portion of the time less than the whole. If he has used it continuously for a certain period each day long enough to gain a prescriptive right to such use, he would have the right only for that period, and he could not lawfully object to the use by others of the flow during the intervening time of each day.

The point is raised that the plaintiff is and has been applying the water to public use, and that the defendant has allowed that public use to be established and continued without objection for so long a time that she is now estopped to assert her own right to a part thereof and is limited to an action for damages, under the doctrine stated in Miller & Lux v. Enterprise, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 424, 147 Pac. 567, and cases there cited. The answer to this objection is that the evidence shows that she did object to the plaintiff's conduct in taking all of the water and has continued to object ever since it began, and has interrupted the plaintiff's use many times and appropriated to her own use the share of the water which she claims the right to use. While there is no express finding on the point, it is included in the general findings of ownership, and the complaint that the court did not find on this subject is without foundation.

We are satisfied with the conclusions of the court on all the points except as to the quantity of water to which the defendant is entitled. There is no necessity for a new trial of any other issue. Upon the going down of the remittitur the lower court is directed to proceed to try the issue as to the quantity of water to which the defendant has gained the right by prescription, or under the parol sale to King, or both, and when it shall have found the quantity to which she is so entitled to render judgment accordingly securing to her the right thus determined.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the court below, with directions to try the single issue above stated, and thereupon to render a new judgment upon that and the other findings in the cause.

186 Cal. 335

WHITE et al. v. RED MOUNTAIN FRUIT CO. (L. A. 6346.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1921.)

1. Carriers ⟸348(4)—Trial ⟸194(18)—Instruction on contributory negligence in suit for injuries in entering elevator held not confusing, and not on the weight of the evidence.

In an action for injuries on entering an elevator, an instruction that if plaintiff exercised the care of an ordinarily prudent person she was not guilty of contributory negligence, unless she were also guilty of some fault or negligence which contributed to the injury, was not erroneous, as being on the weight of the evidence, nor as charging that plaintiff's contributory negligence must be an act outside of stepping into the elevator.

2. Damages ⟸216(1)—Instruction not to consider, in fixing amount of verdict, whether defendant would appeal not erroneous.

In a personal injury suit, an instruction not to consider, in fixing the amount of the verdict, if for plaintiff, whether defendant would appeal did not amount to telling the jury not to hesitate to render a large verdict if they thought defendant would appeal, nor did it indicate the court believed the plaintiff entitled to such a verdict, the import of the instruction being that the jury should not return a smaller verdict than plaintiff was entitled to because defendant might appeal if it thought the sum too large.

3. Damages ⟸216(8)—Instruction not requiring finding plaintiff would have kept on working if not injured not error where no evidence to contrary.

In an action for injuries to a wife, where there was no evidence that she would not have continued working and earning wages if not injured, an instruction to allow the husband damages for wages lost and to be lost was not erroneous in not requiring a finding there was a reasonable certainty she would have kept on working, the reasonable inference from the fact that she was working at the time of the injury being that she would continue to do so.

4. Trial ⟸296(3)—Instruction responsibility of elevator operator is of highest character not inconsistent with one he is not insurer of safety, but bound to utmost care.

An instruction that the responsibility of passenger elevator operators is of the highest character was not inconsistent with one that they are not insurers of the absolute safety of passengers, in view of the rest of such instruction that they are bound to the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons, and are responsible for injury caused by the slightest neglect against which human care and foresight might have guarded.

5. Carriers ⟸321(21)—Instruction that plaintiff need not prove exactly the cause of accident if shown due to defective or negligently operated elevator not error as removing burden of proof.

An instruction that if plaintiff proved that while she was riding in defendant's elevator there was an accident, by reason of a defect therein, or in the operation thereof, she need not prove exactly the cause of the accident, was not erroneous, as removing the burden of proving negligence, it meaning simply that if plaintiff showed she was hurt by reason of such defect she need not show the exact cause of the accident.

6. Carriers ⟸321(21)—Instruction if plaintiff proved accident due to defect in or defective operation of elevator, burden on defendant to disprove negligence, correct.

An instruction that if plaintiff proved there was an accident to the elevator in which she was riding when injured, by reason of a defect therein, or in 'ts operation, the burden shifted to defendant to disprove negligence, by proof that the accident could not have been prevented by the exercise of the highest degree of care, was correct.

7. Trial ⟸296(11)—Instruction plaintiff need not present direct evidence of damages not reversible error, in view of other instructions to allow special damages.

An instruction that plaintiffs need not present direct evidence of their damages, but need only show the extent of their injuries, and that they were proximately caused by the accident, it being for the jury to determine the damages, was not erroneous as charging no evidence of the amount of special damages was required, in view of other instructions to allow sums incurred in employing physicians, nurses, etc.

8. Damages ⊂⊃216(1)—Instruction to allow damages for injuries if they hastened development of disease held correct.

An instruction that, if plaintiff's injuries hastened the development or increased the activity of a disease from which she was suffering, she was entitled to recover damages sustained from the injuries received, was not erroneous as charging that she could recover damages for the disease, the instruction meaning that she could recover for the damages done in hastening the development or increasing the activity of the disease.

9. Trial ⊂⊃133(2)—Effect of misconduct of counsel in asking question removed by admonition of court to disregard answer.

In a personal injury suit, the effect of misconduct of plaintiff's counsel, if any, in asking plaintiff on redirect examination if he had said that it was on behalf of a company that a doctor came to see him, to which he answered in the affirmative, was removed by the court's admonition to the jury to disregard the answer.

10. Carriers ⊂⊃346(1)—Evidence held insufficient to establish contributory negligence in stepping into elevator.

Evidence held insufficient to show that plaintiff, injured by an elevator starting up as she stepped into it, was guilty of contributory negligence.

11. Carriers ⊂⊃347(4)—Question of negligence in not observing whether elevator platform even with floor held for jury.

It is not negligence, as a matter of law, for one invited to enter an elevator by the opening of the door to step down a foot, nor to step into it without observing whether the platform is exactly even with the floor, the care required being for the jury.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Meyers, Judge.

Action by Evelyn C. White and husband against the Red Mountain Fruit Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone and Daniel Hunsaker, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. The plaintiffs are husband and wife, and recovered a judgment against the defendant for personal injuries suffered by the wife as she was entering an elevator operated by the defendant in a building owned by it, the gravamen of the asserted cause of action being the negligence of the defendant in the maintenance and operation of the elevator. The defendant appeals, and urges three grounds for reversal, namely: That the trial court erred in certain instructions to the jury; that plaintiffs' counsel was guilty of misconduct in the course of the trial; and that the evidence shows that the plaintiff injured had been guilty of contributory negligence.

[1] As to the instructions complained of, we might say preliminarily that, so far from their being open to criticism, they seem to us models of concise and lucid statement to the jury of the issues which they were to determine and the rules of law applicable thereto. The first instruction complained of is as follows:

"The plaintiff Evelyn C. White was only required to exercise ordinary care at the time and place in controversy—that is, she was required to only use the care that an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances, and if she exercised such care then she was not guilty of contributory negligence, and you will so find; for it is no defense to this action that the said plaintiff by her own act in attempting to get into the elevator has contributed to the injury, but it must also appear that she was guilty of some fault or negligence, and that such fault or negligence, if any, has contributed to the happening of the accident."

The criticism made of this instruction is that it is one upon the weight of the evidence, and that it is confusing, contradictory, and misleading in that it directs the jury that the only fault or negligence on the part of the plaintiff which would be contributory negligence would be some act on her part outside that of stepping into the elevator. We think it apparent, from a reading of the instruction, that it is not in fact one upon the weight of the evidence. We think it also plain, from a reading, that it was not an instruction that the contributory negligence which would bar a recovery on the part of the plaintiff had to be some act on her part outside of her act in stepping into the elevator. The point of the instruction was that the mere act of stepping into the elevator would not, in and of itself, bar a recovery, but there had to be some negligence on the plaintiff's part, either in the doing of this act or in some other way. This, of course, is the law. It is also claimed that the instruction is inconsistent with other instructions given on the subject of contributory negligence, but the contention likewise proceeds upon the assumption that the instruction was one to the effect that the only fault or negligence on the plaintiff's part which would bar a recovery would be some act outside of her act in stepping into the elevator. This assumption is without foundation, and the inconsistency asserted does not in fact exist.

[2] The second instruction complained of is as follows:

"If you find for the plaintiffs, then, in fixing the amount of your verdict in this case, you should not consider whether the same is large or small, so far as the number of dollars is concerned, and neither should you consider whether or not if you fixed a certain amount the defendant would appeal or would not appeal, because that is not a matter of any concern to you, and is not one of the questions submitted to you, it being your duty alone to apply the law as given to you by the court to the facts proven in the case, and then, if you shall find for the plaintiffs, bring in a verdict in such an amount as will reasonably and fairly compensate the plaintiffs for the damage done to them, and each of them, and when you have done that you have performed all the duty that is required of you in this case."

It is said of this instruction that it amounted to telling the jury that they should not hesitate to render a large verdict if they thought the defendant might appeal. We do not so read it. What it did tell the jury was that they should not return a smaller verdict than the plaintiff was properly entitled to as compensation, because of the fact that the defendant might apeal if the sum the jury thought the plaintiffs were entitled to as compensation were large, and they should bring in a verdict for that amount. It is also said of the instruction that it might indicate to the jury that the court believed the plaintiff entitled to recover a large verdict. We can find no such indication in it. Just what the occasion was which called for the giving of this instruction is not brought to our attention, and ordinarily, of course, there would be no occasion for it; but it is not asserted that there was no occasion, and that the instruction was correct does not admit of serious question.

[3] The third instruction criticized reads as follows:

"If you shall conclude that plaintiffs should recover herein, and if you further find that Evelyn C. White before the accident in controversy was earning wages, and shall further believe that she was unable for any length of time after said accident to earn said wages, and will be unable in the future for any length of time to earn the same wages by reason of any injuries received in the accident in controversy here, then I instruct you that you may find for the plaintiff Carl A. White such sum in damages as will reasonably and fairly compensate for such loss of wages, and in addition thereto you will allow him such sum as the evidence shows he has necessarily and reasonably expended or incurred in employing physicians and surgeons to treat the injuries of his said wife, together with any reasonable and necessary amount of money paid to any nurse or nurses for caring for her said injuries, in all not exceeding the amount alleged in the complaint, to wit, $965."

It is not questioned that the plaintiff's husband was entitled to recover, if entitled to recover at all, for the wages which his wife had lost, and for the wages which it reasonably appeared she would lose in the future, but the instruction is criticized because it does not instruct the jury that before they could allow compensation for loss of wages they should find that there was a reasonable certainty that the wife would have kept on working if she had not been hurt, and would have continued to earn wages. The fact of the matter was that the wife was actually working and earning wages at the time she was hurt, and every reasonable inference is that she would have kept on doing so except for the injury. No evidence justifying a contrary inference is brought to our notice, and, this being the situation, the injection into the instruction of the element which the defendant claims was erroneously omitted would have been the injection of an element for which there was no support in the evidence.

[4] The fourth instruction complained of reads:

"Although not insurers of the absolute safety of the passengers, they [persons operating passenger elevators] are bound to the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons, as far as human care and foresight can go, and are responsible for injury occasioned by the slightest neglect against which human care and foresight might have guarded. The responsibility is proportioned to the danger, and is of the highest character in the case of those who operate elevators for lifting persons from one level to another."

It is said of this instruction that the portion to the effect that the responsibility of one operating an elevator for the carriage of passengers is "of the highest character" is inconsistent with the first portion of the instruction to the effect that such persons are not insurers of the absolute safety of the passengers, the argument being that the highest character of responsibility is that of an absolute insurer. This criticism is hypercritical in the extreme. The responsibility which was referred to in the latter portion of the instruction is very plainly that responsibility for the exercise of the care which is referred to in the first portion.

[5] The fifth instruction complained of reads:

"You are instructed that it is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove exactly the cause of the accident to the plaintiff, Evelyn C. White, while being carried by the defendant in its elevator at the time and on the occasion in controversy here, but it is only necessary, in law, for them to prove the allegations of their complaint that she was thus being carried, and while thus being carried there was an accident to the elevator in which she was riding by reason of some defect in the elevator or its machinery, or appliances, or in the operation thereof, and when this accident is thus proved, the burden shifts upon the defendant to show that it was not guilty of negligence by proof that the accident could not have been prevented by the exercise of the highest degree of care and prudence on its part, or that said accident was caused by inevitable casualty, accident, or misfortune, or some other cause which human care, judgment, and foresight could not prevent."

The first criticism of this instruction is in its use of the word "exactly" italicized above. The ground of the criticism is not plainly expressed, but apparently it is that the effect of the use of this word was to remove from the plaintiff the burden of proving negligence. But this was plainly not the effect of the instruction. The instruction was simply that, if the plaintiff showed that she was hurt through an accident to the elevator by reason of some defect in it or the appliances connected with it, or by reason of its defective operation, she did not have to show the exact cause of the accident. It needs no authority to support the proposition that this is a correct statement of the law.

[6] The second criticism of the instruction is of that portion to the effect that, upon plaintiff's showing that she was hurt by reason of some defect in the elevator or its appliances, or by its defective operation, the burden is shifted to the defendant to show that it was not guilty of negligence by proof that the accident could not have been prevented by the exercise of the highest degree of care on its part. In support of his criticism, counsel cites the opinion of this court reported in 40 Cal. App. 689, 181 Pac. 669, denying a rehearing of Bourguignon v. Peninsular Ry. Co., 40 Cal. App. 689, 181 Pac. 669. An examination, however, of the opinion referred to shows that it lays down the exact rule contained in the instruction under discussion. We would say, also, that this rule is so familiar and has been so repeatedly laid down that it is no longer open to reasonable question.

[7] The sixth instruction complained of reads:

"The law does not require that the plaintiffs present any direct evidence to show the amount of damages which they have sustained in this behalf, or the amount of money which would compensate for the injuries the said Evelyn C. White has received; all that is necessary in this behalf is to show to the jury the extent of her injuries, if any, and that they were proximately caused by the accident; then it is for the jury to determine, under all the evidence and in the manner I have indicated, the amount of damages which ought to be awarded to plaintiffs therefor."

It is not contended that this instruction is not correct so far as general damages caused by the injury to the plaintiff wife are concerned. The complaint is that it in effect charged the jury that no evidence of the amount of special damages, such as doctor's bills, medicines, nurses' hire, and the like, was necessary. Suffice it to say that when the instruction is taken in connection with the other instructions given (see, for example, the third instruction discussed herein) it is not open to any such interpretation.

[8] The seventh, and last, instruction complained of reads:

"If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff, Evelyn C. White, received any of the injuries alleged in the complaint solely by reason of the defendant's negligence, and you further find that at the time of the reception of said injuries said plaintiff was suffering from some disease or ailment or malady, to wit, hyperthyroidism, and you further find that said injury hastened the development of such disease or increased the activity thereof, and that thereby said plaintiff's present condition, whatever you find that to be, has resulted from such injury, then I charge you that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover such damages as you may determine she has sustained from the injuries, or any of them, received in the accident."

The criticism made of this instruction is that it in effect told the jury that if the plaintiff at the time of the accident was suffering from a disease, the plaintiff, as a part of her damages, if she was entitled to any, was entitled to recover damages for the disease. The instruction cannot be so read. It simply charges the jury that, if the plaintiff was suffering from a disease at the time of the accident, and the accident hastened the development or increased the activity of the disease, the plaintiff, if entitled to recover, was entitled to recover for the damages done by the accident in thus hastening the development or increasing the activity of the disease. This was a correct statement of the law. Campbell v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 137 Cal. 567, 70 Pac. 624.

[9] The alleged misconduct of plaintiffs' counsel consists in his having asked this question upon the redirect examination of the plaintiff husband: "Is it not a fact that Dr. Ryder came up there on behalf of a company—you said company?" to which the witness answered, "That is it exactly." The question and answer were immediately objected to, the asking of the question assigned as misconduct, and the court instructed the jury to disregard the statement of the witness. It is not necessary to determine whether there was, in fact, any misconduct on the part of plaintiffs' counsel, although perhaps, in justice to him, we should say that the circumstances under which the question was asked tend strongly to negative any such conclusion; but, assuming that the asking of the question was misconduct, it is yet evident that it was by no means of such a serious nature that it may be taken that its effect was not removed by the admonition of the court. Williamson v. Hardy, 190 Pac. 646.

[10] The point that the evidence showed that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence was based upon the testimony of the plaintiff wife. The contention is that this testimony shows that she was warned to wait before stepping into the elevator, that she knew that the floor of the elevator was not even with the landing, and that it was negligence on her part to step into the elevator under these conditions. The testimony, however, does not necessitate any such conclusion as counsel contends for. What happened, as related by the plaintiff wife, was that, as she was waiting for the elevator, the elevator stopped at the floor, the door opened, and she started to step in; the operator said, "Wait," the elevator started up, and she was hurt. She also testified that, at the time she stepped in, the elevator platform was a foot or a little more below the floor, and that she did not observe this until she was in the act of stepping in. The opening of the door was, of course, an invitation for her to enter, and it is apparent that the jury were at liberty to find that the warning from the operator was not given in time for her to obey it.

[11] Neither are we prepared to say that it is negligence as a matter of law for a person invited to enter an elevator by the opening of the door either to step down a foot or so for that purpose or to step into the elevator without observing whether the platform is exactly even with the floor. What reasonable care required of the plaintiff under the circumstances was, at best, a question for the jury to determine.

Judgment affirmed.

In re BRIGGS' ESTATE.

BRIGGS et al. v. BRIGGS.

(L. A. 6614.)

186 Cal. 351

(Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1921. Rehearing Denied July 25, 1921.)

1. Wills ⟹470—Intention gathered from construction of entire will.

At common law, and under Civ. Code, § 1321, requiring that all the parts of a will be construed in relation to each other so as to form, if possible, one consistent whole, the testator's intention must be gathered from a construction of the entire will.

2. Wills ⟹602, 603(3)—Bequest to two sons, portion of one dying childless to pass to survivor, held to create limited fee.

Testatrix had two married sons, one childless, the other having children and grandchildren. To them she bequeathed her residuary estate in equal parts, but in another clause of the same paragraph expressed her desire that if the childless son died without issue, one-half his portion should revert to the other, and the rest to her great-grandchildren. Held, it being her apparent intention to keep the residuum among her lineal descendants, the intent of the entire paragraph was that the childless son should take his share subject to the condition that if he died childless, it should go to his brother and the other residuary legatees; neither clause being complete in itself, but together creating a limited fee.

3. Wills ⟹104—Words "desire," "revert," and "his portion" construed.

Where a testatrix bequeathed the balance of her estate to her two sons in equal parts and in another clause of the same paragraph stipulated that in the event one should die without issue, "I desire one-half his portion to revert to" the other, such second clause was sufficiently clear and distinct, the word "desire" in connection with the words used in the first clause equally well expressing her testamentary disposition, and being as clear as "bequeath," the word "revert," though technically incorrect, being merely an expression of her intention that the property should "go" to the survivor, and the expression "his portion" referring to the property to be given over to the other legatees in case the son should die childless, or the property be received under the will.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Desire; Portion; Revert.]

4. Wills ⟹467—"Desire" of testatrix held mandatory, being addressed to law, not to legatee.

Where a testatrix expressed her "desire" that if one of two sons to whom she bequeathed her residuary estate died without issue his share should go to the other son and her great-grandchildren, such expression was mandatory, words in a will expressing a mere desire being precatory only if addressed to the legatee, but mandatory if addressed to the law or decedent's personal representative, or standing alone as an expression of testatrix's desire.

5. Wills ⟹545(3)—Will, providing that if devisee died without issue his share should pass to others, held to mean death at any time before or after testatrix's death, thus creating limited fee only.

Where a testatrix in one clause bequeathed her residuary estate to her two sons in equal parts, and in another provided that if one of the sons, who was childless, died without issue, one-half his portion should revert to his brother and the other to testatrix's great-grandchildren, the latter clause was not intended to be substitutive, in the event the precedent gift lapsed on the donee's death without issue during testatrix's lifetime, the reference being to death at any time, the happening or nonhappening of the contingency determining the result; Civ. Code, § 1336, declaring that words in a will referring to death or survivorship "simply" shall relate to the time of the testator's death, being inapplicable to death on a contingency.

Angellotti, C. J., and Olney, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Petition by Charles T. Briggs for partial distribution of the estate of Hortense E. Briggs, deceased. From an order granting the petition, Fordyce W. Briggs and other legatees appeal. Reversed.

Rehearing denied in bank; ANGELLOTTI, C. J., and SHURTLEFF, J., dissenting.

Harold M. Sawyer and Alfred T. Cluff, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

George R. Freeman, of Corona, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by certain legatees of Hortense E. Briggs, deceased, from an order granting a petition of Charles T. Briggs, another legatee, for partial distribution.

Decedent died, leaving a will, in which she made certain bequests. The balance of her estate was left to her two adult sons, the said Charles T. Briggs and Fordyce W. Briggs, under the following clause, which constituted the fourth paragraph of the will:

"The balance of my estate I bequeath to my two sons Charles T. Briggs of Corona and Fordyce W. Briggs of Santa Ana, to be equally divided between them— In the event my son Charles dies without issue I desire one-half his portion to revert to my son Fordyce W. Briggs and one-half to be equally divided between my great-grandchildren."

The will was admitted to probate. In due course the said Charles T. Briggs petitioned the court for partial distribution to him absolutely of certain property of the estate under the said fourth paragraph of the will. The petition was granted, and this appeal is taken from the order. The sole question presented on appeal is the proper construction of the said fourth paragraph of the will.

The contention of appellants is thus stated:

"The fourth paragraph gives respondent a fee in half of the residuum of the property, but the gift over creates a conditional limitation on that fee, making the same a base or limited fee, subject to be terminated upon respondent's death without issue, and upon such termination the property vests in appellant Fordyce W. Briggs, and in the great-grandchildren of the testatrix living at the date of such termination."

Respondent contends in effect that this is a misinterpretation of the fourth paragraph, which, he insists, is to be read as two separate clauses. He claims that by this paragraph he is given an equal portion and an equal interest in the estate with Fordyce W. Briggs, and that on the death of the testatrix he took an undivided one-half of the estate in fee simple absolute. In support of this position he argues: First, that it was the intention of the testatrix that he should have an equal undivided one-half interest in the fee simple with Fordyce, and that she clearly states this intention in the first clause of the paragraph; second, that the second clause of the paragraph is contradictory, inconsistent, and repugnant to the first, and cannot be given effect because it is in opposition to the fee plainly given in the first clause; third, that the first clause of the paragraph is a clear devise and bequest, that the second clause is not equally clear and distinct, and that the first clause cannot be affected by inference or argument from other parts of the will, or by parts not equally clear and distinct—the second clause is indistinct because of the uncertainty of the meaning of the words "desire" and "revert," and the uncertainty of what would be meant by "his portion" which would have to be paid over to the other legatees in case Charles should die childless; fourth, that the second clause is precatory and not mandatory; and, fifth, that the second clause is substitutive—that the gift over was intended as a substitutionary scheme in case the precedent gift to Charles lapsed; in other words, the expression "dies without issue" refers only to his death in the lifetime of the testatrix.

For the purposes of his brief respondent divides the paragraph into two clauses which he designates as "clause 1" and "clause 2," respectively. It is upon this segregation of the paragraph that respondent bases his interpretation of the will. He claims that it was the intention of the testatrix he should have an equal estate in fee simple with Fordyce under the first clause, and that the second would not cut down the estate given by the first.

[1, 2] In our opinion, when the entire paragraph is considered together, it becomes plain that the intention of the testatrix was that Charles should take his share subject to the condition that if he died childless it should go to Fordyce and the other appellants. Respondent's contention that the first clause shows the intention of the testatrix to be to give him a fee simple absolute ignores the rule that the intention must be gathered from a construction of the entire will. Adams v. Prather, 176 Cal. 33, 167 Pac. 534; Colton v. Colton, 127 U. S. 300, 8 Sup. Ct. 1164, 32 L. Ed. 138. In interpreting a will all the parts are to be construed in relation to each other and so as, if possible, to form one consistent whole. Section 1321, Civ. Code. It is unquestioned that, considered by itself, the first clause would show an intention to vest the fee to one-half of the residuum in Charles absolutely, but it is equally plain that the addition of the second clause shows the testatrix intended to limit the estate. This view finds support in the surrounding circumstances. Charles was 55 years of age, and Fordyce was 3 years younger. Both were married. Fordyce had living children and grandchildren. Charles had been married about 16 years and was childless. Considering these circumstances, it might naturally follow that by the language used the testatrix intended to keep the residuum among her lineal descendants. Respondent argues that because she entertained feelings of equal affection for her two sons and always treated them alike in property matters, she intended to treat them alike in all respects at her death. She did provide that they should equally enjoy her bounty during their lives. The only difference was that she denied Charles the right to testamentary disposition, but only if he died childless. It seems to us that the apparent intention to keep the residuum among her lineal descendants can account, as no other fact or circumstance does, for this distinction. Proceeding upon this theory, the intention we have deduced from the will naturally follows. In our opinion the testatrix intended that the half of the residuum given to Charles was conditional upon his leaving children.

In support of his contention that the second clause is repugnant to the first, in that it is contradictory and inconsistent, respondent argues that the testatrix by the first clause created an absolute estate; that the second clause in cutting down the estate becomes repugnant to the first clause which creates it absolutely. We think the effect of the second clause is not to cut down an absolute estate which may have been created by the first, but merely expresses one phrase of her testamentary intention. Neither clause is complete within itself, but together they create a limited fee. The language employed clearly expresses the intention of the testatrix that Charles should take a fee in the property subject to a limitation or condition, and is not open to any other construction.

[3] Nor is the expression of the testatrix's intention contained in the second clause open to the objection that it is not "clear and distinct." In Estate of Tooley, 170 Cal. 164, 149 Pac. 574, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 516, a similar question was presented. The will in that case read:

"I give all my property at my death to my daughter Logan Mattie Tooley.

"If at her death she has neither husband or children, I desire any property that may be left divided equally among my sisters and brother."

Of the contention that the words of the second paragraph were not as clear and distinct as those of the first, and consequently could not cut down the distinct devise contained in the first, the court said:

"In view of these authorities it cannot be said that the words of the second paragraph of the will are not equally clear and distinct as those of the first paragraph. We think no case can be found in which a will indicating a disposition of property by the word 'desire' or 'wish' had been held not to be sufficient to constitute a will. The meaning of the word, when used in such connection in a will, is as clear as that of any other word in the language."

In the case here, although the testatrix used the technical word "bequeath" in the first clause, the word "desire," used in the second, in connection with the words she has used in the first, equally well expresses her testamentary intention, and is equally as clear as the word "bequeath."

While the estate could not technically "revert" to a third person, nevertheless the use of that word does not render the meaning of the second clause any less plain. In a similar case, where the word "revert" was employed, it was said:

"The legacy had never been the property of the children thus designated, and, consequently, could not technically revert to them, and his use of this word was merely an expression of his intention that it should 'go' to them." Estate of Bennett, 134 Cal. 320, 66 Pac. 370.

The expression "his portion," referring to the property to be given over to the other legatees in case Charles should die childless, means the property he receives under the will, when such estate is determined by a consideration of the entire instrument. The fact that it is referred to as his portion does not destroy the condition, for the portion may be his and still be subject to the limitation imposed by the will.

[4] It is true that words in a will expressing a mere desire are to be considered as precatory if addressed to the legatee. On the other hand, if the wish is addressed to the law, or to the personal representative of the decedent, or stands alone as an expression of the testator's desires, the word is mandatory. Estate of Tooley, supra; Board, etc., v. Culp, 151 Pa. 467, 25 Atl. 117. In this case the testatrix does not request the legatee to do anything. She wants the estate to go to Fordyce and her great-grandchildren if Charles dies without issue, and she merely states that desire. The expression of intention must therefore be regarded as mandatory.

[5] The contention that the second clause is substitutive is based on section 1336 of the Civil Code, which declares:

"Words in a will referring to death or survivorship, simply, relate to the time of the testator's death, unless possession is actually postponed, when they must be referred to the time of possession."

In Estate of Carothers, 161 Cal. 588, 119 Pac. 926, it was held:

"It is important to notice that the rule as stated in the Civil Code applies only where there are words 'referring to death or survivorship, simply.' The will of Carothers does not refer to the death of William 'simply.' It refers to his death 'without issue,' a contingency which may never happen. We have no provision of our Code declaring what the rule should be where the words refer to death upon a contingency. * * * If there is nothing in the context or in the surrounding circumstances to indicate either, then the ordinary meaning of the words is that the reference is to death at any time it may occur, and that the happening or not happening of the contingency is to determine the result."

The death of Charles, to effect the limitation of the estate, must be upon a contingency—he must die without issue. The same contingency was declared in Estate of Carothers, supra, not to be death, simply, within the meaning of the Civil Code. There is nothing in the context or the circumstances here to indicate a contrary intention on the part of the testatrix, so the words must be taken to refer to death at any time.

Respondent has founded an argument upon a comparison of the will at bar with those in other cases, but in view of the interpretation we have given the paragraph herein, it will serve no purpose to further consider the point.

The order is reversed.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I dissent. I am confident that if the testatrix could meet her olographic will clad in the construction given to it by the majority opinion, she would not recognize it. In any event she would feel that she had been extremely inadequate in attempting to express her intention as to the disposition of her estate in such a manner that it would be carried into effect by the courts.

To me it seems perfectly clear, from the words of the will and the circumstances under which it was made, that it was her intention, expressed therein, that each of her two sons, who were her only children and heirs at law, should take as his own, absolutely and unconditionally, one-half of the residue of her estate (which was of the value of over $125,000, and consisted almost entirely of personal property), after the payment of a $2,000 legacy to her "old home church," and that the expressed desire contingent on the death of Charles without issue was nothing more than the expression of a mere wish or desire on the part of the testatrix, intended to be and in effect addressed to Charles himself, to be complied with or not as he might determine. The effect of the decision is practically to give to Charles only a life estate in so far as any enjoyment or control by him of the property during his lifetime is concerned, for until the very moment of his death it cannot be determined with certainty that his interest amounts to anything more. If he does die without issue, the estate bequeathed to him is ended. And all this in the face of the obvious desire on the part of the mother to divide her valuable estate (except for the $2,000 legacy) equally between her two sons, and the apparently clear and distinct bequest to them of "the balance of my estate * * * to be equally divided between them."

I am constrained to admit that in material respects the will here is the same as the will involved in Estate of Tooley, 170 Cal. 164, 149 Pac. 574, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 516. I endeavored in my opinion filed therein, in dissenting from the order denying a rehearing after decision in department, to briefly state what I considered the basic fault in the department opinion, and what I said there is equally applicable here, and sufficiently shows for all the purposes of a dissenting opinion my reasons for dissent herein.

HOLMES et al. v. NAY et al. (S. F. 9330.)

1. Waters and water courses ⊂127—No prescription by diversion below riparian land.

By diversion below riparian land, no rights superior to the riparian rights incident to the land are acquired by prescription.

2. Waters and water courses ⊂7—Federal act validates diversions invading government's rights.

Under the Act Cong. July 26, 1866, § 9 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4647), the government did not release its rights as riparian owner in favor of one diverting water below the government's land, the act being intended simply to validate such diversions as invaded the government's rights as riparian owner.

3. Waters and water courses ⊂47—Nonriparian use.

The diversion of water from a stream on one tract of land to a lower tract for use there is not permitted as an incident of the ownership of the former tract.

4. Waters and water courses ⊂42—Riparian use reasonable amount.

Though the owner of a tract of land to which he diverted water from another tract, below which point of diversion another party had theretofore diverted water, had no right to use the water on such tract, a judgment enjoining him from making any diversion whatever above the point of the other party's diversion was too broad; he having the right as owner of the tract from which the water was diverted to divert a reasonable amount thereof for use on that tract.

5. Easements ⊂16—Purchaser of part of estate takes with benefits and burdens as between it and part vendor retains.

Where the owner of two tenements sells one, or the owner of an estate sells a portion of it, the purchaser takes with all the benefits and burdens appearing at the time of the sale to belong to such portion as between it and the property the vendor retains.

6. Easements ⟸14(1) — Rights reserved in grantor by implication only where grantee knew or should have known such was intention.

Where the owner of land conveys it fully and without reservations, rights are reserved in the grantor by implication only where the circumstances clearly indicate that the grantee knew or should have known that such was the real intention of the grantor.

7. Waters and water courses ⟸156(5)—Riparian rights conveyed by deed.

A deed conveying a part of a tract of land without reserving any riparian rights conveys all such rights, though grantor was openly and visibly diverting water at a point below such land, the rule that, where an owner sells a portion of a tract of land, the purchaser takes it with all the burdens appearing to belong to it as between it and the property the vendor retains, being inapplicable where the diversion was at a point below such land.

8. Waters and water courses ⟸156(5) — Rights of riparian owners under various deeds determined.

A grantor conveyed land to F., granting him the right to one-half the water from a stream flowing by it, but reserving to himself the right to take from the water diverted by F. one inch for use on a tract which he subsequently deeded to B. without granting the incidental riparian rights, and two inches for use on other lands subsequently acquired by H. Thereafter N. acquired title to land across the stream from F.'s land and above B.'s land, and, from the stream at a point on a tract above such land he diverted water for use on his newly acquired land, thus interfering with diversions theretofore made below such point of diversion on F.'s, B.'s and H.'s land. Held B. and H. could complain of any diversion by M. whereby the diversion under F.'s grant of one-half of the natural flow of the stream was prevented so as to deprive them of their one and two inches, and that, as to the other one-half B., H., and N. were riparian owners, entitled to have the use of the water for stock, domestic, and irrigation purposes on their riparian lands reasonably apportioned between them.

9. Waters and water courses ⟸78—Riparian owner may divert water above his land.

The owner of riparian land is not required, so far as a lower riparian owner is concerned, to make a diversion of water on his land, but can make it above, provided no unreasonable loss of water is caused thereby.

10. Waters and water courses ⟸78—Riparian owner may divert water from main stream to land in watershed of branch.

A riparian owner may divert water from a main stream at a point on his land and use it on land in the watershed of a branch stream which flows into the main stream before the latter reaches the land of lower riparian owners, the rule that the riparian owner may not convey and use water outside the watershed of the stream being inapplicable, when not used outside the watershed of the stream as it passes the lower riparian lands.

11. Waters and water courses ⟸64—Upper riparian owner may not pollute water.

A lower riparian owner may complain of the muddying and pollution of water by an upper riparian owner, except in so far as it is a reasonably necessary incident of the latter's use of the water, under the maxim, "sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas," but a manner of use which would not be unreasonable as between strangers might be so as between riparian owners on the same stream.

12. Waters and water courses ⟸79—Diversion limited to beneficial use.

No one may divert water otherwise than for a beneficial use even under a grant of such right.

13. Waters and water courses ⟸78—Upper riparian owner may not complain of wastage by lower riparian owner.

Since no one may complain of an unlawful diversion unless he is injured thereby, and a riparian owner is not injured by a diversion below his land and his own point of diversion, a lower riparian owner may complain of any wastage of water by an upper riparian owner, but the latter may not complain of wastage by the former.

14. Waters and water courses ⟸79—Riparian rights not affected by diversion for other than beneficial purposes.

In apportioning the use of water between riparian owners, it is the reasonable use or the possibility thereof for beneficial purposes that alone should be considered, so that a share to which one is entitled cannot be affected by the diversion by another of water not used for beneficial purposes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmett Seawell, Judge.

Suit by William F. Holmes and another against H. L. Nay and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

Lyman Harford, of Orland, and J. T. Campbell and Geary & Geary, all of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment enjoining them from diverting any of the water from a stream known as Yellow Jacket creek, except such as is diverted for stock and domestic use, and also from muddying and polluting the stream. Of the two defendants, one was but an employee or tenant of the other, Nay, and had no rights in the water except in that capacity. We may, then, treat the case as one involving only the respective rights of the two plaintiffs, Holmes and Bernard, on the one side, and the defendant Nay on the other.

The stream rises in a considerable spring on a 101-acre tract belonging to Nay, and which was public land when he acquired it, and flows southwesterly across this land to the boundary line of what was formerly a single large tract constituting what is commonly known as a Spanish or Mexican grant; that is, a tract granted to private owners by the government of California before California was separated from Mexico. The stream, on reaching the grant line, continues southwesterly across the grant, flowing between and constituting the boundary line between a subdivision of the tract on the northwest side of the stream owned by one Folker, and two subdivisions on the southeast side, owned by the defendant Nay and the plaintiff Bernard, respectively; that owned by Nay being the one higher up on the stream. The land of the plaintiff Holmes is also a part of the grant and riparian to the stream, but some distance further down. Nay, in other words, is the owner of two tracts, first, one on which the stream rises and which was formerly public land, and another below it, which is riparian to the stream and was formerly a part of a larger tract, of which the lands of the two plaintiffs were also a part. At a point on the upper tract Nay diverted water from the stream and conveyed it to the lower tract for use there. It is this diversion which brought on the present litigation. The respective rights of Nay as the owner of these two tracts are quite distinct and should be treated separately. As we have already stated sufficient of the facts to determine his rights as the owner of the tract which was formerly government land, we may as well take up their discussion at this point.

[1] This tract is, of course, riparian to the stream. As a result of this fact, Nay has the rights of riparian owner, unless in some way they have been lost. The claim of the plaintiffs is that those rights were lost by reason of the fact that long before Nay acquired it and it ceased to be public land, the predecessor in interest of the plaintiffs had diverted all the stream at a point below and put it to beneficial use, and that such diversion and use have been continuously maintained ever since. It is, however, settled law in this state that by a diversion below riparian lands no rights superior to the riparian rights incident to the land are acquired by prescription. Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 72, 41 Pac. 18, 30 L. R. A. 390; Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158; Cave v. Tyler, 133 Cal. 566, 65 Pac. 1089; Walker v. Lillington, 137 Cal. 401, 70 Pac. 282. The reason for this rule is that a riparian owner is not concerned with what is done with the water after it passes his land, and he cannot complain of any diversion made below, and, since he cannot complain, no rights can be acquired by prescription because he does not complain.

[2] But it is claimed by the plaintiffs that, because the defendant's land was public land at the time the diversion was made, those making the diversion below acquired, by virtue of section 9 of the act of Congress of July 26, 1866 (14 Stat. 253 [U. S. Comp. St. § 4647]), a right superior to the riparian rights incident to the land; in other words, that by this statute the government released or ceded its rights as riparian owner in favor of any one taking water from the stream, even one taking it entirely below the land of the government. But the question so presented as to the effect of the act of Congress was also presented in Cave v. Tyler, 133 Cal. 566, 65 Pac. 1089, and there decided directly contrary to the contention of the plaintiffs. It is unnecessary to repeat the discussion found in the opinion in that case. Suffice it to say that the reasoning of the opinion is, in brief, that the act of Congress was intended simply to validate such appropriations or diversions as constituted an invasion of the government's rights as a riparian owner, and that, since a diversion below its lands did not constitute an invasion of its rights and was something of which the government could not complain, there was no release or cession of its rights under the statute mentioned. This decision is conclusive as to the point that the defendant in the present case has still the riparian rights incident to the ownership of the 101-acre tract he acquired from the government. Such rights, of course, include the right to a reasonable use of the water of the stream on any portion of the tract which is riparian to it, but not elsewhere, for stock, domestic, and irrigation purposes.

[3, 4] It should be said, however, that the use to which Nay was putting the water, a use not on the 101-acre tract, but on the tract below it, was not a use permitted as an incident of the ownership of the 101-acre tract, and that his right to such use must depend upon whatever rights he may have as the owner of the tract to which the water is conveyed and where it is used. But, assuming for the moment that, as the owner of the latter tract, the defendant had no right to use the water upon it, so that the plaintiffs had the right to enjoin such use, the judgment against the defendant is yet too broad. It does not enjoin such use, but, with a minor exception not here material, it enjoins the defendant from making any diversion whatever above the point of the plaintiffs' diversion. The defendant, however, as the owner of the 101-acre tract, had the right to divert a reasonable amount of the water for use on that tract, if at any time in the future he should desire to do so, and the judgment should not, as it does, foreclose him from the exercise of this right.

[5-7] Coming now to the question of the defendant's rights as owner of the tract which was formerly a part of the Mexican grant, it is evident that, since the land is riparian to the stream, the defendant has the right to a reasonable use thereon of the water of the stream unless in some way the riparian rights, which are an incident of the ownership of the land, have been lost. It is also evident that these rights have not been lost by prescription. This is evident because the plaintiffs' point of diversion is below even this part of the defendant's land, so that the case comes within the rule already stated that a diversion below riparian lands gives no right by prescription against the riparian rights incident to the land, for the simple reason that such taking is not an invasion of those rights.

Since the riparian rights incident to the defendant's land could not have been lost by prescription, the only other method upon the facts of this case by which they could have been lost is a voluntary transfer or cession of them by one who was at the time the owner of the land. It is not claimed that there was any such transfer or cession after the severance of this particular tract from the larger tract of which both it and the lands of the plaintiffs were originally a part. The question then reduces itself to whether or not there was such transfer or cession either at the time of that severance or prior thereto. It is claimed in effect that it did occur at the time of the severance. The deed by which the owner of the larger tract severed from it and conveyed to another ownership the land now owned by the defendant did not reserve from its operation any riparian rights incident to the land. On the face of the deed, therefore, those rights were conveyed as a part of the land, and there was no withholding or cession of them. But it is claimed that in view of the fact that the stream, and the whole stream, was at that time being diverted for use on other lands, including those of the plaintiffs, and such diversion was open and visible and must have been known to the grantee, the case comes within the familiar rule stated in Cheda v. Bodkin, 173 Cal. 7, 158 Pac. 1025, that—

"'Where the owner of two tenements sells one of them, or the owner of the entire estate sells a portion of it, the purchaser takes the tenement or portion sold with all the benefits and with all the burdens that appear at the time of the sale to belong to it as between it and the property which the vendor retains.' * * * Where the owner of one heritage consisting of several parts has so adapted them that one derives a benefit from the other, when he sells one of them without making mention of the incidental burdens of one in respect to the other, an implied understanding arises that the burdens and correlative advantages shall continue as before the separation of the title."

There would be no doubt about the application of this rule if it were the fact that the diversion in question, an open and plainly apparent one, had amounted to an imposition of a burden by the owner of the whole tract upon the portion severed from it for the benefit of other land retained by him. It would also seem that it might well be that, if the diversion had been above the portion severed by conveyance, so that the stream when it came to that portion was diminished, and if also the extent of the diversion was such as to make it apparent that it exceeded what might be diverted under any riparian right, a burden would have been imposed upon the portion conveyed for the benefit of lands retained. But where, as here, the diversion was below the land conveyed so that the stream as it flowed by it was wholly unaffected, we do not see how it can be fairly said that any burden was imposed upon that portion of the land for the benefit of other portions. So far as that land is concerned, it is wholly unaffected by the diversion. Upon this point the case, as it seems to us, is wholly analogous to those cases where a right by prescription was claimed against a riparian owner because of a diversion below his land, and that the same reasoning by which such right was denied leads to the conclusion here that the grantee of the land would not take it with its riparian rights subordinated to a diversion below which did not affect his land. It should be said also that, where the owner of land conveys it by deed purporting to convey it fully and without reservations, rights should be held to be reserved in the grantor by implication only where the circumstances very clearly indicate that the grantee knew or should have known that such was the real intention of the grantor. It would be going very far, indeed, to hold that, where riparian land is conveyed without any reservation whatever, the riparian rights incident to it yet do not pass for the reason that the grantor was openly and visibly diverting the water at a point below. Presumably in such a case it was the intention that full effect be given to the deed and that the diversion below be subject to the riparian rights ostensibly conveyed rather than the contrary. Our conclusion, then, is that the present case does not come within the rule of Cheda v. Bodkin, and that the deed by the owner of the whole tract conveying the portion now owned by the defendant operated to convey all the riparian rights incident to the portion conveyed which the grantor had at the time of conveyance. He, of course, had all of such rights unless they had been previously ceded or transferred, and the question of whether they had been or not is the next question in the case.

[8] The conveyance to the defendant's immediate predecessor in interest was subsequent to the conveyances of the parcel now owned by the plaintiff Bernard and of the parcel now owned by one Folker, on the opposite side of the stream, from both the Bernard and the Nay [the defendant] parcels. As between the Folker and Bernard parcels, the former was conveyed first. The deed to the Bernard parcel does not purport to grant more than the land itself, so that by it no transfer or cession of riparian rights incident to the land retained by the grantor was worked. In other words, the riparian rights incident to the Nay parcel, which was retained by the grantor, were unaffected by the deed to the Bernard parcel, and were retained in full by the grantor as an incident of his continuing ownership.

The same, however, is not true of the deed to the Folker place. It not merely conveyed the land, but granted the right to one-half the water in the creek. There was here a definite cession of riparian rights. The grantor could not thereafter insist upon the right to divert water for use on the riparian lands retained by him, of which the Nay place was a part, to the impairment of the right which he had granted to the grantee of the Folker place. Duckworth v. Watsonville, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 520, 89 Pac. 338. He could, of course, take the one-half of the water not so granted, and he could take it from the stream where he pleased, either above or below the Folker point of diversion, but, if he took it above, the owner of the Folker place would, to the extent to which such diversion above diminished the flow past his point of diversion, have the right to take proportionately more than one-half of the flow at that point. As the result of these conveyances, then, and there is nothing else which can be claimed to be a transfer or cession of the riparian rights incident to the defendant's land, the situation is that, as between Nay and Bernard, each has the full riparian rights incident to his land, and, as a part of these, has the right to have the use of the water apportioned between him and the other upon that basis, but that as between them and Folker their riparian rights have been limited to an interest in one-half of the flow of the stream. The result is that, if the owner of the Folker place insists upon his right, the use of the water between Nay and Bernard must be apportioned as if the flow of the stream were just half of what it actually is.

The plaintiff Holmes is in exactly the same situation as the plaintiff Bernard. He acquired his land from the original owner of the whole tract subsequent to the conveyances of the other parcels. Except as limited by the Folker grant, he acquired his parcel with the full riparian rights incident to it, and, as limited by that grant, he, Bernard, and Nay are as between themselves riparian owners on a stream in legal effect one-half of its actual size.

To the above outline of the rights of the parties there is an exception whose mention we have reserved until this point in order to simplify the discussion. This exception arises from the fact that either in the deed to the Folker place containing the grant of one-half of the stream or by contemporaneous agreement between the grantor and grantee there was reserved or given the grantor the right to take from the water diverted by Folker, and after it had been diverted, one inch for use on the Bernard place and two inches for use on other lands of the grantor. The right to some, at least, of the latter two inches is now appurtenant to the land of the plaintiff Holmes. The rights to this inch and two inches, respectively, were rights in the water which Folker was given the right to divert, so that to the extent of these rights the owners of the land to which the rights became appurtenant became co-owners, as it were, with Folker in the right granted him. The two plaintiffs, as the owners of such lands, have therefore a direct interest in the right granted Folker, and for that reason have the right to complain of any diversion of the defendant which encroaches upon the Folker right, at least to the extent to which such diversion affects their receipt of water under that right. The final situation then, as to the fundamental rights of the parties to this action, omitting the rights of Nay as the owner of the uppermost 101-acre tract which he acquired from the government, which rights we have previously discussed, is that each of the plaintiffs has the right to complain of any diversion by Nay whereby the diversion under the Folker grant of the full one-half of the natural flow of the stream without any diversion by Nay is prevented, at least to such an extent as to deprive them of their one inch and two inches, respectively, and that as to the other one-half of the stream all three parties are in the position simply of riparian owners entitled to have the use of the water for stock, domestic, and irrigation purposes upon their riparian lands reasonably apportioned between them.

[9] The judgment appealed from is not in conformity with the rights of the parties as so outlined, and the findings are not such as to make it possible to direct a judgment which does conform to them. A new trial is therefore necessary. For the purposes of it, there are a few minor points which should be determined. We have said that the rights of Nay as the owner of the 101-acre tract are confined to the use of the water on that tract, and that such rights do not include the right to use the water on the parcel of the Mexican grant which he owns. But this does not mean that he cannot divert water on the 101-acre tract and carry it to the other tract and there use it. It means only that he cannot do so under his rights as owner of the 101-acre tract. But the owner of riparian land is not required, so far as a lower riparian owner is concerned, to make his diversion on his land. He can make it above if he wishes, provided no unreasonable loss of water is caused by his so doing. Turner v. James Canal Co., 155 Cal. 82, 99 Pac. 520, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401, 132 Am. St. Rep. 59, 17 Ann. Cas. 823. The defendant Nay, then, has, to the extent to which he has the right to divert water as the owner of what was once a part of the Mexican grant, the right to go off that land and make a diversion and convey water to it for use thereon.

[10] It seems also that part of Nay's land lies between the main stream and a branch, the latter coming into the former before the stream reaches the land of either of the plaintiffs, so that some of Nay's land is in the watershed of the main stream above where the branch comes in and some is in the watershed of the branch. It seems also that Nay is taking the water from the main stream and using at least a portion of it on land in the watershed of the branch. This is complained of, but this he has the right to do. Both watersheds are but parts of the watershed of the stream as it passes the plaintiffs' lands, and the rule that the owner of a tract of riparian land may not convey and use the water without the watershed of the stream has no application. The water is not conveyed and used without the watershed of the stream which passes the plaintiffs' lands, and that stream is the stream in which the plaintiffs have rights. They have no rights in the main stream and the branch above as separate streams. The situation is the exact converse of that presented in Anaheim, etc., Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 327, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062, where the junction of the stream and the branch was below the lands of the complaining riparian owner. Any other rule would be wholly impracticable and would, in many cases, practically destroy the riparian rights of an upper owner.

[11] The plaintiffs also complain of the muddying and pollution of the water by the defendant. They have the right to complain of this except in so far as it is a reasonably necessary incident of the use of the water by the defendant. He has the right to use the water and cannot be prevented from using it because of the fact that necessarily such use may somewhat impair the quality of the water. But he cannot exercise his right in such manner as to injure those below him maliciously or unnecessarily. The case certainly comes under the principle of the familiar maxim "Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas." It may be that, where the question is one of a reasonable manner of use as between an upper and a lower riparian owner, a manner of use which perhaps would not violate the principle of the maxim quoted as between strangers would yet be unreasonable as between those occupying the relation to each other of riparian owners on the same stream. While the facts of the present case suggest this question, it is not definitely presented by them and is not argued by counsel and we do not decide it. We mention it merely to avoid the possibility of this opinion being taken to establish as the law of the case that the freedom of the defendant in his manner of using the water is limited only by the principle of the maxim quoted.

[12] Considerable appears in the evidence and much is said in the briefs about the wasting of water on both sides. No one has the right to divert water otherwise than for a beneficial use. This is true even as to a diversion made under a grant. In other words, the Folker grant must be read with the implied condition that it was a grant of the right to divert water for beneficial uses and not otherwise.

[13] But, on the other hand, no one has the right to complain even of an unlawful diversion unless he is injured thereby, and it is apparent that a riparian owner is not injured by a diversion, lawful or unlawful, which is below both his land and his own point of diversion. This last is the present situation as between the defendant and the diversions by the plaintiffs. The result is that, while the plaintiffs may complain of any wastage by the defendant, since both their lands and their point of diversion under the Folker grant are below the defendant's diversion, the defendant may not complain of wastage by them, since he is not injured by it.

[14] Of course, in apportioning the use of the water between the parties in accord with their rights as riparian owners, it is the reasonable use, or the possibility of reasonable use, for beneficial purposes that alone should be considered, and if the plaintiffs have been diverting water which they did not use for a beneficial purpose, the share of the water to which the defendant may be entitled cannot be affected thereby.

Judgment reversed.

In re PAUSON'S ESTATE.

PAUSON et al. v. CHAMBERS, State Controller. (S. F. 9232.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1921. Rehearing Denied July 25, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1010(1)—Finding of trial court not disturbed if supported by evidence.

It being a question of fact whether a gift is made in contemplation of death within the meaning of the Inheritance Tax Law (St. 1911, p. 713), the finding of the trial court will not be disturbed, if supported by evidence, though the conclusion of the appellate court on the same evidence might be different.

2. Taxation ⟸881—Age of donor, purpose and manner of transfer, and continued control by donor considered in determining whether transfer made in contemplation of death.

In determining whether a gift was made in contemplation of death within the meaning of the Inheritance Tax Law (St. 1911, p. 713), the old age of the donor, the fact that he transferred or sought to transfer all his property, that the fortune was large, and the transfer made for the benefit of his heirs and in such fashion that, as president of the corporation to which it was transferred, he still had the management and control of the same and received therefrom an income commensurate with his customary expenditures, are important considerations.

3. Taxation ⟸881—Gift in lieu of will is transfer in "contemplation of death" within Inheritance Tax Law.

Under Inheritance Tax Law (St. 1911, p. 726) § 27, defining "contemplation of death" as including that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person on the execution of his will and in no wise limited and restricted to that actuating one in making a gift causa mortis, and declaring the intent and purpose of the act to be to tax any and all transfers made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of the property transferred by testate or intestate laws, a gift made by a donor in lieu of making a will and to accomplish substantially the same purpose is subject to taxation, the phrase "in contemplation of death" being intended to cover all dispositions of property without valuable and adequate consideration, substantially testamentary in character, Civ. Code, §§ 1149, 1150, defining such phrase with reference to a gift causa mortis, being inoperative.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Contemplation of Death.]

4. Taxation ⟸881—Evidence held sufficient to show gift made in contemplation of death within Inheritance Tax Law.

In a proceeding to fix an inheritance tax pursuant to St. 1911, p. 713, imposing a tax on transfers in contemplation of death, evidence that deceased, aged 78, transferred practically all of a large fortune to a newly organized corporation in consideration of the entire capital stock thereof, which he distributed among his children, and that he was elected president of the corporation at an annual salary sufficient to pay the household expenses of himself and family and his personal expenses, held sufficient to sustain a finding that the gift was made in contemplation of death within the meaning of the statute.

5. Taxation ⟸893—Superior court sitting in probate may fix inheritance tax on property transferred prior to decedent's death.

In view of Inheritance Tax Law (St. 1917, p. 895) §§ 15 and 16, authorizing the probate court to fix a tax on property transferred in contemplation of death to any person or corporation taking any property by virtue of probate proceedings pending in such court, the superior court sitting in probate had jurisdiction to fix a tax on property transferred prior to the death of decedent, though its jurisdiction is limited and statutory, where the transferees also took property by virtue of the probate proceedings.

6. Appeal and error ⟸185(1)—Objection to jurisdiction of probate court to fix inheritance tax must be made below.

Where, in the absence of a separate probate court, the right to an inheritance tax was litigated in the superior court, which has general jurisdiction, under the Constitution, of such matters, parties appearing without objection in opposition to the state controller's application cannot be heard to complain on appeal that the court was without jurisdiction.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

Application by John S. Chambers, Controller of the State of California, to fix inheritance tax on property transferred in contemplation of death by Frank Pauson, decedent, objected to by Samuel B. Pauson and others. From an order fixing the tax, objectors appeal. Affirmed.

A. L. Weil, of San Francisco (Harris F. Shaw, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Robert A. Waring, of Sacramento, and H. C. Lucas and A. W. Brouillet, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

Garret W. McEnerney, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

WILBUR, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court fixing an inheritance tax upon certain property transferred by the deceased, Frank Pauson, upon the ground that such transfer was made in contemplation of death. At the time of the transfer the decedent was 78 years of age and in vigorous health. He consulted an attorney, stating to the attorney that it was his intention to transfer all his property to a corporation to be organized under the name of Frank Pauson & Sons. Pursuant to this intention such corporation was organized.

The deceased transferred to it about $600,000 worth of property in consideration of the entire capital stock of the corporation, 40 shares of which was issued to each of his four sons and 20 each to four daughters and one share to the deceased. Three daughters who received 20 shares each had in 1913 received a gift of $50,000 each, and the method of distributing the shares adopted was to equalize the amount received by each child. The shares were issued December 8, 1915. At the organization meeting of the corporation the deceased was elected president and voted a salary of $20,000 per annum. This amount was intended to pay the household expenses of the members of the family, which consisted of the father and the adult children, except one daughter, and also to pay the personal expenses of the father. It subsequently developed that, due to an oversight, $42,339.15 worth of property had not been transferred to the corporation and remained a part of decedent's estate at the time of his death. The deceased died November 26, 1916, less than one year after the organization of the corporation, but from a sudden acute illness.

[1] The question is whether or not the finding of the trial court that this gift was made in contemplation of death within the meaning of the statute in force at the time of the transfer, namely, the Inheritance Tax Law of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 713), is sustained by the evidence. At the outset it should be borne in mind in considering this case and determining the effect of the decisions heretofore rendered by this and other courts upon the subject that the question of whether or not a gift is made in contemplation of death is a question of fact, and that if from the evidence the trial court can properly infer that the transfer was or was not made in contemplation of death, the finding of the trial court would not be disturbed, even though the conclusion of the appellate court on the same evidence might be different.

[2] The appellant asserts that the sole question in this case is whether or not it must be held as a matter of law that a transfer made by a person 78 years of age is, because of his age alone, to be deemed a transfer in contemplation of death. It is true, of course, that the age of the donor is an important consideration. The fact that he transferred all of his property or sought to do so, that it was a very large fortune, appraised at the time of his death at $939,065.34, and that the transfer was made for the benefit of his heirs and in such fashion that as president of the corporation he still had the management and control of his property and received from the income thereof an amount fully commensurate with his customary expenditures are most significant.

[3] The phrase "transfer in contemplation of death" has been a subject of much litigation, and we are informed by the briefs that every case involving that question that can be found in the United States has been therein presented to us for our consideration. This phrase is found in the inheritance or transfer tax legislation in many states—Pennsylvania, New York, Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Georgia, and California. The New York courts gave a very narrow construction to the phrase "transfer in contemplation of death," treating it practically as an equivalent of a gift causa mortis. Matter of Seaman, 147 N. Y. 69, 41 N. E. 401; Estate of Reynolds, 169 Cal. 600, 603, 147 Pac. 268. The other states have refused to follow the New York courts, and without exception have taken a more liberal view. Appellant claims that the general effect of all such decisions is that the phrase "in contemplation of death" means "in contemplation of an impending death."

The brief filed by amicus curiæ thus states the rule contended for by the appellant:

"It is apparent from the foregoing review of the history and interpretation of the term 'contemplation of death' that a gift is made in contemplation of death only 'when the donor is looking forward to his death as impending.'"

The rule is also stated by amicus curiæ as follows:

"It has also been universally held that, even though gifts, other than deathbed gifts, may be taxable, nevertheless it is necessary, to constitute a transfer in contemplation of death, that the grantor be so ill or infirm as to warrant a finding that he was looking forward to his death as impending when he made the gift."

However, the phrase "in contemplation of death" is defined in the Inheritance Tax Law in force at the time of the transfer under consideration in this case. In the Inheritance Tax Law of 1911 (Stats. 1911, § 27, p. 726), after defining the words "estate," "property," "transfer," "decedent," "county treasury," "district attorney," and "inheritance tax appraiser," the following definition occurs:

"* * * 'Contemplation of death,' as used in this act, shall be taken to include that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person on the execution of his will, and in no wise shall said words be limited and restricted to that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person in making a gift causa mortis; and it is hereby declared to be the intent and purpose of this act to tax any and all transfers which are made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of the property transferred by testate or intestate laws."

In the Estate of Reynolds, 169 Cal. 600, 147 Pac. 268, the definition of "contemplation of death" contained in section 27 of the act of 1911 is quoted with the following comment:

"This amendment also served the purpose of elucidating without changing the law, by giving fuller expression to the legislative intent and meaning."

In that case, however, the transfer under consideration was made in April and May, 1911, and the statute of 1911 did not go into effect until July 1, 1911. The statement is therefore obiter dictum. It also appeared in that case that the decedent at the time of the transfer was suffering from a sarcoma; that he had undergone several surgical operations which had failed to eradicate the sarcoma. One of the gifts held liable to tax was made two days before a critical operation for the amputation of the right leg at the hip. Others were made after the recovery from the effects of the operation, but after he had begun again to fail. These transfers to the wife were made by decedent prior to and following an operation considered absolutely necessary to save his life. It was said:

"It would seem to be clear beyond peradventure that as to these transfers, they were made in that contemplation of death which the law designates, and that they were gifts in life substituted for gifts by will."

The transfers to the son, also involved, were made when he knew that he was in failing health and "it was known, and he knew, that his tumor had returned and that the days of his life were numbered. * * *" The court concluded:

"Indeed, it seems quite plain that, as in the case of the widow, so in the case of the son, the father in contemplation of death was transferring by gift instead of devise the valuable business which he owned and had theretofore conducted."

It is obvious from the foregoing that the finding of the trial court in that case was justified even under the rule contended for by the appellant and amicus curiæ in this case. The case is not authority as to the interpretation of the law of 1911.

We see no particular difficulty in the interpretation of the law of 1911 when construed in the light of the general purpose of the Legislature in imposing such taxes and in the light of the interpretation theretofore strued in the light of the general purpose of death" and in view of the litigation then pending in this state in which the meaning of that phrase was involved. The general purpose of the inheritance tax laws as stated in the act is as follows:

"To tax any and all transfers which are made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of the property transferred by testate or intestate laws."

In other words, the taxing of transfers was purely ancillary to and in aid of taxes imposed upon the right of succession; the purpose of such ancillary legislation being to tax transfers which were made in lieu of succession or testamentary disposition. That the object of such imposition of taxes upon transfers made in contemplation of death is to prevent the evasion of laws imposing a tax upon the right to succeed to an estate at death is conceded in all the cases. It is obvious that this purpose is not achieved when the phrase "transfers made in contemplation of death" is limited, as in New York, to gifts causa mortis. This court, in the Estate of Reynolds, supra, declined to follow this narrow view. It is equally obvious that the legislative intent will be frustrated if the transfer, in order to be taxable, must be made with a sense of impending death, for under this view no tax can be collected where a donor in expectation of death and for the purpose of vesting title in his heirs makes a transfer inter vivos with no contemplation of death other than that involved in arranging his affairs so that when the contemplated event occurs the property will be distributed or vested in accordance with his wishes in that event. To put the matter more concretely, if the phrase "contemplation of death" is to receive the narrow construction contended for by appellants, it would be possible for a man 78 or 98 years of age to organize a corporation and transfer all his property thereto without consideration, issue the stock to his heirs in the proportion he desires them to succeed to upon his death, and for the purpose of effecting such succession, and thus evade or avoid all inheritance taxes on such transfer because he was in good health at the time of the transfer, and has no warning that indicates to his mind that death is impending, although he knows that his life expectancy is short and is making such arrangement with that fact in mind. Substantially this view was taken by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in State v. Thompson, 154 Wis. 320, 142 N. W. 647, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 790, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1084, in sustaining the finding of the trial court that a gift by the decedent Joseph Dessert of $500,000 to his daughter, partly made when he was 89 and partly when he was 87½ years of age, was not made "in contemplation of death." The Legislature of that state, however, immediately amended the law (St. 1919, § 1087—1, subd. 3) by adding the following:

"Every transfer by deed, grant, bargain, sale or gift, made within six years prior to the death of the grantor, vendor or donor, of a material part of his estate, or in the nature of a final disposition or distribution thereof, and without an adequate valuable consideration, shall be construed to have been made in contemplation of death within the meaning of this section."

The Supreme Court of Wisconsin held in Estate of Ebeling, 169 Wis. 432, 172 N. W. 734, 4 A. L. R. 1519, that the law conclusively established the taxability of such a gift, and with reference to the decision on the Estate of Thompson, supra, said:

"The circumstances of that case forcibly brought to the attention of the Legislature the fact that after a person had attained the age of 89 years, an age when he could not expect to live many more years, when his thoughts, naturally, were consumed rather with the disposition of property already accumulated than with the accumulation of more, he could bestow his property upon the objects of his bounty and thus evade the inheritance tax. * * *

"It is clear to our minds that the Legislature intended to define what should constitute a transfer in contemplation of death. It was the legislative purpose to make the statute effective. It realized that, if a person after reaching the age of 80 or 90 years could dispose of his property free from the tax, it could be easily evaded by those possessing the larger fortunes. So it was enacted not only that the tax should apply to gifts made in contemplation of death but to gifts made within 6 years prior to death."

It is equally clear that our Legislature of 1911 intended to define the phrase "in contemplation of death" so as to cover, among other things, all dispositions of property "without valuable and adequate consideration," substantially testamentary in character (see section 27, supra, Stats. 1911, c. 395, p. 726), or, to use the language of the statute, to tax "all transfers which are made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of the property transferred by testate or intestate laws." The statutory definition of the phrase, contemplation of death, includes: First, "that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person upon the execution of a will"; and, second, is in no wise to "be limited and restricted to that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person in making a gift causa mortis"; and, third, "it is hereby declared to be the intent and purpose of this act to tax any and all transfers [and this includes transfers in contemplation of death] which are made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of the property transferred by testate or intestate laws." The phrase "all transfers" in this clause certainly includes transfers made "in contemplation of death." It is clear from a consideration of this definition that it was thereby intended to cover transfers made by a donor in lieu of a transfer by will. The characteristic phrase used for centuries as indicating the mental attitude of the testator in making a will is that he is of a sound and disposing mind and memory; that is to say, the testator of sound mind is also of a mind to direct the disposition of his property at and after his death. A somewhat different introductory phrase is sometimes used in a will as follows:

"Having in mind the uncertainty of life and the natural rights of others and my obligations to them, and it being my intention and purpose to dispose of all the property, real, personal, and mixed, which I may own at the time of my death," etc. Commentaries on Will, Alexander, vol. 3, 2669.

If the donor in that frame of mind decides that he will make a gift in lieu and instead of making a will and to accomplish substantially the same purpose he would accomplish by a will, such a transfer clearly comes within the scope of the statute in question. There is nothing inconsistent with this view in the decision in Estate of Minor, 180 Cal. 291, 180 Pac. 813, 4 A. L. R. 456, where the transfer was made to the transferee in contemplation of marriage, or in the decision in Kelly v. Woolsey, 177 Cal. 325, 170 Pac. 837. Neither of these decisions, however, involved the law of 1911, although in Estate of Minor it is said that the result would be the same under the law of 1911 as under the law in force at the time of the transfer (1908). In Spreckels v. State, 30 Cal. App. 363, 158 Pac. 549, the transfer was made when the Inheritance Law of 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 341) was in force, and the case of McDougald v. Wulzen, 34 Cal. App. 21, 166 Pac. 1033, arose under the same statute. Neither case required a construction of the statutory definition of the phrase "in contemplation of death," and both affirmed the conclusion of fact drawn by the trial court that the transfers were not made in contemplation of death, as sufficiently supported by the evidence, and hence not to be disturbed by the appellate court. In both cases it is conceded that the judgment would have been affirmed on the same evidence if the conclusion of the trial court as to the fact had been exactly opposite. In the case at bar the finding is in favor of the tax, and must be sustained if supported by the evidence.

[4] We are urged to consider the history of the phrase "contemplation of death," as used in our own statute defining gift causa mortis (sections 1149, 1150, Civ. Code), and the construction placed upon that phrase by other courts and at common law, as authority for its construction in the Inheritance Law. The express declaration of the Legislature of 1911 that the words in that statute shall not be limited and restricted to that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person making a gift causa mortis would seem to dispose of this contention. Moreover, in considering the interpretation to be placed upon our own statute and its definitions, we must recognize that the amendment of the Inheritance Tax Law in nearly every session of the Legislature (Stats. 1893, p. 193; Stats. 1895, p. 33; Stats. 1897, p. 77; Stats. 1899, p. 101; Stats. 1903, pp. 55, 268; Stats. 1905, pp. 341, 374; Stats. 1909, p. 557; Stats. 1911, p. 713; Stats. 1913, p. 1066; Stats. 1915, pp. 418, 435; Stats. 1917, p. 880) has been largely at the instance of attorneys acting for the state or its various officers engaged in collecting its tax, and that such amendments have been made to clarify the law and to meet the contentions of those opposing the collection of the tax, and that such legislation has sometimes been obtained before this court or any other has passed upon the contentions of the parties, thus attempting by legislation to settle the question for all future taxation at an earlier period than, in view of our congested calendar, it has been possible for this court to determine such questions. Some of these amendments have been thereafter shown to be unnecessary, and, as stated in Estate of Reynolds, supra, merely declaratory of the law as it already existed. Others have extended the law to cases not originally included. We think the change in the Inheritance Law of 1911 was of the latter character. At any rate, it is clear in this case that the trial court in holding that the gift in question was made in contemplation of death was amply sustained by the evidence.

[5] The appellants contend that the superior court sitting in probate had no jurisdiction to fix a tax on property transferred prior to the death of the decedent. There is no doubt that the jurisdiction of the superior court sitting in probate matters is a limited and statutory one (In re Haas, 97 Cal. 232, 31 Pac. 893, 32 Pac. 327; Ryder's Estate, 141 Cal. 368, 74 Pac. 993), but sections 15 and 16 of the Inheritance Tax Law (Stats. 1917, c. 589) specifically authorizes the probate court to fix a tax upon property transferred in contemplation of death "to any person, institution or corporation taking property under and by virtue of said probate proceedings." This provision of the statute refers to a situation such as that presented by the record in this case where the children all took property by virtue of the probate proceedings as well as by the transfer.

[6] Moreover, the parties appeared without objection in opposition to the application for the fixing of a tax upon the property transferred and litigated the matter. As we have no separate probate court, and the right to a tax was litigated under the application of the state controller and the objections thereto in the superior court, a court having general jurisdiction under the Constitution of such matters, such parties so appearing cannot now be heard to complain that the court was without jurisdiction. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties.

The order of the court declaring the tax a lien upon the shares of stock theretofore transferred to the children was merely declaratory of the law. It does not appear that the stock was to be taken possession of by the court or by any officer connected with the court for the purpose of executing the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

ELLSWORTH v. BRADFORD et al.
(L. A. 6551.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 22, 1921.)

1. Corporations ⟸215—Stockholders' statutory liability holds them as principal debtors, and not as sureties or guarantors.

The statutory liability of a stockholder is an independent original liability to the creditor which can be enforced directly against the stockholder quite independently of any judgment against the corporation; the stockholders being primarily liable as principal debtors, and not as sureties or guarantors.

2. Corporations ⟸215—Stockholder's statutory liability is not for corporation's benefit.

The stockholder's statutory liability is not for the benefit of the corporation, and is in no sense a part of its assets, like unpaid subscriptions to stock, and is of the same nature as that of an individual partner to the partnership debts.

3. Limitation of actions ⟸58(4)—Judgment against corporation does not create new liability nor extend limitation statute for suing stockholders.

A judgment against the corporation does not create a new liability nor extend the time prescribe by the statute of limitations for bringing suit against stockholders made liable by statute.

4. Corporations ⟸253—Judgment against corporation admissible as prima facie evidence in action to enforce stockholders' individual liability.

In an action against stockholders of a corporation on their individual liability, under Const. art. 12, § 3, and Civ. Code, § 322, it was not error to admit a judgment against the corporation, since, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1851, such judgment is prima facie evidence of the existence of the corporate liability, and leaves open to the stockholder any meritorious defense he may have to the original obligation without requiring the creditor in every instance to preserve and produce anew the evidence in support of his claim.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Lucie E. Ellsworth against A. S. Bradford and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gray, Barker & Bowen, Hocker & Austin, and Donald Barker, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

S. L. Carpenter and S. E. Vermilyea, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

W. C. Petchner, Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, and Edward E. Bacon, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

SLOANE, J. The appellants were sued in this action on their statutory liability as stockholders of the National Home & Town Builders, a corporation, for their proportionate share of the corporation's liability for damages as evidenced by a judgment in favor of plaintiff against the corporation for conversion of plaintiff's property.

The only point involved on this appeal is as to the admissibility and effect of the judgment against the corporation as evidence to establish the liability of the stockholders.

[1] Upon the trial the court admitted the judgment fixing the liability of the corporation, as competent evidence against the stockholders, in determining their individual liability under section 3, art. 12, of the California Constitution and section 322 of the Civil Code.

This ruling of the court is assigned as error. It is the contention of appellants that as they were not parties to the action the judgment cannot be used in any way to establish their personal liability.

Strangely enough, the question has apparently never before been directly passed upon by the appellate courts of this state.

It has been definitely held that, in an action by a creditor of a corporation to recover from a stockholder his unpaid subscription to capital stock, a judgment against the corporation conclusively establishes the creditor's claim as against the stockholder. Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 581, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158; Tatum v. Rosenthal, 95 Cal. 129, 30 Pac. 136, 29 Am. St. Rep. 97.

But the distinction between this class of cases and that in which the statutory liability is sought to be enforced is very obvious. The amount unpaid on stock subscription is a debt owing by the stockholder to the corporation, which the creditor has a right to subject to the satisfaction of his judgment against the corporation. The statutory liability, as has been repeatedly held by this court, is an independent original liability of the stockholder to the creditor which can be enforced directly against the stockholder, quite independently of any judgment against the corporation, and is not dependent upon an adjudication of indebtedness in an action against the corporation, but upon the actual existence of such indebtedness. Under the provisions of the California law stockholders are held to be primarily liable as principal debtors, and not as sureties or guarantors. Young v. Rosenbaum, 39 Cal. 646; Sonoma Bank v. Hill, 59 Cal. 107; Hyman v. Coleman, 82 Cal. 650; [1] Brown v. Merrill, 107 Cal. 446, 40 Pac. 557, 48 Am. St. Rep. 145; McGowan v. McDonald, 111 Cal. 57, 43 Pac. 418, 52 Am. St. Rep. 149; Eva v. Andersen, 166 Cal. 420, 137 Pac. 16.

[2] The stockholder's statutory liability is not for the benefit of the corporation and is in no sense a part of its assets like unpaid subscriptions to stock. Fletcher on Corporations, § 4210; Williams v. Carver, 171 Cal. 658, 154 Pac. 472; Zang v. Wyant, 25 Colo. 551, 56 Pac. 565, 71 Am. St. Rep. 145; Mechanics' Sav. Bank v. Fidelity Ins. Co. (C. C.) 87 Fed. 113.

The liability has been declared by this court to be of the same nature as that of an individual partner to the partnership debts. Mokelumne Hill Canal & Min. Co. v. Woodbury, 14 Cal. 265; Robinson v. Bidwell, 22 Cal. 388; Davidson v. Rankin, 34 Cal. 505.

In Buttner v. Adams, 236 Fed. 105, 149 C. C. A. 315, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, referring to the California, law, says:

"That state is one of the few in which the liability of the stockholder is not collateral, but is original, and partakes of the nature of the liability of partners. The result is that an action at law lies 'directly against the shareholders as against partners on their joint contract,' and need not be predicated on a judgment against the corporation."

Following out the analogy of the law of partnership, it is the accepted rule that in no case will a judgment entered after service on less than all the partners be given the effect of a personal judgment against partners not actually served. 20 R. C. L. p. 937; Sugg v. Thornton, 132 U. S. 524, 10 Sup. Ct. 163, 33 L. Ed. 447; In re Grossmayer, 177 U. S. 48, 20 Sup. Ct. 535, 44 L. Ed. 665; Pickett v. Ferguson, 45 Ark. 177, 55 Am. Rep. 545; Phelps v. Brewer, 9 Cush. 390 (Mass.) 57 Am. Dec. 56; Welsh v. Kirkpatrick, 30 Cal. 203, 89 Am. Dec. 85; Feder v. Epstein, 69 Cal. 456, 10 Pac. 785; Davidson v. Knox, 67 Cal. 143, 7 Pac. 413; Code Civ. Proc. § 388.

It requires no citation of authorities to the general rule that a judgment is not admissible in evidence against any person not a party or privy thereto. In Phelps v. Brewer, supra, it was held that partners sued in an action cannot enter an appearance for partners not sued.

[3] Accepting the logic of the authorities cited, and applying the strict rules of evidence governing the use of judgments against persons not parties, nor in privity therewith, it is difficult to reach a different conclusion than is contended for by appellants and upheld by division one of the second appellate district, from which this case comes to us on petition for rehearing. That court held that—

"Defendants were entitled to have produced sufficient proof of the facts showing the alleged conversion of plaintiff's stock by the corporation. The fact that the plaintiff in an action against the corporation had recovered a judgment for the same cause was not evidence of the existence of the liability against the stockholder."

Recognizing, as we must, that the stockholder becomes liable to the corporation's creditors solely as an original debtor, and not in any way as a surety or guarantor for the corporation, and that this liability arises by operation of law from the creation and existence of the debt, not through any power of the corporation to bind him to personal liability for its obligations, it would seem requisite to fixing such liability in an action against the stockholder to prove the facts establishing the corporate debt. The law makes the act of the corporation creating a corporate liability binding on the stockholders, but it does not extend the power of the corporation any further in the matter or authorize it to represent the stockholder in putting up a defense against his personal indebtedness. The limitation of the authority of the corporation to in any way enlarge or extend or renew the stockholder's statutory liability is declared in the decisions of this court holding the corporation powerless to extend such liability by a new promise, or by agreement extending the period of the statute of limitations, or by changing the form of the indebtedness. Hyman v. Coleman, supra, 82 Cal. 650; [2] Winona Wagon Co. v. Bull, 108 Cal. 1, 40 Pac. 1077. In Winona Wagon Co. v. Bull, supra, this court adopts the following language from Trippe v. Huncheon, 82 Ind. 307, as to the relation of the corporation to stockholders' liability:

"The corporation has nothing to do with this liability, nor has it the right or power to represent its members as to this individual obligation. It is a matter between the creditors of the corporation and its members, not as corporators, but as individuals."

A judgment against the corporation does not create a new liability, nor extend the time prescribed by the statute of limitations for bringing suit against the stockholders. Larrabee v. Baldwin, 35 Cal. 168; Stilphen v. Ware, 45 Cal. 110.

The case of McGowan v. McDonald, supra, is referred to as giving support to the competency of a judgment against the corporation as evidence of the stockholders' liability. It is there held that—

"In a suit against a stockholder to enforce his liability the first fact to be established is the indebtedness of the corporation, and when that is established the liability of the stockholder results as a necessary sequence. It would seem, therefore, that any evidence which is competent and sufficient to show the liability of the corporation must be competent and sufficient to show the liability of the stockholder."

The evidence sought to be introduced in the case cited was not a judgment against the corporation, but entries made by the corporation bank in passbooks of the plaintiffs, depositors of the bank, showing balances due the depositors. There is a difference between the facts going to establish the indebtedness and the judgment based on such facts. The stockholder might dispute or disprove the original facts if produced in evidence against him. He cannot dispute the judgment under the rule contended for where it is held to be conclusive against him.

In Mitchell v. Beckman, 64 Cal. 117, 28 Pac. 110, it was held there was no prejudicial error in admitting the judgment against the corporation, but in that case, as was pointed out in the decision:

"There was other evidence from the books of the bank to show the indebtedness. * * * The cause was tried by the court and when so tried we do not understand the objection of irrelevancy is tenable unless it is plainly apparent that the court has rested its decision on the irrelevant testimony."

[4] Looking beyond our own courts for the rule governing the effect and admissibility of this class of evidence, we are involved at once in a Babel of confusion. Hardly any two states have identical laws governing the liability of stockholders for corporate debts. California is almost alone in making the liability direct, immediate, and enforceable independently of proceedings against the corporation.

In many of the states the liability is secondary and contingent on the insolvency of the corporation. In some an existing judgment against the corporation and exhaustion of the remedy thereon is a prerequisite to pursuing the stockholders' liability.

It is true that most of the text-writers and many of the judicial decisions concede the existence of a generally accepted rule that a judgment against the corporation establishes the existence of the liability as against the stockholder, either conclusively or as prima facie proof, and the statement of the rule is usually fortified with a long list of authorities. 7 R. C. L. pp. 420, 421; 14 Corpus Juris, p. 1062, § 1654; Morawetz, Corp. (2d Ed.) § 886; 3 Clark & Marshall on Corp. § 824; 1 Cook on Corp. § 224; 7 Fletcher, Corp. § 4236, p. 7419.

It is impracticable to review the authorities here, but the result of our examination of most of them is the conclusion that they are generally inapplicable to the peculiar statutory liability imposed by the laws of California.

There are a few that are substantially in point, and these variously state the rule as making such judgment conclusive against the stockholder, not admissible against him for any purpose, or as constituting prima facie proof of the indebtedness.

Much of the confusion of authorities arises from a failure to distinguish between the controlling effect of a judgment against the corporation in an action to subject unpaid subscriptions or other corporate assets to the creditor's claim, and such judgment in cases where the liability of the stockholder was an independent indebtedness to the creditor and created no privity with the corporation in the matter of enforcing its payment.

Thompson on Corporations, vol. 4, p. 1395, favoring the admissibility of the judgment against the corporation as conclusive as to the stockholder's liability, fairly states the attitude of the courts as follows:

"The courts are not agreed as to whether or not the foundation of the action to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders is the judgment against the corporation or the original indebtedness. The decisions are not harmonious, even in the jurisdictions in which it is held that the judgment against the corporation is conclusive upon the stockholders. However, it is believed to be the rule in the majority of the jurisdictions, and certainly the correct one, that the judgment against the corporation is the foundation of the action against the stockholder.

"But in other jurisdictions the action against the stockholder must be on the original indebtedness, and not on the judgment. The test in this respect, it seems, is that where the liability created by statute is upon the stockholders as individuals, and not as corporators, and where the liability is absolute, and in the nature of a primary obligation to pay all debts contracted by the corporation, then the corporation has nothing to do with the liability, nor has it the right nor the power to represent the stockholders as to such individual obligations. Under many such statutes the courts say that the action must be upon the original indebtedness."

The leading cases supporting the conclusive effect of such judgments are perhaps: Ball v. Reese, 58 Kan. 614, 50 Pac. 875, 62 Am. St. Rep. 638; Hancock v. Farnum, 176 U. S. 640, 20 Sup. Ct. 506, 44 L. Ed. 619; Holland v. Duluth Iron M. & D. Co., 65 Minn. 324, 68 N. W. 50, 60 Am. St. Rep. 480.

The argument of Ball v. Reese, supra, which is typical of all the decisions upholding the same rule, is that:

"The ruling proceeds upon the theory that the corporation represents its stockholders within the limits of its corporate power. Through its officers and agents it can make contracts binding upon its members, and as it has to bring and defend suits in regard to any interest of the corporation, its action in that respect, if there is good faith, necessarily binds the stockholders as to any matter in litigation."

It is conceded in all the authorities that the stockholder is not estopped by any such judgment to defend against fraud or collusion in securing the judgment against the corporation.

The leading cases holding a judgment against the corporation inadmissible for any purpose as against the stockholder are in the courts of New York. It is claimed that there is a lack of uniformity on this question in the New York decisions, but, where the point has been raised in actions on the statutory liability of stockholders, the rule seems to be settled that a judgment against the corporation is not admissible. The leading cases are Miller v. White, 50 N. Y. 137, and McMahon v. Macy, 51 N. Y. 155. The most recent decision cited is Assets Realization Co. v. Howard, 70 Misc. Rep. 651, 127 N. Y. Supp. 798, affirmed by the New York Court of Appeals by a memorandum decision. The opinion of the Supreme Court in the case last cited reviews the entire field of the New York decisions, and states as its conclusion:

"The reasoning and logic upon which these decisions are based cannot be questioned. The stockholder in the action against the corporation is not a party to the proceeding. Until the action is brought to enforce his individual liability, he has not had his day in court. He is not privy to the corporation. * * * A judgment against the corporation undoubtedly binds the assets and property of the corporation itself, but does not bind the stockholders. Miller v. White, 50 N. Y. 137. The stockholders, no matter how meritorious a defense they might have, would have no right to be made parties to an action against the corporation, and contest in that action the validity of the debt in suit. It would be against every principle of justice and equity to hold the stockholder liable by virtue of a judgment against a corporation where he had no opportunity to * * * litigate his liability. Consequently the courts have properly held that the judgment against the corporation itself is neither conclusive nor prima facie evidence of the liability of the stockholder. * * *"

A third line of decisions has taken the middle course, and upholds the admission of judgment against the corporation as prima facie evidence of the existence of the liability or indebtedness as against the stockholder. Wheatley v. Glover, 125 Ga. 710, 54 S. E. 626; Grund v. Tucker, 5 Kan. 70; In re Warren's Estate, 52 Mich. 557, 18 N. W. 356.

The grounds upon which this form of evidence is held admissible, but only as establishing a prima facie case, are not very fully set forth in the cases cited.

Under the numerous authorities cited in the learned briefs of counsel for appellant and respondent and amici curiæ on this appeal there cannot be said to be any such well-beaten path pointed out along either of the courses advocated as to prove a compelling influence in guiding the footsteps of this court in following one or the other.

Whatever preponderance of authority there may be for making a judgment against the corporation conclusive evidence of the liability of the stockholder, it is overbalanced by the weight of reasoning, and the established rules of evidence against it. Logically, the same grounds of reasoning would perhaps forbid admitting such judgment as prima facie evidence, but there is persuasive authority and strong grounds of public policy for giving at least presumptive weight to such evidence. While the statutory liability of the stockholder is original, and independent so far as its continuance and enforcement are concerned, it has its origin in the acts of the corporation. Its existence and obligation arise on the same state of facts as to both. The stockholder has a twofold concern in every such corporate liability—one as affecting his interest as a stockholder; the other relating to the individual obligation imposed upon him by law. It is the duty of the corporation to protect his rights as a shareholder in any action brought against it. If this duty is performed its benefits extend to his personal and individual liability, for both involve the same state of facts.

There is a strong presumption at least that the corporation has interposed to the rendition of a judgment against it every meritorious defense that would avail the stockholder on his statutory liability.

Moreover, if it becomes the established doctrine that a judgment against the corporation is unavailing against the stockholder, creditors will feel compelled in all cases where they are not willing to entirely rely upon the solvency of the corporation for recovery to join all the stockholders as defendants in the original action to avoid the necessity of trying anew the issues as to the indebtedness every time a subsequent action is brought to enforce the claim against a stockholder.

Such a necessity would impose a burdensome hardship upon both creditors and stockholders and frequently involve needless litigation.

Treating the judgment as prima facie evidence of the existence of the corporate liability would leave open to the stockholder any meritorious defense to the original obligation, without requiring the creditor in every instance to preserve and produce anew the evidence in support of his claim, which in most cases could not be successfully rebutted, but which it might be difficult to reproduce.

This reasoning may be supplemented by the provision of section 1851 of the Code of Civil Procedure that—

"Where the question in dispute between the parties is the obligation or duty of a third person, whatever would be the evidence for or against such person is prima facie evidence between the parties."

This section of the Code apparently both avoids the objection to using the judgment at all as evidence in a suit against the stockholder and limits its conclusiveness.

It cannot be doubted that in an action on the stockholder's statutory liability the "obligation or duty of a third person," the corporation, is in issue, and by virtue of this provision the judgment against the corporation on such obligation becomes prima facie evidence.

We are of the opinion that the purpose of the stockholders' liability law, and the interests of the parties and the public, will be best served by admitting judgments of this nature in suits to enforce the stockholder's statutory liability as prima facie evidence of the indebtedness sued on.

The only objection urged here to the judgment appealed from arises on the admission in evidence of the judgment-roll in the previous action against the corporation to establish the corporate indebtedness. Such judgment-roll being admissible to establish a prima facie case for plaintiff, and no rebutting evidence having been introduced or offered on the part of defendants, the judgment must be affirmed.

Action by S. Ushirohira against L. C. Stuckey. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. C. Galloway, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fredericks & Hanna and Harold C. Morton, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff, by the judgment entered herein, was allowed recovery of a sum of money as damages alleged in his complaint to have been caused to growing crops by reason of certain cattle, belonging to appellant, being allowed to trespass thereon. This appeal is taken from the judgment so rendered, and is brought to this court under what is called the alternative method. Counsel for appellant in his brief makes several points with reference to matters which he affirms are shown by the record, but he makes no attempt at all to comply with the requirement of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, by printing in his brief such portions of that record as he desires to call to the attention of the court. If the case stood upon the presentation made by appellant alone, the court would be justified in assuming that counsel had not desired to have the court consider more than his abstract statements with reference to that record; but the respondent, in order to meet the assumed case, has supplied portions of the testimony which may be looked to in considering the contentions urged for reversal.

[1] The chief claim of appellant is that the court decided the case against the preponderance of the evidence. This contention admits that there was a conflict in that evidence. The law that an appellate court cannot review a question as to the sufficiency of the evidence, in the presence of a conflict, is so elementary, and has been affirmed by so many decisions, that it is now unnecessary to do more than state the rule. Where a conflict in the evidence exists, no question of law arises which an appellate tribunal is authorized to decide; the question is then a matter of fact, in the determination of which the decision of the trial judge is final and conclusive.

[2, 3] Under the existing law (Statutes of 1877-78, p. 176, and amendment, p. 879), liability is created as against the owner or person in control of cattle for damages arising from the trespass of such cattle upon the crops of another (Hicks v. Butterworth, 30 Cal. App. 562, 159 Pac. 224). It is not essential under the act referred to that a plaintiff show that the owner or person in control of the cattle willfully allowed them to commit trespass. It is the duty of the owner or person in charge to so guard such animals as to prevent the happening of the trespass. There is no suggestion in this case that the animals became unmanageable, or beyond the control of persons in charge.

It seems, according to the statements made in the briefs, that one White had charge of the feeding of 157 head of appellant's cattle, 15 head belonging to a second person, 3 belonging to a third person, and 1 to a fourth person; that these cattle were all kept together. Appellant insists that, conceding the evidence is sufficient to show that some of appellant's cattle were among those which committed the trespass, the evidence also shows, as a probability at least, that the number included some of the other animals from the joint herd. We are not prepared to admit that the evidence as it is presented to us will bear the interpretation suggested; but, even though that condition be conceded, appellant's liability would not be changed in any particular. It has been held that, where several persons maintain a joint herd of cattle, and the cattle did damage by trespass, each of the owners may be held for the whole damage. This holding rests largely upon the necessities of the case, for it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for a claimant to prove with any degree of exactness the particular amount of damage done by the cattle of each of the owners of the joint herd. Wilson v. White, 77 Neb. 351, 109 N. W. 367, 124 Am. St. Rep. 852. No other alleged errors are so presented by appellant's brief as to require consideration on this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by the Dyer Law & Collection Company against F. J. Abbott. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Davis, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Trusten P. Dyer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover upon a promissory note.

As a special defense, the defendant by answer alleged that, with the execution and delivery of the note and as a security for the payment thereof, he and plaintiff's assignor executed an agreement, copy of which is set out in the answer, which agreement "is in truth and in fact a mortgage on real estate and was given as security for the obligation sued upon in this action." The agreement contained a clause as follows:

"The payment of the said promissory note and moneys is hereby secured upon the interest of the party of the first part (defendant herein) in what is known as the Dreamland Pier Company at Ocean Park, and the property owned by him jointly with C. A. de Lisle-Holland and W. H. Labb, and also secured on all devices erected on, or so to be, the said pier and property."

The sole contention of appellant is that, in the absence of an affidavit filed by the plaintiff denying the execution of the instrument, its genuineness, as provided by section 448, Code of Civil Procedure, is deemed to be admitted, and since the instrument constituted a mortgage given to secure the payment of the obligation, no action could be instituted for recovery upon the note other than as provided in section 726, Code of Civil Procedure, namely, to foreclose the mortgage and, if the proceeds of a sale of the property were insufficient to pay the amount found due, take judgment for the deficiency.

[1-3] New matter in an answer is deemed to be controverted without any special replication, and hence, while under section 448, supra, the plaintiff herein, by his failure to file the affidavit therein prescribed must be deemed to have admitted the due execution and genuineness of the instrument set out in the answer, he was nevertheless entitled to offer any competent evidence in avoidance of the effect or operation of such instrument. In re Garcelon, 104 Cal. 570, 38 Pac. 414, 32 L. R. A. 595, 43 Am. St. Rep. 134. It appears that immediately prior to the time when the note would have been barred by the statute of limitations, to wit, on March 28, 1919, defendant by a written instrument renewed his promise to pay the same. The court, upon ample evidence, including that of the defendant himself, found that neither at the said time nor at any time thereafter did defendant have any interest whatsoever in the property described in the purported mortgage; that the property therein described and upon which the mortgage purported to create a lien had no existence; and that at the time of bringing the suit said note was wholly unsecured. It thus clearly and conclusively appears that plaintiff had no lien, by mortgage or otherwise, as security for the payment of the note. Under such circumstances, to allow a personal action upon a note does not violate the policy established by section 726, Code of Civil Procedure (Otto v. Long, 127 Cal. 471, 59 Pac. 895), the purpose of which policy is to prevent a multiplicity of suits by compelling the creditor to exhaust the security of the mortgage before taking a personal judgment in the action against the debtor. Merced Bank v. Casaccia, 103 Cal. 641, 37 Pac. 648. In the instant case it appears that the security, if any ever existed, was exhausted, and that, too, without the fault of plaintiff or its assignor, and no purpose could be served by the idle and senseless act of foreclosing a mortgage in form which, by reason of there being no property, had no substance and did not in fact constitute a lien. As said in Otto v. Long, supra:

"If it can be made to appear that there is no such property as that which the mortgage purports to describe, it would demonstrate that there was no lien, and the debt would not be one secured by mortgage upon real estate."

It conclusively appears from the record herein that the note upon which the action is based was not secured by a mortgage or other lien upon any property whatsoever, and hence, notwithstanding the existence of an instrument which in form purported to, but did not in fact, create a lien as security, plaintiff was entitled to ignore the same and bring an action to recover a personal judgment against defendant upon the note as maker thereof. See Toby v. Oregon Pac. R. R. Co., 98 Cal. 490, 33 Pac. 550; Savings Bank v. Central Market Co., 122 Cal. 28, 54 Pac. 273.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Drains ⟹49—Supervisors can only provide for protection of laborers and materialmen by exacting bond.

2. Drains ⟹49—Statutes held inapplicable to bonds to secure laborers and materialmen.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, relative to mechanics' liens on structures not of a public character and Public Improvement Act 1897, as amended by St. 1915, p. 926, are not applicable to bonds given to secure laborers and material-

Under Drainage Act 1903 (as amended) § 8a, requiring contractors to execute a bond running to the county in not less than one-half of the contract price, conditioned for the faithful execution of the contract and the payment by the contractor for all labor and materials, a bond, not running to the county, but to any and all persons performing labor or furnishing material, and not conditioned for the faithful execution of the contract, and a bond in the penal sum of one-fourth the contract price, and conditioned in accordance with Public Improvement Act 1897, as amended by St. 1915, p. 926, do not comply with the requirements of the statute, and, it being conceded that they are not good common-law bonds, a subcontractor cannot recover thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Fred Hoffman against James Kennedy and the Guardian Casualty & Guaranty Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, the Guaranty Company appeals. Reversed.

Schweitzer & Hutton and Kyle Grainger, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hartley Shaw, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Defendant Guardian Casualty & Guaranty Company appeals upon the judgment roll alone from a judgment rendered against it as surety upon a bond to indemnify all persons performing labor or furnishing materials in the execution of a contract between the county of Los Angeles and James Kennedy for the doing of certain public work.

The material facts of the case, as shown by the findings, are as follows: The county of Los Angeles, on November 8, 1916, duly entered into a contract with defendant Kennedy for the construction of a storm drain in the district known as Long Beach drainage district No. 1 at a cost of $84,936. The contract included the work of excavating a trench in State street in the city of Long Beach wherein to construct the storm drain, and, as a part of the work, provided for the refilling of the trench and resurfacing of the street. On January 16, 1918, plaintiff entered into a contract with Kennedy pursuant to which he, for $2,477.10, furnished materials and did all of said resurfacing work so required of Kennedy under his contract with the county, which work plaintiff completed on May 17, 1918. Whereupon, default having been made in the payment of the amount due under the terms of the contract, plaintiff instituted this action to recover the same upon two bonds executed by Kennedy on November 8, 1916, with the Guardian Casualty & Guaranty Company as surety thereon, each of which bonds is made the subject of a separate cause of action as set forth in the complaint.

The county of Los Angeles, in having the storm drain constructed, acted under and in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled, "An act to promote the drainage of wet, swamp and overflowed lands, and to promote the public health in the communities in which they lie," approved March 21, 1903. Stats. 1903, p. 354, and the amendments thereto, which act as so amended appears in Deering's Gen. Laws as Act 986.

The act (section 8a) provides that—

"Before entering upon such contract, a bond shall be executed and filed, running to the county, in an amount not less than one-half of the contract price of the work, signed by the contractor and two or more sureties, who shall aggregatedly, unless surety companies, qualify before an officer entitled to administer the oath in a sum equal to the amount of the bond, each surety in the amount for which he becomes surety. Such bond shall be conditioned for the faithful execution of the contract by the party contracting to do the work, and the payment by him for all labor and materials furnished for or in the doing of the work. The form and sufficiency of said bond shall be passed upon by some member of the board of supervisors, and such bond shall inure as well to the benefit of any and all persons furnishing labor or materials for the work as to the county."

As stated, two bonds were made at the time of the execution of the contract, each of which is separately set out in the complaint, and upon each of which plaintiff as subcontractor bases his right to recover the amount due under the contract made with Kennedy for the work performed and materials furnished in resurfacing the street.

Appellant attacks both instruments upon the ground that they are insufficient in that neither of them purports to be given under and in accordance with the provisions of the statute, while, on the other hand, respondent, conceding the instruments cannot be construed as common-law bonds, insists that both in terms and substance substantially comply with the provisions of section 8a of the statute above quoted. Reference to the first bond declared upon in the complaint clearly discloses the fact that in its execution the parties had in view the provisions of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, providing for liens of mechanics upon structures other than those of a public character. While the statute pursuant to which the bond was exacted, in clear and positive terms requires that the bond in such cases shall run to the county and be conditioned for the faithful execution of the contract by the contractor, the bond in question names as obligee therein, not the county, but "any and all persons who perform labor upon or furnish materials to be used in the work," etc., and omits altogether the required condition that the contractor shall faithfully execute the contract. It thus appears that the bond, headed "Bond to Laborers and Materialmen," not only omitted material provisions required by the express terms of the statute to be inserted therein, but it contained other provisions, clearly showing that it was not executed under section 8a of the Drainage Act, but was in form and substance the bond required by section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure.

The second bond set forth in the complaint and given at the same time is in the penal sum of one-fourth the contract price named in the contract, whereas the statute in express terms requires that it shall be in an amount not less than one-half of the contract price named. While it runs to the county, it is conditioned, not only that the contractor shall faithfully perform the work and pay for materials and labor, but also pay for "provisions, provender or other supplies, or teams used in, upon or for or about the performance of the work contracted to be done," and provides that the surety, in case of default on the part of the contractor, will pay the same, "provided that such claims or claim shall be filed as required by an act of the Legislature of the state of California entitled 'An act to secure the payment of the claims of materialmen, mechanics or laborers employed by contractors upon state, municipal or other public work,' approved March 27, 1897, as amended by an act of said Legislature approved May 29, 1915." Not only does it appear that this bond was given under the provisions of the act referred to therein, rather than under and in accordance with the provisions of section 8a of the Drainage Act, but that it is not the bond required by the statute, for the reason that it, in violation of the statute, fixes the amount of the bond at one-fourth of the contract price, instead of a sum not less than one-half thereof, as directed by the statute.

[1, 2] The only authority vested in the board of supervisors to provide for the protection of materialmen and laborers as subcontractors under Kennedy was the exaction of the bond required by said section 8a. By reference to the bonds, it is apparent that in the execution of the one the parties were guided alone by the provisions of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, and in giving the other they acted under and in accordance with the provisions of the Public Improvement Act of 1897, neither of which statutes is applicable to work done under the Drainage Act of 1903, and pursuant to which the improvement was made.

[3] Respondent, while conceding the bonds, when measured by the requirements of the statute, are not only irregular in form, but that in substance they contain conditions not authorized thereby and omit other and material provisions which the statute in express terms requires to be inserted therein, nevertheless insists the instruments, both in form and substance, are in substantial conformity with the law. In support of this claim he cites a number of authorities from other jurisdictions, an examination of which, however, discloses that the courts, in considering purported statutory bonds containing unwarranted conditions and where like omissions occurred, upheld their validity upon the theory that they were common-law bonds. In our opinion, none of the cases cited are applicable to the facts involved in the instant case. The instruments clearly fail to comply with the requirements of the statute under which they were given, and, however reluctant we feel to reverse a judgment obtained upon a bond given, as here, by a commercial company for a compensation accepted for the service, and no doubt intended for plaintiff's protection, we—since they, as conceded by respondent, cannot under the laws of this state be deemed common-law bonds—feel compelled to so declare.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

BENNETT v. MODERN WOODMEN OF AMERICA. (Civ. 3789.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 10, 1921. Rehearing Denied June 8, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1921.)

1. Insurance ⟸719(1)—Fraternal society can, under contract, make reasonable by-laws applicable to existing certificates.

A fraternal benefit society, which has issued certificates on applications by which insured agreed to be bound by the society's by-laws then in force and to be thereafter enacted, can make by-laws subsequently enacted, which are not in themselves unreasonable or against express law or public policy, applicable to such existing certificates.

2. Insurance ⟸719(1)—By-law against payments for disappeared members until expiration of life expectancy is unreasonable.

A by-law of a fraternal benefit society providing that proof of death of a member based on disappearance cannot be made until the full term of the member's expectancy of life is contrary to the rule of common law, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 26, that a person not heard from in 7 years is presumed to be dead, and is also unreasonable and against public policy, and therefore does not apply to a benefit certificate issued before its enactment.

3. Insurance ⊂812—Limitation of action on certificate held not applicable, where society had collected dues of absent member.

Though a provision in the by-laws of a fraternal benefit society limiting actions on the certificate to 18 months after the death of insured is valid, where it authorizes reasonable opportunity to begin suit, it does not bar a suit on a policy issued on the life of a member who had disappeared, though the suit was not brought within 18 months after the expiration of 7 years from the disappearance, where the society contended it was not liable until the expiration of the member's expectancy of life, and continued to collect dues from the beneficiary after the expiration of the 7-year period, and the beneficiary made her claim and brought her action within reasonable time after she learned of her legal rights.

4. Insurance ⊂793—Fraternal society held not authorized to pay benefits to niece by marriage.

A fraternal benefit society, which is authorized by the law of its incorporation to pay benefits only to wives, designated blood relatives, and dependents, cannot be required to pay the proceeds of a benefit certificate to a designated beneficiary, who was a niece of insured by marriage only and was not dependent on him.

5. Insurance ⊂770—Fraternal society cannot waive statutory provisions limiting class to be designated as beneficiary.

A fraternal benefit society cannot, by issuing a certificate payable to a designated person who was not within the class who may be designated as beneficiaries under the law of the society's incorporation, waive the restrictions of that law.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Agnes Bennett against the Modern Woodmen of America. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. M. Thomas, of San Francisco, and Truman Plantz, of Warsaw, Ill., for appellant.

Chas. S. Wheeler, and Chas. S. Wheeler, Jr., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff had judgment for the amount of a benefit certificate issued by the defendant upon the life of Frank S. Plummer, and the defendant appeals.

The defendant is a fraternal benefit society organized under the laws of the state of Illinois. It has its principal place of business in that state, with subordinate lodges in various parts of the United States, one of which, known as "San Jose Camp, No. 7777, of Modern Woodmen of America," is located in the city of San Jose, in this state. On the 17th day of March, 1900, the defendant issued to Frank S. Plummer, then a member in good standing in the San Jose Camp, its benefit certificate for the sum of $2,000, payable upon the death of the insured to Annie Plummer, his wife. Annie Plummer died in August, 1905. Plummer thereupon requested of the defendant, and it did, on November 8, 1905, issue to him a new benefit certificate for a like amount as the first, and in lieu thereof, in which Agnes Bennett, this plaintiff, was named as beneficiary. Although designated by Plummer and described in the certificate as his "niece," Agnes Bennett was not a blood relative of his, but only a niece by marriage. Plummer regularly paid his dues and assessments to San Jose Camp until the month of February, 1906, when he disappeared. He has not been seen nor heard from since, although the plaintiff, the defendant, and members of San Jose Camp have made diligent efforts to locate him. Following his disappearance the plaintiff paid, and the defendant accepted, all dues and assessments which became payable by reason of the benefit certificate, until December 31, 1916. She then prepared and submitted to the defendant proof of the disappearance of Plummer more than 10 years previously, and demanded payment of the $2,000 specified in the benefit certificate, upon the theory that Plummer, not having been heard from for more than 7 years, was presumed to be dead. Then defendant refused payment whereon the plaintiff instituted this action, and obtained judgment, for which the defendant has appealed.

Several important questions arise on this appeal. Plummer applied for and received his first policy in the defendant society in 1900. The present policy was issued in 1905. Plummer disappeared in 1906. In 1908 the defendant enacted a by-law, numbered 66, which provides that proof of death of a member, based on disappearance, cannot be made until the full term of the member's expectancy of life, according to the National Fraternal Congress Table of Mortality, has expired, and that this by-law shall be binding and effective, the statute of any state or rule of common law to the contrary notwithstanding. Until such period has elapsed all payments required by the by-laws of the society must be regularly made; otherwise, the insurance will lapse. The defendant interposed, as one of its separate defenses to the action, that the full term of expectancy of the life of Frank S. Plummer had not expired when this action was brought. On motion of the plaintiff the court struck the allegation from the answer. Appellant complains of this ruling of the court, but its contention is without merit.

The defendant's position, in brief, is that death, which alone matures the policy, cannot be shown in this case, and that the right of the beneficiary to recover is postponed many years, until the termination of Plummer's expectancy of life, because of amendment No. 66 of the by-laws, and that recovery must be had at such deferred time only upon due proof of the fact of continued absence of the insured during the period, and of the payment by the beneficiary of all dues and assessments necessary to keep the certificate alive until the expiration of that period of expectancy.

[1] In his application for a membership in the defendant society, Plummer agreed to be bound by its by-laws then in force, and to be thereafter enacted. His compliance with such by-laws was, therefore, by his expressed agreement, made a condition on which he was entitled to participate in the beneficiary fund of the order. Where the contract between a member and the order is as here disclosed, it is never to be disputed that all subsequent rules, regulations and by-laws not in themselves unreasonable, against expressed law, or public policy, enter into and govern all of his rights and relationship with the association. Caldwell v. Grand Lodge, 148 Cal. 195, 199, 82 Pac. 781, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 653, 113 Am. St. Rep. 219, 7 Ann. Cas. 356.

[2] But it is a rule of common law, and of the statutory enactment of this state, that a person not heard from in 7 years is presumed to be dead (Civ. Code Proc. 1963, subd. 26), and appellant's by-law is not only unreasonable and violative of statutory enactment, but is against the weight of public policy. It has been repeatedly so held. Reynolds v. North American Union, 204 Ill. App. 316, 327; Samberg v. Knights of Modern Macabees, 158 Mich. 568, 123 N. W. 25, 133 Am. St. Rep. 396; National Union v. Sawyer, 42 App. D. C. 475; Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias v. Wilson (Tex. Civ. App.), 204 S. W. 891, 894. Its enforcement would not only have the effect to render nugatory a salutary statute, but the further result of making it practically impossible to make proofs of death in cases within the recognized experience of man, and thereby work a substantial injustice to the beneficiary. Sovereign Camp W. O. W. v. Robinson (Tex. Civ. App.), 187 S. W. 215, 219; Reynolds v. North American Union, supra. In Olson v. Modern Woodmen of America, 182 Iowa, 1018, 164 N. W. 346, L. R. A. 1918F, 1164, this same appellant invoked the defense of this same by-law. The court refused to countenance the plea, holding that its application would impose on a beneficiary the burden of paying all dues and assessments during the whole period of expectancy of the assured, thereby making the certificate practically worthless.

[3] As a further and separate defense the appellant alleged that respondent's cause of action was barred by an express limitation in the contract of the time within which the action could be maintained, and by the statute of limitation. The benefit certificate provides that no action can or shall be maintained thereon until after the proofs of death and claimant's right to benefits, as provided for in the by-laws of the society, have been filed with the Head Clerk, and passed upon by the board of directors, nor unless brought within 18 months from the date of the death of the member. The court found that Plummer died some time in the month of February, 1913; that being 7 years after the date of his disappearance. This action was commenced on June 10, 1917. Appellant contends, therefore, that the suit was not only barred by the limitation of the contract, but also by the 4-year limitation of section 337, subdivision 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It is undoubtedly the general rule that a condition in a policy of insurance, providing that no recovery shall be had thereon unless suit be brought within a given time, is valid, if the time limited is, in itself, not unreasonable; but to permit the defendant, under the peculiar facts of this case, to successfully interpose the defense of either the provision in the certificate, or of the statute, would be to extend the rule of limitation too far. The appellant, through its local camp officers, its general attorney associated with its Head Camp, and presumably others, had prompt notice of the disappearance of the assured, and engaged to endeavor to locate him. Just what it did in that regard does not appear. Although fully apprised of the fact that Plummer disappeared in February, 1906, the appellant for 10 years continued to demand and to take from the respondent dues and assessments required by its by-laws to keep the benefit certificate in force, and the assured in ostensible good standing. Even after it knew, or should have known, that Plummer was presumed to be dead in 1913, and the beneficiary entitled to offer presumptive proof of his death, it continued for 3 years more to exact these payments. It did not furnish the respondent the necessary blanks required by it for proofs of death, although it was one of its rules that such proofs would not be considered, unless made on the forms furnished by it. The respondent had given the appellant such information as she had concerning Plummer and his disappearance, and knew that the appellant had engaged to locate him. She complied with all the demands of the society, relying, as she testified, upon the belief that the appellant would initiate the proper steps for the payment to her of the benefits provided under the certificate of insurance at such time as the amount was properly payable. When she finally sought independent legal advice and presented proofs of the disappearance of the assured, sufficient to invoke the presumption of death, arising under the rule of the statute, more than 18 months had elapsed after the presumption of death had been raised.

Respondent then acted with all convenient dispatch, but before appellant's board of directors passed upon the proofs of Plummer's disappearance, and considered and rejected her claim for benefits under the certificate, more than 4 years from the presumptive date of death had elapsed. Yet until that action was taken by appellant, plaintiff was prohibited by the by-laws from maintaining this action. Although required by the by-laws to bring her action within 18 months after death of the insured, respondent was forbidden to do so until her proofs of death and claims were acted upon by the board of directors of the appellant. To give literal effect to this by-law would be to suspend the remedy of respondent until some action was taken by the appellant and provide for the running of the statute at the same time. While in some cases this appears to have been done, the compelling facts of this particular case warrant our adherence to the rule announced in Case v. Sun Insurance Co., 83 Cal. 473, 476, 23 Pac. 534, 8 L. R. A. 48, and in holding that plaintiff's action is removed from the application of the general rule of limitation.

"To hold otherwise, would enable the insurer to collect assessments indefinitely, in disregard of the forfeiture, so long as it suited its interest to do so, and to assert a secret intention to insist upon the forfeiture, whenever such course better accorded with its advantage." Modern Woodmen of America v. Lane, 62 Neb. 89, 97, 86 N. W. 943, 944.

The precise question was considered in Kelly v. Ancient Order of Hibernians Life Ins. Fund of Minnesota, 113 Minn. 355, 129 N. W. 846, on identical facts. The court denied the intervention of both contract and statutory limitation, saying:

"The association ought not to be permitted to take advantage of its own neglect and refuse payment on the ground that the beneficiary did not sooner compel payment."

One other contention of the appellant remains to be considered. It is that the respondent is not one of the persons whom the insured might legally designate as a beneficiary under the benefit certificate. The Modern Woodmen of America filed its articles of association in Illinois, in 1884. Neither the statute of that state, passed in 1883, under which it was incorporated, nor its own charter, placed a restriction upon the class of persons whom its members might designate as beneficiaries. In 1893, however, the Illinois Legislature passed a new act, regulating fraternal benefit societies, which has continued and is still in existence, and which provides that payment of death benefits by such societies "shall only be made to the families, heirs and blood relatives, affianced husband, or affianced wife of, or to persons dependent upon the members." By the terms of this act, also all fraternal societies then doing business in Illinois were declared to be duly organized, and were authorized to continue doing such business, provided they made application for official permission, and otherwise complied with the provisions of the act.

The appellant immediately made application for, and was given authority "to carry on the business of fraternal beneficiary society insurance under the provisions of the said act of 1893, and amendments thereto." In the application to the state of Illinois for this permission, the Modern Woodmen of America represented that the death benefits of the society were paid only to the families, heirs, blood relatives, affianced husband or affianced wife of, or to persons dependent upon the members, the statement being couched in the exact language of the statute. Subsequently appellant amended its by-laws to conform to the statute of 1893, regarding beneficiaries, and when Plummer substituted this plaintiff as beneficiary in place of his deceased wife in 1905, it was and is provided that its benefit certificates shall be made payable only to the wife, surviving children, or some other person or persons specifically named as beneficiary, "who are related to the member as heir, blood relative, or person dependent upon him, or member of his family," and that no payment shall be made to any other person. Notwithstanding this inhibition, Plummer directed that the new benefit certificate be, and it was, issued to "Agnes Bennett [this respondent] related to said member [Plummer] in the relationship of niece," but the trial court found as a fact, and it is conceded that the respondent is not a blood relative, legal heir, dependent, or a member of the family of the decedent. Clearly, then, for two reasons she is not entitled to claim as a beneficiary under the benefit certificate. The statute of Illinois and appellant's by-laws prevent it.

[4] "The statute of Illinois is the organic law of this society. It is under this law that it lives, moves, and has its being. From this law it gets its right to do business, and by this law it is regulated and controlled." Bush v. Modern Woodmen of America, 182 Iowa, 515, 541, 152 N. W. 31, 36, and 162 N. W. 59 (on rehearing). Under the provisions of the Illinois statute of 1893 to the effect that all fraternal benefit societies should be governed by it, and the application of appellant to do business in pursuance of its requirements, the Modern Woodmen of America has been governed and controlled by the terms of that law since its enactment. Bastian v. M. W. A., 166 Ill. 595, 607, 46 N. E. 1090. The statute became an integral part of the charter of the society, as binding upon its members after its passage as any by-law that could have been adopted by the order.

Machado v. Ellison, 35 Cal. App. 337, 340, 169 Pac. 917. It must be considered as part of the contract of insurance, and inserted for the purpose of a construction of the policy, as an additional provision, as if it were literally incorporated therein. Nielsen v. Provident Savings, etc., Co., 139 Cal. 332, 337, 73 Pac. 168, 96 Am. St. Rep. 146.

It has been repeatedly held that a by-law such as the appellant has adopted is reasonable, and that after its adoption a member of the society has no right to make a beneficiary belonging to any other than one of the classes therein designated. Caldwell v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W., 148 Cal. 195, 199, 82 Pac. 781, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 653, 113 Am. St. Rep. 219, 7 Ann. Cas. 356; Bush v. Modern Woodmen of America, supra; Baldwin v. Begley, 185 Ill. 180, 56 N. E. 1065; Steele v. Fraternal Tribunes, 215 Ill. 190, 74 N. E. 121, 106 Am. St. Rep. 160.

[5] If it be contended that, by inserting the name of the respondents in the certificate, as it did, with benefits payable to her, and in collecting dues and assessments from the member thereafter, the appellant waived the requirement of its own by-law and the provisions of the statute, so far as the statute is concerned it cannot be done.

"There are many things that can be waived by an association of this character, but this is not one of them. The statute expressly and positively prohibited the payment of the benefit fund to any person who is not within the class designated as beneficiaries." Modern Woodmen of America v. Comeaux, 79 Kan. 493, 499, 101 Pac. 1, 3 (25 L. R. A. [N. S.] 814, 17 Ann. Cas. 865); Bush v. Modern Woodmen of America, supra; Steele v. Fraternal Tribunes, supra.

The judgment is reversed.

52 Cal. App. 566

Ex parte WILLIAMS. (Cr. 990.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 7, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⟸234—Substituted magistrate cannot consider evidence introduced before predecessor.

Where the magistrate before whom a preliminary examination was begun was absent at time the examination was concluded and another magistrate was called to sit in that department, the substituted magistrate could not, in determining whether probable cause to believe defendant guilty had been shown, consider the evidence introduced before his predecessor, since Pen. Code, §§ 858–883, providing for preliminary examinations, require the essential principles of procedure and evidence to be followed in such examinations, though they are less formal than the final trial of the case.

2. Criminal law ⟸234—"Depositions" before former magistrate cannot be considered by subsequent magistrate.

The fact that Pen. Code, § 869, designates the written testimony received before a magistrate at a preliminary examination as "depositions" does not entitle such testimony to be considered by a magistrate, who was substituted during the course of the examination for a magistrate before whom it was instituted, since the term "deposition" is employed in the Penal Code in a special and restricted sense, and not in the sense of evidence which is permitted to be embodied in writing; it is the sense in which it is used in Code Civ. Proc. § 2019.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Deposition.]

3. Habeas corpus ⟸34—Pleading not guilty to information does not waive right to habeas corpus for illegal commitment.

The entry of a plea of not guilty to an information based on a preliminary examination does not waive the right of accused to habeas corpus to procure his discharge under Pen. Code, § 1487, subd. 7, authorizing a discharge on habeas corpus where a party has been committed without reasonable or probable cause.

4. Habeas corpus ⟸3—Right not lost by failure to move to quash information.

Pen. Code, § 995, subd. 1, requiring an information to be set aside on defendant's motion when defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate, does not authorize the relief, if the magistrate has heard and considered evidence, though it is insufficient, and therefore section 996, providing that the failure to make that motion precludes defendant from thereafter making the objection, does not prevent habeas corpus to procure defendant's discharge on the ground that he was committed without reasonable or probable cause under section 1487, subd. 7, where the magistrate heard some evidence, which was insufficient to show reasonable cause, and based his order of commitment on evidence heard before another magistrate that he was not authorized to consider.

Habeas corpus proceedings by Frank D. Williams to secure his release from the custody of the Chief of Police of the City and County of San Francisco. Writ granted.

Elliott Johnson, of San Francisco, and A. J. Woolsey, of Oakland, for petitioner.

John T. Williams, Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and I. M. Golden, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of San Francisco, for respondent Finn.

RICHARDS, J. Application for a writ of habeas corpus. The facts of the case upon which the applicant bases his claim of right to be discharged from custody are briefly these: The applicant herein, Frank D. Williams, was arrested upon a charge of perjury embraced in a complaint filed in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco. The preliminary examination upon said charge came on for hearing before department 2 of said police court, then presided over by Judge J. J. Sullivan, on December 7, 1920; whereupon certain evidence was introduced and testimony taken before Judge Sullivan. The cause was then continued for further hearing to December 21, 1920, at which time further evidence was educed and testimony taken before said judge, and the cause was then continued for further hearing until December 22, 1920, at 2 o'clock p. m. When the case was called upon the last-named day and hour, Judge Sullivan was absent, and the cause was continued by the clerk of his court to December 23, 1920, at 10 o'clock a. m. When again called for hearing at that time Judge Sullivan again failed to appear to conduct the hearing of the cause, whereupon and after some delay Judge McAtee, at that time the police judge of another department of said court, was called in to department 2 thereof by the district attorney, and requested by him to sit therein and complete the preliminary examination of said cause. Judge McAtee proceeded to do so over the objection of the defendant, who requested that there should be a hearing de novo of the case. Judge McAtee refused to accede to this request, stating that he would proceed from where the hearing before Judge Sullivan had left off, but would familiarize himself with the depositions already taken before the latter. The matter was then continued until the following day, when Judge McAtee proceeded to hear certain evidence which, it is conceded, would in itself be wholly insufficient to support the defendant's commitment upon the charge; and, the matter being submitted, Judge McAtee held the defendant to answer, basing his decision chiefly upon the evidence which had been taken before Judge Sullivan in the case.

The main contention of the applicant for this writ is that his commitment upon the charge in question was without probable cause, since the committing magistrate had no power in deciding the case to consider the evidence which had been introduced and testimony which had been taken before Judge Sullivan, and that without such evidence there was not sufficient evidence heard by Judge McAtee to justify his commitment upon said charge.

[1] We think this contention must be sustained. While it is true that preliminary examinations of persons accused of crime, when held before a committing magistrate, and in the manner provided for in sections 858 to 883, inclusive, of the Penal Code, are usually less formal in matters of procedure than would be required upon the trial of the cause, it cannot be held that the essential principles of procedure and of evidence may be departed from by committing magistrates in the conduct of such examinations. By the terms of sections 858, 859, and 860 of the Penal Code the magistrate is required to inform the defendant of his rights to counsel, and to allow him a reasonable time to procure such counsel. By section 864 of the Penal Code the magistrate must inform the defendant as to the nature of the charge made against him by reading to him the depositions of the witnesses examined at the time of the filing of the complaint and issuance of the warrant for his arrest, and must also issue subpœnas for such witnesses as either the prosecution or the defendant requires. By section 865 of the same Code these witnesses, when produced at the hearing, "must be examined in the presence of the defendant, and may be cross-examined in his behalf"; and by section 866 thereof, "when the testimony of witnesses on the part of the people is closed, any witnesses which the defendant may produce must be sworn and examined." By section 869 thereof the testimony of these witnesses, in cases of homicide only, must be reduced to writing by or under the direction of the magistrate; but in all felony cases he may, in his discretion, order the testimony and proceedings to be taken down in shorthand and transcribed and authenticated as in said section provided. The written record or transcription of the testimony so taken is in said section denominated a "deposition," and is to be filed in the superior court as a part of the record therein in case the defendant shall be held to answer upon the charge, and a copy thereof furnished to the defendant or his attorney upon demand. Section 871 of the same Code provides that "if, after hearing the proofs, it appears either that no public offense has been committed, or that there is not sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty of a public offense, the magistrate must order the defendant to be discharged;" while section 872 thereof provides that "if, however, it appears from the examination that a public offense has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof," he must be held to answer.

The foregoing sections of the Penal Code clearly indicate to our minds that the essential procedure upon a preliminary examination of a felony charge does not differ materially from that required upon the trial of the cause. The magistrate who is to make the order, either discharging the defendant or holding him to answer upon the charge, must base that order upon evidence which he has admitted and upon testimony which he has heard in the usual way in which such evidence is presented and such testimony taken. He has no right to predicate his said order upon something which has not occurred before him, upon evidence the admissibility of which he has not passed upon, and upon testimony the weight and value of which he has not measured by the appearance, the narration, and the manner of testifying of the witnesses present in person before him. It has been expressly held that upon the trial of a cause in a superior court judges cannot be changed in the midst of a hearing with the effect that the substituted judge could be entitled to decide the cause upon evidence which he had not himself heard or passed upon. Guardianship of Sullivan, 143 Cal. 462, 77 Pac. 153. We are satisfied that a like procedure must obtain upon the hearing of preliminary examinations.

[2] The respondent herein, however, urges that since the testimony taken upon a preliminary examination is, when transcribed, denominated a "deposition" in the sections of the Penal Code above referred to, such "depositions" were entitled to be read by Judge McAtee, even though the witnesses whose testimony had been thus transcribed had not appeared or testified before him.

There are two answers to this contention; the first being that the term "deposition," as used in the foregoing sections of the Code, does not bear the same meaning as given to the same word when used to distinguish this form of evidence permitted to be embodied in writing under section 2019 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The term is employed in the Penal Code in a special and restricted sense, and the uses of testimony when taken upon a preliminary examination and thus reduced to writing are also those restricted uses specified in the provisions of said Code above referred to, and are not the general uses to which depositions taken in conformity with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure may be put; and the second answer is that except in cases of homicide the testimony taken at preliminary examinations is not required to be reduced to writing at all except in the discretion of the magistrate; and, this being so, to hold that Judge McAtee could be permitted to read either a written report or transcript of oral testimony which had been taken and heard before Judge Sullivan would be, by natural sequence, to permit the former to talk over with Judge Sullivan the testimony which the latter had heard, and by such loose method to determine whether or not the defendant should be held to answer to the charge. Without pursuing this branch of the case to further lengths of absurdity, it is clear to our minds that the defendant could not be held to answer upon testimony which Judge McAtee had not himself admitted and heard. It is to be noted that it is not a mere error in the admission of evidence of which the applicant herein complains, but an essential violation of his right to have the order for his commitment based only upon evidence which had been heard and weighed by the identical magistrate who had assumed to issue such order. It is conceded that the testimony which Judge McAtee did actually hear was entirely insufficient to justify the order holding the defendant to answer to the charge.

[3] It is, however, further contended by the respondent herein that, assuming that the applicant herein would have been entitled to apply for and be awarded the relief sought upon this writ, he has lost that right by his plea of "not guilty" to the information subsequently filed, and also by his failure to take advantage of the error of Judge McAtee complained of by way of motion to set aside such information permitted to be made under section 995 et seq. of the Penal Code. These last-named sections of said Code provide that an information must be set aside upon the defendant's motion when it appears that "before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate"; and it is also therein provided that the objections which may be made upon such motion are waived by the defendant if not so made.

We cannot agree with the contention of the respondent in this behalf. Section 1487 of the Penal Code specifies the several grounds upon which applications for discharge on habeas corpus may be based. Subdivision 7 of said section provides for the applicant's discharge from custody "where a party has been committed on a criminal charge without reasonable or probable cause." No limitation is expressly imposed by the Penal Code upon the time within which a writ of habeas corpus upon this ground may be applied for; and we are satisfied, not only that no good reason exists, but that there is no authority for holding that a party held to answer on a felony charge could be held to have waived his right to a writ upon this ground by the fact that he had entered or that there had been entered for him a plea of "not guilty" to the charge. On the other hand, the uniform practice has been to permit writs of habeas corpus to be applied for and granted after the entry by the defendant of his plea. A sample of the many cases in which this right has been recognized is to be seen in the recent case of ex parte Hartwell, 28 Cal. App. 627, 153 Pac. 730. In conformity with this long-established practice, we hold that the defendant did not waive his right to apply for this writ by the entry of his plea of "not guilty."

[4] The respondent further contends that the applicant herein waived his right to the relief applied for by this writ through the fact that he did not move to set aside the information under subdivision 1 of section 995 of the Penal Code, relating to informations, which provides that an information must be set aside upon the defendant's motion when it appears (subdivision 1) "that before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate." Section 996 of the Penal Code provides that if the defendant fails to make said motion he is precluded from thereafter making said objection. We are satisfied that these last-named sections of the Penal Code are not in conflict with, and do not constitute a limitation upon, section 1487 of the Penal Code, relating to the grounds upon which writs of habeas corpus may be applied for. We think the distinction between the two remedies is quite clearly indicated in People v. Beach, 122 Cal. 37, 54 Pac. 369, wherein the Supreme Court reversed the order of the trial court setting aside an information on the defendant's motion made upon the ground that the evidence taken upon the preliminary examination was insufficient to show that a public offense had been committed. In so doing the Supreme Court said:

"If the magistrate had no power or jurisdiction to hold the examination, if no complaint had been made charging the defendants with a public offense, and, perhaps, if no evidence at all was taken by the magistrate, and there was no waiver by the defendants, it might be held that the defendants had not been legally committed. People v. Howard, 111 Cal. 655. The phrase 'legally committed' refers to the examination of the charge and holding the defendant to answer by the magistrate. Ex parte Baker, 88 Cal. 84. If a magistrate, upon a complaint duly made charging a public offense, had heard the evidence and has committed the defendant, that ends the matter so far as concerns this motion. * * * The right to have a charge dismissed is regulated by statute, and, as we have seen, the phrase 'legally committed' means only that the accused has been committed by a magistrate who has jurisdiction to hold the examination, and who has actually heard the evidence and determined that probable cause exists for holding the defendant. The point was decided in People v. More, 68 Cal. 500. Counsel attempt a distinction on the ground that the alleged defect there was that venue was not shown, but the difference is not obvious. If the point was founded in fact there as here the evidence failed to show an offense for which the magistrate could legally hold the accused person. The decision was a construction of section 995 of the Penal Code, and holds that on the motion to set aside the information the superior court cannot review and overrule the finding of the magistrate that the evidence taken before him was sufficient."

In the case of People v. Sacramento Butchers' Protective Ass'n, 12 Cal. App. 471, 107 Pac. 712, a similar question arose, and in determining it the District Court of Appeal for the Third district expressly held that the objection that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the order of commitment could not be inquired into upon a motion to set aside the information under section 995 of the Penal Code, but must be taken advantage of in some other proceeding. The writ of habeas corpus is the proceeding wherein the right on the part of a defendant to seek his discharge upon the ground that the evidence taken before the committing magistrate was insufficient to justify his commitment is expressly given to him. In the case at bar the committing magistrate, Judge McAtee, was properly sitting in Judge Sullivan's court during the absence of the latter under the provisions of the city charter of San Francisco creating the several departments of the police court. He had jurisdiction to hear and determine the charge against the defendant pending in that court. He heard some evidence therein which, however, it is conceded, was insufficient in itself to justify holding the defendant to answer upon said charge; but he also, as the record discloses, undertook to read over a transcription of some testimony taken before Judge Sullivan which was neither presented nor presentable in that form in evidence before Judge McAtee, and he undertook to hold the defendant to answer in part, and in the main part, upon what he had learned from a perusal of such transcription. This was not a mere error in the admission of evidence, since the reporter's transcription of something which had occurred before another magistrate was not evidence nor admissible as such. The defendant was entitled to have the witnesses against him appear and testify in his presence before the magistrate upon whom was to devolve the duty of determining from such evidence so taken whether or not probable cause had been shown for his commitment; and since it is conceded in this matter that the testimony which Judge McAtee heard was insufficient to constitute reasonable or probable cause for the defendant's commitment, it follows that his application herein must be granted, and the defendant discharged.

It is so ordered.

JEFFERS v. HULEN et al. (Civ. 2280.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 10, 1921.)

1. Mortgages ⟸38(1)—Evidence held to show deed a mortgage.

Evidence held to support finding that deed from brother to sister was intended as a mortgage.

2. Wills ⟸93—Deed held ineffective as gift.

Deed from brother to sister held ineffective as a gift, upon testimony by the sister that she was to have the property if "anything happened" to her brother, as this indicated that a present transfer was not intended, but rather a testamentary disposition of the property.

3. Mortgages ⟸605—Where mortgagee in possession, receiving rents, tender of amount to redeem not required, as amount determinable only on accounting.

Where mortgagee had been in possession, receiving the rents and profits, a decree allowing redemption was not erroneous on the ground that no tender had been made before suit of the amount of the mortgage debt with interest, since the amount was determinable only upon accounting, which, in fact, was had, rentals received being deducted from interest, and the amount so ascertained and stated in the interlocutory judgment was paid by plaintiff before final judgment.

4. Mortgages ⟸617—Burden on mortgagee to show amounts paid for taxes or improvements.

The burden is on the mortgagee, resisting redemption, to show the amounts expended for taxes paid or improvements made.

5. Quieting title ⟸10(2)—Neither party need trace title back of admitted common source.

Where both parties claim under a common source of title neither need go back of that common source in the proof.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive on appeal.

On conflicting evidence as to adverse character of defendant's holding, a finding against her allegation of ownership is conclusive on appeal.

7. Trial ⟸397(3)—Finding as specific as allegations is sufficient.

Where defendant did not set up prescriptive title, but alleged merely ownership and possession for 10 years, and the court found against her allegation of ownership, its failure to find specifically upon the question of prescriptive title claimed by her was not error, the finding being as specific as the allegations of the answer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by C. B. Jeffers, adminstrator, against Nettie M. Hulen and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Terry W. Ward, and F. W. Henderson, both of Merced, for appellants.

Edward Bickmore, of Reno, Nev., for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of W. C. Jeffers, deceased, brought this action against the defendant to quiet title to 10 acres of land in the possession of the defendant. The complaint is in the usual form, and the answer, in addition to the customary denials, alleges that the defendant is, and for more than 10 years prior to the commencement of the action has been, the owner and in possession of the land. W. C. Jeffers, on the 10th day of September, 1908, executed an instrument in the form of an ordinary grant, bargain, and sale deed, caused it to be recorded, and on the next day delivered it to defendant. On the same day she gave him $250 in the form of a check. At other times thereafter she gave him sums of money aggregating more than $100. The plaintiff claims and attempted to prove that the instrument, in form a deed, was intended as a mortgage to secure payment of the $250 advanced by the defendant. The defendant contends that such instrument was intended as a deed of gift. The plaintiff replies that, if intended as a gift, it was an attempt to make a testamentary disposition by deed contrary to law.

W. C. Jeffers was a brother of the plaintiff and the defendant. He retained control of the land in controversy after the transaction related until December, 1910, when he left for Mexico, where he died in 1911.

1. The court found that the deed was intended as a mortgage. Is the finding supported by the evidence? A witness for the plaintiff testified that, directly after the deed was made, the defendant said that W. C. Jeffers had borrowed $200 from her, and had given the deed as security; that in 1913 she said, "I have got a deed to that 10 acres, and I can hold it, but I won't do it;" that in 1915 she said that all she required was her money back. Another witness testified that in 1912 the defendant said that all she wanted was her money back. Another witness stated that defendant said she did'nt want the place, and she did not claim it; that all she expected "was to get her money back she had loaned" her brother.

The defendant testified that when W. C. Jeffers handed the deed to her he said, "Here is your deed," or something to that effect; that he said, "I don't want you to take a mortgage, because I am going here and there, and getting into trouble, and want you to have this property if anything happens to me;" that he told her, "If I am riding on a freight train and get killed I want you to have my property;" "he told me he deeded the property to me; in case anything happened he wanted me to have it." Another witness for the defendant testified that W. C. Jeffers said, "I made this deed over to Nettie, so if anything goes wrong I want her to have it." The defendant further testified that "one time he asked sister and I why we didn't go up and paper my house; * * * then one time he asked me if I paid my taxes, with reference to this place."

In 1912 the defendant's brother Ben Jeffers, wrote her that he desired to rent the land in controversy for a period of 5 years, and in her reply she said: "As to 5 years that suits me too unless Cay (W. C. Jeffers) returns to claim it."

[1] From the foregoing résumé it is quite clear that the court's finding that the instrument was intended as a mortgage finds sufficient support in the evidence.

[2] 2. The defendant's contention that the instrument was intended as a deed of gift cannot be sustained, even when the fullest credence is given to her testimony. She was to have the property if "anything happened" to her brother. This indicates that a present transfer of title was not intended, but rather a testamentary disposition of the property. The instrument was ineffective for that purpose. Cox v. Schneer, 172 Cal. 380, 156 Pac. 509.

[3] 3. The defendant contends that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to pay or offer to pay, the amount of the mortgage debt, with interest before commencing suit. In actions such as this where the mortgagee has held possession and received the rents and profits, an accounting must be had, before the plaintiff can know how much to pay or offer. The court ascertained the sum due the defendant, and provided in the interlocutory judgment that the plaintiff should pay such amount within 60 days under penalty of dismissal on his failure so to do. The plaintiff paid the required sum within the 60 days, and thereupon final judgment was entered. This procedure was in accordance with the usual practice in this state. Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 17 Pac. 225; De Cazara v. Orena, 80 Cal. 132, 22 Pac. 74; Boyce v. Fisk, 110 Cal. 107, 42 Pac. 473. In determining the amount to be paid the defendant, the court allowed interest on the loan, and deducted what was received as rental.

[4] 4. The court did not allow the defendant anything for taxes paid or improvements made by her. The burden was on the defendant to show the amounts so expended, and, failing to offer such proof, she is not in a position to complain. Wise v. Burton, 73 Cal. 175, 14 Pac. 683; Carpentier v. Small, 35 Cal. 355.

[5] 5. Appellant insists that the evidence does not show title in the estate of W. C. Jeffers. It sufficiently appears that C. B. Jeffers deeded the land to W. C. Jeffers, and that the latter was in possession of the same when the instrument involved in this suit was executed. Appellant makes no claim of title other than that acquired from W. C. Jeffers. Where both parties claim under a common source of title, it is not necessary for either to go back of that common source in the proof. Ginaca v. Peterson, (C. C. A.) 262 Fed. 904; Phillips v. Menotti, 167 Cal. 328, 139 Pac. 796.

[6, 7] 6. Appellant contends that she has established title by prescription. Her answer does not set up a prescriptive title, but alleges merely ownership and possession for 10 years. The testimony relative to the adverse character of her holding was conflicting, but there was ample evidence to show that it was not adverse. The court found against the allegation of ownership, and such finding is conclusive on appeal. No complaint is made of the failure to find specifically upon the question of the prescriptive title claimed by the defendant, and none could well be made, because the finding is as specific as the allegations of the answer.

No error appearing, the interlocutory and the final judgments are affirmed.

COLLINS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF MONTEREY COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3886.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 9, 1921.)

1. Courts ⊜475(6)—Court of any county may appoint guardian for child of divorcee notwithstanding order concerning custody.

Civ. Code, § 138, relating to disposition of children of persons submitting themselves and their marital relations to the jurisdiction of the superior court, does not confer jurisdiction upon the court to appoint a guardian for the children, and a superior court of another county, when it appears necessary or convenient, may appoint guardians for the persons and estates, or either of them, of minors who have no guardian legally appointed by will or deed, and who are inhabitants or residents of the county, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1747, 1748.

2. Guardian and ward ⊜19—Child on attaining 14 has absolute right to select suitable guardian.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1748, a minor on arriving at the age of 14 years has the absolute right to nominate a guardian and displace one already appointed, even though the displaced guardian may be one of his parents; discretion of court only being exercised in determination of the question whether the nominee is a suitable person.

Application by Henry W. Collins for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of Monterey County and Hon. J. A. Bardin, as Judge thereof. Writ granted.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for petitioner.

Roy A. Bronson, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

WASTE, P. J. The petitioner is here seeking a writ of mandate directing the superior court in and for the county of Monterey to hear and determine an application for guardianship. The respondent, being in doubt as to its jurisdiction in the matter, has declined to proceed.

Until November 1, 1916, petitioner, Henry W. Collins, and Isabel Collins were husband and wife. On that date they were divorced by a decree duly entered in the superior court in and for Marin county, and the custody of Benjamin Collins, the minor son of the parties, was awarded to the mother. That decree is in full force and effect. The boy remained with his mother, who removed to Solano county, until he became 14 years of age, when he went to live with petitioner, his father, who has for a number of years resided in Monterey county. The petitioner has filed in superior court of Monterey county his application to be appointed guardian of the person of his son, Benjamin, who in writing nominated his father as his guardian, and requested that he be appointed. The court refused to cause notice of the hearing of the petition to be given, or to proceed in the matter, holding that the superior court of Marin county, in which the parents were divorced, has exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine any matter relating to the custody and care of the minor.

[1] The authority of the superior court of Marin county to award the custody of the minor to one of the parties in the divorce action was not exclusive. It was but the exercise of the general power conferred by section 138 of the Civil Code, to make a proper order for the custody of the child. Ex parte Gordan, 95 Cal. 374, 377, 30 Pac. 561. That section does not confer jurisdiction upon the court to appoint a guardian for such minor. The superior court of each county, when it appears necessary or convenient, may appoint guardians for persons and estates, or either of them, of minors who have no guardian legally appointed by will or deed, and who are inhabitants, or residents of the county. That authority is conferred by section 1747 and following sections of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 138 of the Civil Code was enacted for the protection of children of persons who may submit themselves and their marital relations to the general jurisdiction of the superior court. Harlan v. Harlan, 154 Cal. 341, 350, 98 Pac. 32. In guardianship matters the court acts strictly in a special proceeding, and by virtue of power conferred upon it to appoint guardians in the designated cases. The validity of its proceedings must be determined solely from a consideration of the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, supra. Guardianship of Salter, 142 Cal. 412, 413, 76 Pac. 51; In re Campbell, 130 Cal. 380, 383, 62 Pac. 613.

[2] In the instant case the petition filed in the superior court shows that the minor is an inhabitant of Monterey county. He is 14 years of age, and has the absolute right to select and nominate his guardian, who, if approved by the court, must be appointed. Code Civ. Proc. § 1748; Guardianship of Kirkman, 168 Cal. 688, 144 Pac. 745; Guardianship of Meiklejohn, 171 Cal. 247, 152 Pac. 734; Guardianship of McSwain, 176 Cal. 287, 168 Pac. 117. These cases are also authority for holding that a minor, upon arriving at the age of 14 years, may nominate and displace a guardian already appointed, and that even though the displaced guardian may be one of his parents.

"The whole scheme," says the court, in discussing the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the appointment of guardians, "contemplates the absolute right of the minor to have a guardian of his own selection after he is 14 years of age, provided alway he selects a person who is, in the judgment of the court, a suitable person to act as guardian. The discretion of the court can be exercised only in the determination of the question whether the nominee is a 'suitable person.'" Guardianship of Kirkman, supra.

To uphold the contention of the respondent would be to deny the minor the exercise of this absolute right.

Let a writ of mandate issue, directed to the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Monterey, and Hon. J. A. Bardin, judge thereof, commanding them to entertain said guardianship proceeding, and determine the same.

POWERS v. MARINE ENGINEERS' BENEFICIAL ASS'N, NO. 35, et al. (Civ. 3778.)

1. Corporations ⊂=54—Rules and regulations must conform to statutes.

By-law of nonprofit corporation providing for the election of officers by balloting through the mail, void because in conflict with Civ. KERRIGAN, J. This is a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the election of officers of the defendant in the manner required by section 321b of the Civil Code.

The defendant, Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association, No. 35, is a nonprofit corporation organized and acting under the laws of California, and of which the defendants Carberry and Searey are alleged to be respectively president and secretary de facto. The petitioner is a member of the organization in good standing and has been such ever since he joined it in the year 1910. In 1912 the association amended and readopted its by-laws, and in article VIII thereof provided that balloting for the election of its officers should be conducted through the mail. This by-law was and is in conflict with the provisions of section 321b of the Civil Code, which requires the election of officers to be held at a meeting of the members of the association and by ballots or votes cast by the members actually present or by proxy at such meeting. In August, 1915, however, section 599 of the Civil Code was amended so as to permit nonprofit corporations to adopt by-laws similar to the one here in question. In part this section reads as follows:

"Corporations now organized or that may hereafter be organized for purposes other than profit, may, either in their by-laws, ordinances, constitutions, or articles of incorporation, provide for * * * the manner of voting by the members of the corporation, which may be by ballot in the manner provided for by section 321b of this Code, or in any other manner provided for by the by-laws, ordinances, constitutions, or articles of incorporation of any corporation now organized, or that may hereafter be organized, for purposes other than profit."

It is conceded that since this amendment nonprofit corporations such as the defendant may adopt by-laws permitting the election of officers by balloting through the mail. It is also conceded that no express by-law relating to the election of officers has been adopted by the defendant since the adoption of article VIII of its by-laws in the year 1912, and that since that time and since the amendment of section 599 of the Civil Code in 1915 the officers of the defendant have been elected annually in the manner required by said article VIII, to wit, by balloting through the mail. It also appears from the undisputed testimony of the petitioner taken at the hearing upon this application that he did not vote at the election of officers held in December, 1920, nor in the preceding annual election; indeed, he sought, under the provisions of sections 312 and 315 of the Civil Code, to have the election of the year 1919 annulled and set aside on the ground that it was void because in violation of the provisions of section 321b of the Civil Code. However, before that proceeding could be disposed of on appeal the time for holding the election of 1920 arrived, and the officers of the association refusing to hold said election in accordance with the requirements of section 321b, and, on the contrary, following the method permitted by said article VIII of the by-laws of the association, the petitioner brought the present proceeding for the purpose already outlined.

The respondents contend that, although said article VIII has not been formally adopted as a by-law of the corporation since the amendment to the statute permitting the election of officers of nonprofit corporations by balloting through the mail, it has in effect been adopted by custom and usage.

[1, 2] We are unable to subscribe to this contention. Any rule or regulation adopted for the management of the business of the corporation, the control of its officers, or the rights and duties of its members among themselves and between them and the association, must conform, at least substantially, to the express provisions of the statute. Sections 301, 303, and 304 of the Civil Code establish the law in California as to the method of adopting by-laws. Section 301 provides that when by-laws are adopted originally they must be adopted by a majority of the stockholders or members of the corporation at a meeting called for that purpose, or by the written consent of either two-thirds of the stock or two-thirds of the members without a meeting for that purpose. Section 304 provides that the by-laws may be amended or a new by-law adopted at the annual meeting of the corporation, or at any other meeting properly called for that purpose, by a vote or by the written assent of two-thirds of the subscribed and outstanding stock, or by two-thirds of the members. This section contains the further provision that the by-laws originally adopted and any amendment thereto or new by-law must be copied in a legible hand in some book kept in the office of the corporation, to be known as the "book of by-laws," and that the book must be open to the inspection of the public during office hours each day except holidays. Assuming, for the purpose of this case, that the practice of following the requirements of said article VIII after its adoption was authorized by the amendment to section 599 in the year 1915, and that such practice had continued for a sufficient length of time to constitute a custom or usage, still we have no doubt, in view of the plain and express provisions of the Code regarding the adoption and amendment of by-laws, that it cannot be held that such custom or usage, consisting in repeated compliance with the provisions of a by-law admittedly invalid at its adoption, can take the place of compliance with the statutory requirements. In order to amend a by-law there must be a substantial compliance with the provisions of the law. 1 Fletcher, Cyc. Corp.

§ 487. To permit usage or custom to make a by-law would be in violation of the clear requirements of the statute, and as a result by-laws, instead of being express, formally adopted, in writing and open to the public, would depend for proof of their existence upon the uncertainties and infirmities of oral testimony. If a by-law may be adopted by usage, it would follow that a by-law could be repealed or amended by custom or usage, and we apprehend that hardly any one would so contend.
